Vol. 1
The Gospel of JOHN
(1-4)
Boice
Vol. 2
The Gospel of JOHN
(5-8)
Boice
Vol. 3
The Gospel of JOHN
(9-12)
Boice
Vol. 4
The Gospel of JOHN
(13-17)
Boice
Vol. 5
The Gospel of JOHN
(18-21)
Boice
An Expositional Commentary
The Gospel of JOHN
Volume 5
Triumph through Tragedy
(John 18-21)
James Montgomery Boice

The Gospel of John, Volume 1

The Coming of the Light (John 1-4)

by

James Montgomery Boice

To Him is light in whom is no darkness at all

Preface

It has been more than thirty years since I began to study the Gospel of John in a serious way and nearly twenty five years since my studies of the Gospel began to appear in print. They have been out of print for some time. So it was with much gratitude that I learned of Baker's interest in reissuing them in this revised and attractive version.

When I began in 1970 the studies which led to the writing of these five volumes, I anticipated some blessing from a book that has been a powerful source of instruction and comfort to many millions of God's people down through the ages of church history. But I was not quite prepared for the overwhelming blessing that attended them. Many have told me how they became Christians through hearing or reading these studies; and both Tenth Presbyterian Church, where they were first preached, and The Bible Study Hour, the radio program over which they were broadcast, have grown considerably. As for myself, the study of John caused me to appreciate the doctrines of the sovereignty and grace of God as I had not done before that time.

Over the years many different outlines have been given to John's Gospel. However, so far as I know, the one adopted for the purpose of this and the following four volumes is not paralleled elsewhere. This volume deals with the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ into the world and with the initial reaction of some persons to him. It covers the first four chapters of the Gospel. Volume two, covering chapters 5 through 8, deals with the hostility to Jesus that began to arise among the religious leaders. In volume three, chapters 9 through 12, Jesus will be seen turning to his own and beginning to teach them. Volume four, chapters 13 through 17, covers the final discourses. The last volume, chapters 18 through 21, deals with the culmination of Christ's earthly ministry centering in his betrayal, trial, death, and resurrection.

I have subtitled these five volumes: (1) "The Coming of the Light," (2) "Christ and Judaism," (3) "Those Who Received Him," (4) "Peace in Storm," and (5) "Triumph through Tragedy." I believe this reflects definable segments of John's narrative and will aid anyone in achieving an overview of it.

At times in these studies I digress from the verses under immediate investigation to deal in a somewhat more comprehensive way with a subject introduced there. In this volume digressions occur on the subjects of witnessing (chapters 16-20) and baptism (chapters 21-23).

I need to express my debt to many writers and church leaders from whom I have learned and (in some cases) borrowed, though it is impossible to do that adequately in a preface such as this. I have consulted all the commentators known to me at the time I did my work on John, particularly Matthew Henry, B. F. Westcott, Arthur W. Pink, Leon Morris, and William Barclay. I am indebted to many evangelical preachers and writers such as Harry A. Ironside, Donald Grey Barnhouse, John R. W. Stott, Francis A. Schaeffer, and others who are referred to throughout these books. I found stimulation and direction in the sermons of Charles Haddon Spurgeon, though little of that debt appears until volume two.

As I do in all my volumes, I express special gratitude to the session and congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where I have served as senior minister for more than thirty years. From the beginning they have encouraged me to spend much of my time in this kind of study and writing. Miss Caecilie Foelster, who was my personal secretary for many years, carefully edited the manuscript in its first appearance and saw it through several stages of production. She has also contributed the Scripture index for this reissued volume.

May the Lord richly bless his Word and use these studies, where possible, to make that Word more widely known and more fully understood. To him be the glory forever. Amen.

James Montgomery

Chapter 1.
Introducing John's Gospel

John 1:1

The Gospel of John has blessed the hearts of God's people through the centuries. It has been called "God's love letter to the world." Luther wrote of it, "This is the unique, tender, genuine chief Gospel. ...Should a tyrant succeed in destroying the Holy Scriptures and only a single copy of the Epistle to the Romans and the Gospel according to John escape him, Christianity would be saved." Luther must have especially loved the Gospel because he preached on it for many years from the pulpit of the parish church of Wittenberg.

Some of the most widely known and best-loved texts in the Word of God are from this Gospel— John 3:16: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life"; John 6:35: "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty"; John 10:11: "I am the good shepherd"; John 11:25: "I am the resurrection and the life"; John 15:1: "I am the true vine." There is the beloved fourteenth chapter: "Do not let your hearts be troubled. Trust in God; trust also in me. In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back, and take you to be with me that you may also be where I am. You know the way to the place where I am going. ...I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:1-4, 6).

Because of these and other passages, it is not surprising that the Gospel of John has been a source of blessing to untold generations of God's people. It has probably been the means by which more persons have come to know Jesus Christ as their Savior and Lord than any other single portion of Scripture.

A Unique Gospel

But the Gospel of John is merely one of four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John—all of which tell of the life of Jesus Christ on earth. So we need to ask: What makes this Gospel unique? What makes John different? As one begins to read it, he soon notices some very obvious differences. Because of their similarities, Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called the synoptic Gospels; the three look at the life of Christ from similar viewpoints and employ similar and, at times, even identical language. John stands apart.

In the first place, John omits many things that either one or more than one of the synoptic Gospels include. John gives no account of Christ's birth. There is no mention of his baptism, although John clearly presupposes a knowledge of Christ's baptism on the part of his readers. The institution of the Lord's Supper is not included. There is no ascension. What is perhaps most striking of all, there are no parables, those pithy sayings of Jesus that occupy such a prominent place in the other accounts of Christ's teachings.

At the same time John shows a detailed knowledge of things that the other Gospels omit. For instance, John reports on an early ministry of Jesus in Judea. He indicates that the duration of Christ's ministry was close to three years, not one year, which is the impression one gets from reading the synoptic Gospels. John alone speaks of the changing of the water into wine at Cana. He alone tells of Nicodemus, of the woman of Samaria, of the raising of Lazarus. Only in John do we find the great discourses spoken by Jesus to his own disciples during the final week in Jerusalem.

Johannine Scholarship

It is probably because John is so different (and so spiritual) that some scholars have attacked this book strongly. Otherwise, it seems strange that this Gospel, which has been such a blessing to Christian people, should become the outstanding example among the New Testament books of what a section of God's Word can suffer at the hands of the higher critics of the Scriptures. One would have thought that the historical accuracy and apostolic authorship of John would have been defended stoutly. But this has not been the case until recently. Instead there had been a generation of scholarship (not so many years ago) that thought that John was not at all reliable. In this period all but the most conservative scholars said that the Gospel must have been written at least 150 or even 200 years after Christ's death. Many placed it in a literary category of its own as being something very much like theological fiction.

Today this is no longer true. There has been a remarkable change in the scholarly climate surrounding John's Gospel, with the result that it is becoming increasingly inadequate to deny the Johannine authorship. A new claim is even being made for the reliability of the Gospel as history. Moreover, this claim has come about, not because the scholarly world itself is becoming more conservative but because the evidence for the reliability of John has simply overshadowed the most destructive of the academic theories. Thus today men of such academic stature as Oscar Cullmann of the University of Basel, Switzerland, and John A. T. Robinson of England argue that the Gospel may well embody the testimony of a genuine eyewitness, as it claims. And some, like the late Near Eastern archaeologist William F. Albright, are willing to date the book in the A.D. 60s, that is, within thirty or forty years of Christ's death and resurrection.

At this point someone may say, "What has produced such a turnabout in the ways these men view the Gospel?" It is a good question. The answers to it are significant.

First, many ancient manuscripts and parchments of John or parts of John have been discovered, and these have pushed back the dating of the book. For a long time, before the great harvest of archaeological discoveries in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the earliest copies of the fourth Gospel were from the fourth century, about A.D. 325 to 340. While this was much more impressive than any manuscript evidence for other ancient writings—for instance, the earliest manuscripts of Homer's verses were written about 2,000 years after his death— nevertheless, it gave scholars liberty enough to date John so late that it could not have been written by anyone who knew Jesus or even by anyone who could have known those who had known him.

The discovery of more ancient manuscripts has changed this. One ancient scrap of papyrus, which was originally found in Egypt as part of the wrapping of a mummy and is now part of the papyrus collection at the John Rylands Library in Manchester, England, alone destroys these theories. This piece of papyrus contains just a few verses of John 18 (vv. 31-34, 37, 38). But it dates from the first quarter of the second century—in other words, less than one hundred years after Christ—and thus shows that John's Gospel had been written early enough to have had a copy pass to Egypt to be used there and then to be discarded by the year A.D. 125. This is conclusive evidence for a fairly early dating of the Gospel.

The Dead Sea Scrolls

The second major factor in a reassessment of the dating and historical accuracy of John's Gospel has been the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. These were uncovered in 1947 and the years immediately following, but the impact of their discovery is continuing even now as the scrolls are being unrolled, assembled, translated, and published.

Before the scrolls were discovered, scholars evaluated the differences between John and the synoptic Gospels in a way that was highly unfavorable to John. For instance, they noticed the unique language of John's Gospel, with its contrasts between light and darkness, life and death, the world below and the world above, and so on. They noticed that the contrasts were generally lacking in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. "Well," they said, "it is obvious that the first three Gospels are Jewish and reflect a Jewish setting. But it is also obvious that John's work is not. John's Gospel must come from a Greek setting. Therefore, we must seek the origin of these unique terms not in the actual speech of Jesus of Nazareth but in Greek thought and particularly in Hellenistic Gnosticism."

Then the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered. These revealed a whole world of nonconformist
Judaism that had simply not been known to scholars previously. The home of the scrolls was Qumran, not far from Jerusalem, in the very area where John placed the earliest events of Christ's ministry. And what was most significant, the literature revealed the same use of the so-called Greek terms (logos, light, darkness, life, death) that are found in John's Gospel and actually provided a far closer parallel to them.

One scholar, A. M. Hunter of Aberdeen University in Scotland, writes of these discoveries: "The dualism which pervades the Johannine writings is of precisely the same kind as we discover in the Dead Sea Scrolls." John A. T. Robinson writes: "I detect a growing readiness to recognize that this [the historical background of John's gospel] is not to be sought at the end of the first century or the beginning of the second, in Ephesus or Alexandria, among the Gnostics or the Greeks. Rather, there is no compelling need to let our gaze wander very far, either in space or time, beyond a fairly limited area of southern Palestine in the fairly limited interval between the crucifixion and the fall of Jerusalem." He adds that the Dead Sea Scrolls "may really represent an actual background, and not merely a possible environment, for the distinctive categories of the Gospel."

Other Factors

The historical trustworthiness of John's Gospel is also supported by John's accurate knowledge of the geography of Palestine. This has been vindicated increasingly by archaeological discoveries.

To be sure, John mentions many places that are also mentioned by the synoptic Gospels, so critics could say that these were only known secondhand from their writings. For instance, John could hardly tell the story of Jesus without mentioning Bethsaida (1:44; 12:21), the praetorium (18:28, 33; 19:9), Bethany (11:18), and so on. But John also speaks accurately of Ephraim (11:54), Sychar (4:5, which is probably to be identified with Shechem at Tell Balatah), Solomon's Porch (10:23), the brook Kidron, which Jesus crossed to reach Gethsemane (18:1), and Bethany beyond Jordan, which John carefully distinguished from the other Bethany near Jerusalem (1:28). All of these places are now known, and John himself has again and again been demonstrated to be accurate.

Two archaeological discoveries are particularly interesting. In 5:2, John mentions a pool called Bethesda that, he says, had five porches. For years no one had even heard of this pool. What is more, since John's description made it sound like a pentagon, and since there had never been any pentagon-shaped pools in antiquity, the existence of this pool was thought by many New Testament scholars to be doubtful. Now, however, approximately fifty to seventy-five feet below the present level of the city of Jerusalem, archaeologists have uncovered a large rectangular pool surrounded by four covered colonnades and having an additional colonnade crossing it in the middle somewhat like a bridge. In other words, there was a pool with five porches, as John said. It is conclusive evidence of John's accurate knowledge of the city of Jerusalem as it was before its destruction by the Roman general Titus in AD 70.

The second archaeological discovery involves the probable identification of Aenon near Salim, which John mentions in 3:23, as having "plenty of water" in the Jordan valley. It was obviously the place where John the Baptist found adequate water for his baptizing.

These three lines of evidence—the evidence of the manuscripts, the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, and the knowledge of ancient geography—are also supported by other lines of discoveries. There has been an attempt to show that the author of the fourth Gospel (whoever he may have been) must have spoken in Aramaic because, according to those who are experts in this field, Aramaic idiom underlies John's Gospel. Careful study of the text has convinced other scholars that the material preserved by John may be as old as Pauline theology or the traditions preserved by the Synoptics. Thus, a better knowledge of the author of the fourth Gospel and his times has succeeded in pushing scholars away from the critical postures they once held, and has caused them to admit not only the possibility of apostolic authorship but to speak even more surely of an early and very reliable tradition that underlies and is in fact preserved in the writing of the Gospel.

John's Purpose

What does this have to do with a study of what is obviously a spiritual Gospel? Just this: John himself insists upon the reliability of the things about which he writes. Take 1 John 1:1, 3 as an example. There John writes, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at and our hands have touched—this we proclaim concerning the Word of life.... We proclaim to you what we have seen and heard that you also may have fellowship with us. And our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ." In other words, John says that he is writing to them about a person whom he has heard, seen, and touched. Hence, he is writing about something objectively true that will bear the brunt of historical investigation.

John sounds the same note in the Gospel: "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (John 20:30-31).

There are always people who will say that faith is something that must be entirely divorced from evidence. But that is not stated in the Bible. Faith is believing in something or someone on the basis of evidence and then acting upon it. In this case, John has provided evidence for the full deity of Jesus so that readers, whether in his age or ours, might believe it and commit their lives to Jesus as their Savior.

In John's Gospel we have an accurate record of things that were said and done in Palestine almost 2,000 years ago by a Jew named Jesus of Nazareth and that are presented to us as evidence for his extraordinary claims. If one will believe this and approach the record honestly with an open mind, God will use it to bring that person to fullness of faith in the Lord Jesus as God's Son and his Savior. This was John's purpose in writing his Gospel. It is my primary purpose in writing these studies.

What will happen in your case? It all depends on whether or not you open your mind to John's teaching. Sometime ago I was talking to a young man who was very critical of Christianity.

"Have you investigated the evidence?" I asked him.

"What do you mean? How does one do that?" he asked.

"Go home this week and begin to read John's Gospel," I answered. "But before you begin, take a moment to pray something like this: 'God, I do not know if you exist or, if you do, whether you hear me. But if you exist and if you hear me, I want you to know that I am an honest seeker after truth. If this Book of John can really speak to me and show me that Jesus is the Son of God and is God, I ask you to prove that to me while I read it. And if you prove it, then I will believe in him and serve him forever.'" I told him that if he did that, God would speak to him and that he would be convinced that all the things that are written about Jesus of Nazareth in this book are true and that he is the Son of God and our Savior.

The young man went home. I saw him a week later, and I asked, "Did you read the book?"

He answered, "Well, I have to admit that there are other things to which I give a higher priority." Here is another case. A Christian at the University of Pennsylvania entered into a series of Bible studies in John's Gospel with a young woman who was not a Christian. The two young women went through several chapters where Jesus is declared many times to be God, but none of it clicked with the non-Christian. Suddenly, in the midst of a study of the third chapter of John, and after many weeks of study, the inquiring non-Christian exclaimed, "Why, I see it! Jesus Christ is God! He is God." That was the turning point, and several weeks later she became a Christian.

That is what we are looking for in the following studies of John's Gospel. Moreover, as that happens, we will also look for a strengthening and encouraging of believers in the service of Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God and our Lord.

Chapter 2.
Jesus Christ Is God

John 1:1-2

What do you think of Jesus Christ? Who is he? According to Christianity this is the most important question you or anyone else will ever have to face. It is important because it is inescapable—you will have to answer it sooner or later, in this world or in the world to come—and because the quality of your life here and your eternal destiny depend upon your answer. Who is Jesus Christ? If he was only a man, then you can safely forget him. If he is God, as he claimed to be, and as all Christians believe, then you should yield your life to him. You should worship and serve him faithfully.

Four Gospels

If you are one who has never answered this question personally or if you have assumed (perhaps without much investigation) that Jesus was only a man, then the Gospel of John was written particularly for you. It was written for those who do not yet believe that Jesus Christ is God, to lead them to that conclusion.

I do not know which literary critic once said, "A novel without a purpose is like a life without a career. In order to be a story it must have something to say." But, whoever the author may have been, the statement itself is a correct one. What is more, it is as correct for biblical literature as it is for works by purely human authors. In one sense the Gospel of John has the same purpose as each of the other three Gospels—Matthew, Mark, and Luke. That is, John wishes to present to the reader the earthly life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, a Jew who was born under the reign of Herod the Great and who died when Pontius Pilate was the Roman procurator in Judea. In another sense, however, John has a purpose that is distinctly his own. That purpose is to show that Jesus Christ is God. That is his thesis.

To some extent, Matthew's Gospel portrays the Lord Jesus primarily as the Jewish Messiah. In fact, it is possible to argue that everything that goes into his account of Christ's life supports that theme. Mark's purpose is to reveal Jesus Christ as God's servant. Luke deals with Christ's humanity. John, however, reveals Jesus as the eternal, preexisting Son of God who became man in order to reveal the Father and to bring men access into eternal life through his historical death and literal resurrection. How do we know that? We know it because John says so. He writes, "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (John 20:30-31).

Arthur W. Pink, one of the great students of this Gospel, has written, "In this book we are shown that the one who was heralded by the angels to the Bethlehem shepherds, who walked this earth for thirty-three years, who was crucified at Calvary, who rose in triumph from the grave, and who forty days later departed from these scenes, was none other than the Lord of Glory. The evidence for this is overwhelming, the proofs almost without number, and the effect of contemplating them must be to bow our hearts in worship before 'the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ' (Titus 2:13)."

John's Thesis

It is not surprising, therefore, when we turn from the end of John's Gospel to the beginning, that we find John presenting there the thesis that Jesus Christ is God.

I think that John would have done very well in one of our universities today. When you write a paper in a university the best way to do it—although you can be more subtle than this—is to say in your opening paragraph what it is that you are setting out to prove, then prove it, and when you get to the end, sum it all up and say, "See, I did it. It's just what I said I would do at the beginning." That is exactly what John does. He starts out in the first two verses stating that Jesus Christ is God. He proves it in twenty-one chapters. Then, when he gets to the end he says that the things written in his book were written so that you and I, his readers, might know that Jesus Christ is God and that we might believe on him.

At the beginning he says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning" (John 1:1, 2). We know from verse 14 that the Word is Jesus, for in that verse John says that "the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us." Thus, we find John to be saying that Jesus existed from the beginning, that he was with God in the beginning, and that he was God. In other words, the opening verses of the Gospel contain a full statement of Christ's divinity.

These verses teach three things about the divinity of Jesus Christ.

The first statement is that Jesus existed "in the beginning." In other words, Jesus was preexistent. He was "before" all things. There are several ways in which the phrase "in the beginning" is used in the Bible. In 1 John it is used of the beginning of Christ's earthly ministry. John writes, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at and our hands have touched—this we proclaim concerning the Word of life" (1 John 1:1). In the first verse of the Book of Genesis the phrase is used of the beginning of creation: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The use of the phrase in John's Gospel goes beyond even that, however, for John says that when you begin to talk about Jesus Christ you can do so properly only when you go back beyond his earthly life—back beyond the beginnings of creation—into eternity. That is where Jesus Christ was.

Moreover, this is found wherever the Bible speaks in detail about Christ's person. The author of the Book of Hebrews looks back to the beginning when he says, "In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, and through whom he made the universe" (Heb. 1:1-2). The Book of Revelation reveals Jesus to be the "Alpha and Omega ... the First and the Last" (Rev. 1:8, 17). Paul writes that before Jesus became man he was "in very nature God" and had "equality with God" (Phil. 2:6). These statements all point to the preexistence of Jesus as one important aspect of his divinity.

The second statement is that Jesus Christ was with God. This is an affirmation of Christ's separate personality, and it is a very subtle statement. John wishes to say, and indeed he does say, that Jesus is fully God. He reports Jesus as saying, "anyone who has seen me has seen the Father" (John 14:9). But John is aware also that the Trinity is involved here, that there is a diversity within the Godhead. Thus he also expresses this truth in his statement.

The final phrase is a declaration that Jesus is fully divine, for John says, "and the Word was God," or literally, "and God was the Word." This means that everything that can be said about God the Father can be said about God the Son. In Jesus dwells all the wisdom, glory, power, love, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth of the Father. In him, God the Father is known. John then sums up his teaching by saying, "He was with God in the beginning"

(v. 2). With these words the highly emphatic and unequivocal statement of the full divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ is ended.

Knowledge of God

At this point we need some practical applications. What does it matter to say that Jesus Christ is God?

First, to say that Jesus Christ is God is to say that we can now know the truth about God. We can know what he is like. The counterpart to this statement is that apart from Jesus Christ we really cannot know him. Is God the god of Plato's imagination? We do not know. Is he the god of Immanuel Kant, the German philosopher? Is he the god of other philosophers? Is he the god of the mystics? The answer is that apart from Jesus Christ we do not know what God is like. But if Jesus Christ is God, then we do know, because to know the Lord Jesus Christ is to know God. There is no knowledge of God apart from a knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, and there is no knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ apart from a knowledge of the Bible.

One of the saddest stories in the Word of God concerns this theme. It is in John's Gospel. Toward the end of his ministry, Jesus explained carefully that he was going away from the disciples but that he was going to prepare a place for them and would one day return. The disciples were depressed at the thought of his leaving them. He went on to say that if they had really known him, they would have known the Father. At this point Philip, who was one of the disciples asked him, "Lord, show us the Father and that will be enough for us" (John 14:8). In other words, Philip was saying, "If I could just see God, I would be satisfied." How sad! The disciples had been with Jesus for almost three years and now were nearing the end of his ministry. Still they had not fully recognized that Jesus is God and that they were coming to know God through him. Jesus then had to answer by saying, "Don't you know me, Philip, even after I have been among you such a long time? Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father. How can you say, 'Show us the Father'?" (v. 9).

If you want to know what God is like, study the life of Jesus Christ. Read the Bible! The things recorded there of Jesus Christ are true. What is more, if you read them, you will find that the Holy Spirit of God, who is the Spirit of truth, will interpret and explain them to you.

Always Like Jesus

The second practical application of the truth that Jesus Christ is God is that God was always like Jesus. William Barclay, who knew this truth, writes, "If the Word was with God before time began, if God's Word is part of the eternal scheme of things, it means that God was always like Jesus. Sometimes we tend to think of God as just and holy and stern and avenging; and we tend to think that something that Jesus did changed God's anger into love, and altered God's attitude to men. The New Testament knows nothing of that idea. The whole New Testament tells us, and this passage of John especially tells us, that God has always been like Jesus."

Does Jesus Christ hate sin? Yes! So God has always hated sin also. Does Jesus Christ love the sinner? Yes! Therefore, God loves him also. Barclay says, "What Jesus did was to open a window in time that we might see the eternal and unchanging love of God." In fact, God so hates sin and so loves the sinner that in eternity he planned the way in which he would redeem the race. We read the Old Testament and we find God saying, "There must be an atonement for sin." We read the accounts of Christ's life and death, and we find God saying, "There is the atonement for sin." We come to our time and as the Word of God is preached we find God speaking to our hearts and saying, 'That was the atonement for sin. Believe it and be saved." God has always been like Jesus.

An Acceptable Sacrifice

Third, the truth that Jesus Christ is God means that his death on the cross was significant. It means that in this way he himself became the one sufficient and acceptable sacrifice for man's sin. If you or I were to be so foolish as to make a statement that we would die for another man's sins and then were somehow to lose our lives, in terms of sin our death would mean nothing. We are sinners. If we were to die for sin, or pretend to do it, the only sin we could die for would be our own. But Jesus had no sin. Being God, he is sinless. Hence, when he died, he died for the sins of others, in their place; he removed forever the burden of sin from those who believe on him.

Finally, because Jesus Christ is God, it means that he is able to satisfy all the needs of your heart. God is infinite. Jesus is also infinite. Therefore he is able to satisfy you out of that inexhaustible immensity.

There is a story that illustrates this truth. Do you remember the verses in Ephesians in which Paul prays that the Christians to whom he is writing might "have power, together with all the saints, to grasp how wide and long and high and deep is the love of Christ, and to know this love that surpasses knowledge—that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God" (Eph. 3:18-19)? These verses speak of the four dimensions of God's love—breadth, length, depth, and height—and they say that out of that fullness God is able to satisfy the one who comes to him. During the Napoleonic period in Europe some of the emperor's soldiers opened a prison that had been used by the Spanish Inquisition. There were many dungeons in the prison, but in one of them the soldiers found something particularly interesting. They found the remains of a prisoner, the flesh and clothing all long since gone and only an ankle bone in a chain to tell his story. On the wall, however, carved into the stone with some sharp piece of metal, there was a crude cross. And around the cross were the Spanish words for the four dimensions of Ephesians 3:18-19.
Above was the word "height." Below was the word "depth." On one side there was the word "breadth." On the other there was the word "length." Clearly, as this poor, persecuted soul was lying in chains and was dying, he comforted himself with the thought that God who in himself contains the breadth, length, depth, and height of all things was able to satisfy him fully. He is able to satisfy you fully whatever your need or your longing.

"Who Is This?"

This is John's thesis. We are going to see the evidence for it as we go on in these studies. But even here we must raise the question with which we began and which is above all questions: What do you think of Jesus Christ? Who is he?

This was the question that was raised all through Christ's earthly ministry. When Jesus rode into the city of Jerusalem on a donkey on what we call Palm Sunday the people turned to one another and asked, "Who is this?" (Matt. 21:10). The disciples asked the question after Jesus had stilled the storm on the Lake of Galilee: "Who is this? Even the wind and the waves obey him!" (Mark 4:41). Herod asked, "I beheaded John. Who, then, is this I hear such things about?" (Luke 9:9). When Jesus forgave the sins of the paralytic, the scribes and Pharisees asked themselves, "Who is this fellow who speaks blasphemy? Who can forgive sins but God alone?" (Luke 5:21).

This is the question. Is Jesus only a man? If he is, you can afford to forget him. Or is he God? If he is God, then he demands your belief and your total allegiance. Do you believe that Jesus is God? You should be able to say with doubting Thomas, in the story that is really the spiritual climax of the fourth Gospel, "My Lord and my God." To draw back from making that confession is to perish. To believe it is to enter into eternal life.

Chapter 3.
Jesus Christ Is Man

John 1:1, 14

The last study looked at the first two verses of John's Gospel, the verses that declare so unequivocably that Jesus is God. We now want to skip ahead to the verse that goes with them and that says in equally certain terms that Jesus is man. That verse is John 1:14. 'The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth." Jesus is God. Jesus is man. Properly understood, these are the two most important truths to be made about Christ's person.

A Biblical Doctrine

It is not only in John's Gospel that we encounter such teaching, of course. These themes are found throughout Scripture. What is more, although they are very profound they are taught in the most natural way and in a totally artless manner.

Take the three places where God the Father describes the Son's nature by means of two complementary verbs. In the Old Testament prophecy of Isaiah, in a verse that is always much quoted at Christmastime, we read, "For to us a child is born, to us a son is given, and the government will be on his shoulders. And he will be called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9:6). This verse teaches that the Messiah was to be One who was always God's Son but who would become man at a particular point in history. Hence, as a child he is born, but as a Son he is given. In Romans 1:3-4 the same teaching occurs. There the apostle Paul writes, "... regarding his Son, who as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead. "Jesus was made the seed of David, according to the flesh. But he was declared always to have been God's Son. Finally, in Galatians 4:4-5 we read, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons." As a son, Jesus Christ was sent. Hence, he was always God. Nevertheless, he was made under the law. He became man. The Bible is never hesitant to put the twin truths of the full deity and the true humanity of Jesus Christ together.

What we have taught didactically in these verses is also taught by illustration in various events in Christ's ministry. For instance, in the next chapter of John's Gospel we find the Lord Jesus Christ at a wedding (John 2:1-11). Few things could be more truly human than that. Yet, when the wine is exhausted and the family about to be embarrassed, Jesus makes new and better wine of the water that had been standing around in the great stone water-pots that were used for the Jewish washings and purifications. Nothing in the whole chapter is more clearly divine.

On another occasion the disciples were crossing the Sea of Galilee from Capernaum to the land of the Gadarenes while Jesus, who was exhausted from the day's activities, was asleep in the boat. A storm arose that was so intense it frightened even these seasoned fishermen. They awoke Jesus, saying, "Lord, save us! We're going to drown!" And Jesus stilled the storm. What could be more human than our Lord's total exhaustion in the boat? But what could be more divine than his stilling of the winds and waves, so that the disciples came to worship him saying, "What kind of man is this? Even the winds and the waves obey him!" (Matt. 8:23-27)? The same twofold nature of the Lord Jesus Christ is illustrated throughout the Gospels right down to the accounts of his death and resurrection. Nothing could be more human than his death by crucifixion. Nothing could be more divine than the darkening of the sky, the tearing of the veil of the temple, the opening of the graves of the saints buried near Jerusalem, and the final triumphant rending of the tomb on that first Easter morning.

We must not make the mistake of thinking of Jesus as being merely a divine man or, on the other hand, of being merely a human God. Jesus is the God-man; and this means that he is fully and uniquely God as well as being perfectly man. He is God with us, God for us, God in us. As man he is the One who has experienced all the trials, joys, sufferings, losses, gains, temptations, and vicissitudes of this life. All this is involved in these two important verses of John 1.

Able to Die

Why are these truths important? Or, more particularly, since we discussed the divinity of Jesus Christ in our previous study, why is the humanity of Jesus Christ important? There are several reasons.

First, the incarnation made it possible for Jesus Christ to die. This is easy to see. It is what the author of Hebrews is thinking of when he writes, "Because it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins. Therefore, when Christ came into the world, he said: 'Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me; with burnt offerings and sin offerings you were not pleased. Then I said, "Here I am—it is written about me in the scroll—I have come to do your will, O God"'" (Heb. 10:4-7). A body made it possible for Jesus Christ to die.

It is always difficult to find an adequate illustration of the incarnation itself. But it is not so hard to find an illustration of this aspect of it. A body was the vehicle of Christ's earthly ministry. Take a man who is called by God to do medical missionary work in a distant corner of Africa. His person and his willingness are one thing. But his training is another. Thus, the man will submit to years of training, gaining medical knowledge and at times even a bit of seminary training, so that to his person and original intention he adds that which is necessary for him to do the work. It is exactly what Jesus Christ did. In the beginning, in the eternal counsels of God, before there was a world or a lost race of men, Jesus foresaw all human history and knew that he was to redeem the race. Thus, in the fullness of time, in the days of Herod, he assumed a body so that he could offer up that body as the perfect sacrifice for man's sin.

This is what we find throughout Scripture. The very name "Jesus" looks forward to an act of saving significance. For the angel said of Mary, "She will give birth to a son, and you are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). Jesus himself spoke of the suffering that was to come (Mark 8:31; 9:31), linking the success of his mission to the crucifixion: "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself (John 12:32). At several places in John's Gospel the crucifixion is spoken of as that vital "time" for which Christ came and to which his ministry inflexibly proceeded (John 2:4; 7:30; 8:20; 13:1; 17:1).

Moreover, the death of Jesus is in a real sense the theme of the Old Testament also. The Old Testament sacrifices prefigure Christ's suffering, and the prophets explicitly foretell it. Paul teaches that Abraham was saved by faith in Christ (Gal. 3:8, 16). Jesus taught the downcast Emmaus disciples that the Old Testament foretold his death and resurrection: "And beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself (Luke 24:27). In the light of these texts it is not wrong to say that the most important reason for the incarnation of Jesus is that it made it possible for him to die. This death was the focal point of world and biblical history.

Able to Understand

There is also a second reason why it was important for the eternal Son of God to become man. The fact that Jesus Christ took upon himself all that men are and know and experience also made it possible for him to be touched with the feelings of our infirmities, as the author of Hebrews says. "For we do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but we have one who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin. Let us then approach the throne of grace with confidence, so that we may receive mercy and find grace to help us in our time of need" (Heb. 4:15-16). Jesus knew and experienced (in a way that we can understand) what it meant to be man.

J. B. Phillips, the translator who stands behind one of the modern paraphrases of the New Testament and some of the Old Testament books, tells how he was impressed with the deeply human nature of Christ's sufferings as he went about his task of translating the Gospels. He says, "The record of the behaviour of Jesus on the way to the cross and of the crucifixion itself is almost unbearable, chiefly because it is so intensely human. If, as I believe, this was indeed God focused in a human being, we can see for ourselves that here is no play acting; this is the real thing. There are no supernatural advantages for this man. No celestial rescue party delivered Him from the power of evil men, and His agony was not mitigated by any superhuman anaesthetic. We can only guess what frightful anguish of mind and spirit wrung from him the terrible words 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' But the cry 'It is finished!' cannot be one of despair. It does not even mean 'It is all over.' It means 'It has been completed'—and the terrifying task of doing God's will to the bitter end had been fully and finally accomplished."

It is this suffering that enables us to know that Jesus experienced all that we experience—the weariness, disappointments, misunderstandings, and the pain of this life—and so is able to understand and help all those who are his own and are so tempted.

Our Example

Third, by becoming man Jesus has also provided us with an example of how the life that is fully pleasing to the Father should be lived. Being what we are, this is most important.

I often have been asked by people who are concerned with the state of the church today why it is that so many of the young men who go to seminary (even a good seminary, for that matter) come out of it without much of a message and without much of an ability to lead the churches they eventually serve. This is good questioning. As I have thought about it, I have come to feel that one of the main reasons is that they lack an adequate example of what the Christian ministry can be. They have never had contact with a strong church or with an intelligent preaching ministry that is Bible-centered and faithful to the great themes of the gospel. So, lacking an example, they wander about in their approach and fail to provide strong leadership.

Now, what is true for the ministry is true for other fields also—business, law, medicine, scholarship, and so on—and it is true spiritually. Thus, Jesus became man in order to go through all sorts of situations with all sorts of people in order that we might be provided with a pattern upon which our Christian life can be constructed.

Do you remember ever having seen a sampler? I mean those patterns of needlework containing the alphabet by which children of a generation or two ago used to learn to read and write. That is what Christ is for us. He is our sampler, our example. We are to pattern our attempts to write out the Christian life on him. I find it interesting that Peter uses the word for "sampler" or "copybook" when he says, "To this you were called, because Christ suffered for you, leaving you an example, that you should follow in his steps" (1 Peter 2:21). In other words, by means of Jesus Christ's becoming man God wrote the characters of love and righteousness large so that we by his grace might copy them.

The Value of Life

The fourth reason why the incarnation was important is that through it God sanctified the value of human life in a way that had not been done previously. Before the coming of Jesus Christ, life in the ancient world was cheap; and it seems that, with the departure from biblical values and biblical principles that we see about us, life is becoming increasingly cheap today.

What makes life cheap? War makes it cheap. There is plenty of war today. The continuing reports of battle deaths numb us as to the destiny of the individual. The same thing is true of traffic deaths or deaths as the result of crime. Moreover, I personally believe that the laws that have legalized abortion have also had this effect and will have it increasingly in years ahead.

What will offset this cheapening of human life? Only the values that Christianity brings! Christianity values life, first, because God gave it and, second, because the Lord Jesus Christ sanctified it by assuming a full human nature by means of the incarnation. Jesus Christ became like you.

Does that mean anything to you personally? It should make you thankful. It should lead you to bow down before the Lord Jesus Christ and worship him deeply as your Savior. Martin Luther was a great expositor of John's Gospel, as I mentioned in the opening chapter, and at this point in his commentary he tells a story from folklore that illustrates this principle. He says that there was once a stubborn and unspiritual man—Luther called him "a coarse and brutal lout"—who showed absolutely no reverence for any of the great truths of Christianity. When the words "And was made man" were sung in church, this man neither crossed himself nor removed his hat, both of which were common practice in the Roman church of that day. When the creeds were recited the man would not kneel. Luther says, "Then the devil stepped up to him and hit him so hard it made his head spin. He [the devil] cursed him gruesomely and said: 'May hell consume you. ...If God had become an angel like me and the congregation sang: "God was made an angel," I would bend not only my knees but my whole body to the ground! ...And you vile human creature, you stand there like a stick or a stone. You hear that God did not become an angel but a man like you, and you just stand there like a stick of wood!' " The story is fictional, of course. Yet it does make the point. Apart from the grace of God we all stand before the most tremendous truths of God's Word as impervious blocks of stone. Yet we should respond to them.

Do we respond? Do you? You should lift up your heart and also your voice in praise of a God who can come from the infinite distance and glories of heaven down to a world such as ours in order that he might redeem us and lead us back to himself. The incarnation is the second greatest truth in the Bible. The greatest is that this God who became man could also love us enough to go to the cross and die for us personally.

Chapter 4.
God Has Spoken

John 1:1-3

Toward the end of his short but valuable book, The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought,
Professor John Baillie of Edinburgh University, Scotland, tells of a complaint he once received about Christianity. The man making the complaint was a legal representative of one of the American universities. He said, "You speak of trusting God, of praying to him, and doing his will. But it's all so one-sided. We speak to God, we bow down before him and lift up our hearts to him. But he never speaks to us. He makes no sign."

The man who spoke these words was wrong in his viewpoint, of course, as true Christians know and as Professor Baillie points out. Still he was speaking for millions of people who would like to have a sure word from God but who have not heard it and doubt that God has spoken. God has spoken, but they have not heard him. Thus, they consider the heavens to be silent and God to be unconcerned.

The problem would not be so bad from man's viewpoint if he were not curious. But men are curious. They want to know. A man begins to hunt out knowledge as a child, examining his surroundings. As he grows older his surroundings grow larger, but still he retains his curiosity. Some men devise theories to explain the phenomena that they and others have observed. Some devise myths or philosophies or make scientific statements to explain the workings of the natural world. Some observe the sky by eyesight; others build telescopes. Still others send space probes to investigate what even their best telescopes are unable to reveal to them. Man is always exploring, questioning, trying to understand. He never grows out of the child's questioning "Why?"
It is the same in the spiritual life. Man has always wanted to know about God and to understand his purposes with men. The universality and diversity of the world's religions prove this. But when we turn our minds to God, apart from God's self-revelation, our minds are baffled. We can devise theories, but in the realm of metaphysics there is no data on which to operate. Men see effects, but they cannot see the cause. They see natural phenomena, but they cannot observe the phenomena of the spiritual world. The Reformers observed this and were led to speak of the deus absconditus, the hidden God. They knew that man is finite and sinful and that no exercise of will, no stretching of his mind will lift him up the towering ladder of understanding to explore the mind of God.

The Bible also recognizes this. One of Job's comforters asks, "Can you fathom the mysteries of God? Can you probe the limits of the Almighty?" (Job 11:7). The answer is that this is impossible. Thus, men would forever remain in ignorance, were God not to take steps to disclose himself to man. A motion picture by Ingmar Bergman of Sweden speaks about half of this problem. It is called The Silence. It portrays the plight of three characters who do not hear the voice of God and who believe that God is silent. The truth, however, is that God is not silent. God has spoken. And he has spoken in terms that are perfectly clear and that, therefore, remove all human excuses for failing to know and worship him.

The Logos

This leads to a study of one of the most important words in the opening chapter of John's Gospel.
We have already mentioned it several times in the preceding studies. In English it is the word "word" itself. In Greek it is the word logos. It occurs in verses 1 and 14. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. ...The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us." This term refers to Jesus Christ, for he is the one who became flesh and dwelt among men. Still we must ask (and indeed biblical scholars have been asking ever since the Gospel was written), why is Jesus Christ called "The Word"? What is the significance of this title? The answer has to do with God's revealing of himself.

To understand this term, we need to ask what meaning it would have had for those to whom the Gospel of John was first written. For instance, what meaning would it have had for a person of Jewish background who was just beginning to hear and understand the gospel?

The first verses of this Gospel, including the term "Word," would refer a Jewish person to the first words of the Book of Genesis where we are told that in the beginning God spoke and all things came into being. In other words, to the Jewish mind Jesus would somehow be associated with the creative power of God and with the self-disclosure of God in creation. We can get a feeling for what this would have meant to a Jew by imagining ourselves to be reading a book that began "When in the course of human events" and included the words "self-evident" and "inalienable rights." Clearly the author would be trying to remind us of the Declaration of Independence and of the founding principles of the American republic.

We need to add to this, however, that the idea of "word" would also have meant more to a Jewish mind than it does to us today. To the Jew a word was something concrete, something much closer to what we would call an event or a deed. A word spoken was a deed done. This way of thinking resulted from the Jew's Old Testament theology. What happens when God speaks? The answer is that the thing is instantly done. God said, "Let there be light," and there was light (Gen. 1:3). God said, "So is my word that goes out from my mouth: It will not return to me empty, but will accomplish what I desire and achieve the purpose for which I sent it" (Isa. 55:11). Thus, the Jew would be somewhat prepared for the thought that the Word of God could somehow be seen and touched as well as heard and that the "Word" might somehow find expression in a life. It would not be entirely strange for a Jew to learn, as the author of Hebrews puts it, that "In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son" (Heb. 1:1-2).

In a very brief way, then, we have seen what the description of Jesus Christ as the "Word" might have meant to a Jew. But we must remember that the Jews were not the only ones who would be reading John's Gospel. The Gospel would also be read by Greeks and by those who spoke Greek and were influenced by Greek thought. What would the word logos mean to them?

For the Greeks, the answer to this question is found, not in religion but in philosophy. Almost 2,600 years ago, in the sixth century B.C., a philosopher by the name of Heraclitus lived in Ephesus. He was the man who said that it is impossible to step into the same river twice. He meant that all of life is in a state of change. Thus, although you step into the river once, step out, and then step in a second time, by the time you have taken the second step the water has flowed on and it is a different river. To Heraclitus, and to the philosophers who followed him, all of life seemed like that. But, they asked, "If that be so, how is it that everything that exists is not in a state of perpetual chaos?" Heraclitus answered that life is not a chaos because the change that we see is not mere random change. It is ordered change. And this means that there must be a divine "reason" or "word" that controls it. This is the logos, the word that John uses in the opening verse of his Gospel.

However the logos also meant more than this to Heraclitus. For once he had discovered, as he thought, that the controlling principle of matter was God's logos, then it was only a small step for him to apply it also to all the events of history and to the mental order that rules in the minds of men. For Heraclitus, then, the Logos became nothing less than the mind of God controlling this world and all men.

By the time John came to write his Gospel, the age of Heraclitus was nearly seven hundred years in the past. But the ideas of Heraclitus had been so formative for Greek thought that they had survived, not only in his own philosophy but also in the philosophy of Plato and Socrates, the Stoics, and others who had built upon it. They were discussed by many persons much as we discuss the atomic theory or evolution today. The Greeks knew all about the Logos. Therefore, it was with a stroke of divine genius that John seized upon this word, one that was as meaningful to the Greeks as it was to the Jewish people, and said by means of it, "Listen, you Greeks, the very thing that has most occupied your philosophical thought and about which you have all been writing for centuries—the Logos of God, this word, this controlling power of the universe and of man's mind—this has come to earth as a man and we have seen him."

Plato, we are told, once turned to that little group of philosophers and students that had gathered around him during the Greek Golden Age in Athens and said to his followers, "It may be that some day there will come forth from God a Word, a Logos, who will reveal all mysteries and make everything plain." Now John is saying, "Yes, Plato, and the Logos has come; now God is revealed to us perfectly."

Do you believe it? John is declaring that the unknown God of the Greeks, the hidden God of the Middle Ages, the silent God of the twentieth century, is neither unknown, hidden, nor silent. He is fully revealed in Jesus. "It is true that no one has ever seen God at any time. Yet the divine and only Son, Who lives in the closest intimacy with the Father, has made Him known" (John 1:18 PHILLIPS).

A Previous Revelation

This is a natural stopping point for our study, of course, but we cannot really stop here. For the point John is making is not only that Jesus is the revelation of God, but that Jesus was always active in revealing God. Hence, even before the incarnation, there was no excuse for failing to believe.

This is seen first of all in the emphasis John places upon Christ's role in creation. Creation reveals God, and Jesus was God's agent in creation. Thus, John can say, "Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made" (v. 3). What has God revealed about himself in creation? Paul answers by saying, "For since the creation of the world God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made, so that men are without excuse" (Rom. 1:20). This means that when Jesus Christ began by revealing God in creation he revealed him in two important aspects—his existence and his power—and that these are sufficient to condemn all men for their failure to bow down and worship him.

We know the force of this verse from things in our own experience. When we see a leaf blowing down the street, we do not attribute powers of self-motivation to the leaf. We assume that a power equal to the effect is behind the leaf and has put it in motion. We call that power wind. When we examine a watch of fine Swiss workmanship, we do not assume that the steel and glass and small bearings possess the ability of organizing themselves into a watch. We posit the existence of a watchmaker. So it should be in the realm of nature. Jesus intended that we should recognize God's existence and power through nature.

But nature is not enough. For one thing, no one has ever come to an obedient faith in the God of creation through nature. For another, the revelation of God in nature is not specific in terms of God's plans, and it is not personal. Hence, Jesus Christ was also active in revealing God through Scripture. It may be true that God has revealed his existence and his power in nature, but it is equally true that this is all he has revealed there. Men may recognize the power of God, but if they would know his plans, they must consult the Bible.

You will remember that when the apostle Paul preached the gospel to the men of Athens, he preached to men who had the knowledge of God through nature but did not know who he was. An altar in Athens was inscribed, "To the unknown God." Other altars that have been discovered since are even more indefinite; they say, "To whomever it may concern." How wonderful that this form of address need never be made by anyone. For Paul, who was instructed in the Scriptures and knew the God whom the Greeks worshiped ignorantly, proclaimed, "Now what you worship as something unknown I am going to proclaim to you" (Acts 17:23). He went on to show that God, the creator of the world, was no blind deity, to be worshiped blindly, but a personal God who has willed that all men should live in harmony with one another and come to know and worship him. "In the past God overlooked such ignorance, but now he commands all people everywhere to repent" (v. 30).

The First and the Last

Preeminently, however, Jesus has revealed God through the incarnation, and it is there that God is known personally. God has spoken to men indirectly through his creation and directly through the Scriptures, but there is a more wonderful truth than this. God has spoken to man personally through Jesus Christ. Jesus is his best and greatest word to lost men. If we know God's power in creation and his plans in the Scriptures, we know his personality in the Son. As we look to Jesus we see God himself. "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father." We discover a God of infinite love and perfect holiness, possessing a desire wonderful enough and a power adequate enough to save rebellious men and women from sin.

Do you believe that? Have you found the fullness of God's glory in Jesus? If you have not yet found it, let me caution you that Jesus is not only the first and most important and all-inclusive word of the Father, he is also God's last word. You will not find God apart from him. If you do not receive him, the last word you will hear from him will be the word of your judgment. Jesus said, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End" (Rev. 22:13). He will either say, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world" (Matt. 25:34), or he will declare, "I never knew you. Away from me, you evildoers!" (Matt. 7:23).

Chapter 5.
Jesus Christ Is Life

John 1:4

In this verse John introduces two of the greatest themes of his narrative. Often at the beginning of an important work of literature or music, a writer or composer will declare a theme and then allow it to recur again and again throughout the book or composition. This is sometimes done through a visual image, as in a Hardy novel. Sometimes it is through a musical motif, as in a Beethoven symphony. Sometimes it is done by means of a word or a concept, as we have here. John's themes are "light" and "life." And they occur in such a variety of contexts and so frequently that we need to take some time to examine them at the outset.

In this study we will look at the claim that Jesus is the life of the world. In the next study we will look at the claim that he is the light.

A Prominent Theme

It is quite obvious to any careful reader of the Gospel that the word "life" is an important one, for John speaks often of life in connection with Jesus Christ and of the eternal life that he offered and, indeed, still offers to men and women.

To some extent the Gospel begins and ends with this theme. John begins by declaring, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men" (1:4). In 20:30-31, he concludes," Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name." In John 14:6 Jesus declares that he is the source of life: "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me." John 5:40 shows that men will not come to him that they might have life. In John 10:28 Jesus says of those who do come, "I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand." John 10:10 says, "The thief comes only to steal and kill and destroy; I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full." In all, the word "life" occurs more than thirty-five times in the Gospel. And the related verb "to live" increases that total by at least fifteen more instances.

Physical Life

But what does it mean to say that Jesus is the source of life or that he is the life? The first answer to that question is one that takes us back to the opening pages of the Book of Genesis and therefore to the role of the Lord Jesus Christ in giving life to all living things in the world. We have already seen in our previous studies that the writer intends a reference to the first chapters of Genesis in his introductory verses; this is also the case here. "In the beginning" (v. 1) reminds us of the sentence: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). The Logos or "Word" of God reminds us of the way in which God spoke in creation: "And God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light" (Gen. 1:3). In the same way, when John says of the Lord Jesus Christ, "Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made. In him was life" (John 1:3, 4), every Bible student should think instantly of the life that went forth out of God to bring life to inanimate matter at the beginning of the creation of the world. In other words, John is saying that our physical life comes from God through the Lord Jesus.

This is suggested in the early chapters of Genesis. For we read that "the LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being" (Gen. 2:7).

All the terms in this verse from Genesis are important. In the first place, we are told that God formed man of the dust of the earth. Once, in a message on Christ's statement that we are the salt of the earth, I pointed out that when God does a work in human history he uses common substances or common people so that the glory might be to his name and not to man's. We see this in his choice of Abraham, Moses, David, the prophets, Mary and Joseph, John the Baptist, and the disciples to do certain things. We have it stated in 1 Corinthians 1:26-29, "Brothers, think of what you were when you were called. Not many of you were wise by human standards; not many were influential; not many were of noble birth. But God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise... so that no one may boast before him." We have the same principle in the opening chapters of the Bible.

When God formed man, what did he use? Did he use gold, silver, iron, uranium, platinum? No, he used dust—a common substance. But he breathed into it the breath of his life. Thus, even though we may be "fearfully and wonderfully made," as the psalmist says (Ps. 139:14), nevertheless, the glory is God's and there is nothing in us about which man can boast. "So low is the dust," writes Donald Grey Barnhouse in Genesis, "that God gave it to the serpent for the food of his curse. Job uses the word twenty times to describe the littleness of man in his misery. It is to dust that all bodies return in death. But we can look up to the Lord in confidence because 'he knows our frame and he remembers that we are dust' (Ps. 103:14, RSV)." The writer then adds, "Dust that exalts itself is hateful, but dust that acknowledges its dustiness finds favor in the sight of the Lord."

There is a lesson for us in the dust; but we must stop our examination of the verse at this point, because for our present exposition of John 1:4 the important term in Genesis 2:7 is "breath." It is the breath of God that makes the dust live.

What is God's breath? It is that which goes forth out of his mouth. It is his Spirit, the Holy Spirit, and it is associated with his spoken word. When we speak about these three terms in English— breath, Spirit, and word—they seem to be unrelated. But this is not true in the Hebrew language. In Hebrew the same word that is used for Spirit is also used for "breath." It is the word ruach, which even has a breathy sound. And what is more significant, in Hebrew thought the breath of God or the breath of a man is associated with the person's spoken words. For a man speaks, as we know, by means of it. When we put these ideas together, we find that God brought forth life in man by speaking the word of life (which John has already identified with Jesus Christ) in such a way that the Spirit of life (which is his Holy Spirit) passes into man and causes him to breathe. In other words, these terms provide an illustration of the role of each member of the Trinity in creation.

The significance of man's created nature is seen most clearly when he is contrasted with the Lord Jesus Christ. In the great resurrection chapter, 1 Corinthians 15, there is a verse toward the end that says, ""The first man Adam became a living being'; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit" (v. 45). In other words, even though we live by the breath of God, we do so only by inhaling. Christ lives by exhaling. Thus, we know that we are his creatures and that he is the Creator.

Spiritual Life

However, this is only the beginning of our understanding of what John intends by the use of the word "life" in the Gospel. He is speaking of Christ's role in creation, in one sense. But this is only the groundwork for the spiritual interpretation of the word that he unfolds in the pages of the Gospel. It is true that John speaks of physical life here, but as the book goes on he speaks increasingly of spiritual life. And the point is that just as Jesus is the source of physical life, so is he the source of the spiritual life that we receive when we believe on him.

To appreciate the importance of the gift of spiritual life, we must realize first that apart from it we are dead spiritually. Or you might say, we are as unresponsive to God as was the dust of the earth before God breathed his Spirit into it.

We can say this, of course, because God says it. Take the verses from the second chapter of Ephesians for an example. Here Paul writes to the Christians at Ephesus, reminding them that before God made them alive they were totally dead in everything spiritual and were in rebellion against him. "As for you, you were dead in your transgressions and sins, in which you used to live when you followed the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air, the spirit who is now at work in those who are disobedient. All of us also lived among them at one time, gratifying the cravings of our sinful nature and following its desires and thoughts. Like the rest, we were by nature objects of wrath. But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. And God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:1-6).

What a past is described in these verses! And what a condition! In our natural state we can do nothing to improve ourselves spiritually. Apart from Christ no man has ever breathed one breath toward God, nor had one spiritual heartbeat. Man is dead in sin. He needs a new life. That is why we must be born again. Being born again means receiving a new life from God through the Lord Jesus Christ by faith in him.

One might add here, however, that when the Bible declares that all men are dead spiritually, it does not imply that all are in an identical state of corruption. In his book, In the Heavenlies, Harry A. Ironside points to three instances in the life of Christ that illustrate clearly what the Bible is saying. He writes, "The beautiful little maid, the daughter of Jairus, had been dead only a few minutes when the blessed Lord reached her father's house, but she was dead, she was lifeless. Fair to look upon, lovely and sweet, no doubt, in the eyes of her beloved parents, like a beautiful marble statue, but although there was not the corruption that there might have been, she was dead nevertheless. Turn over to Luke's gospel and you find that as the blessed Lord came to the village of Nain they were carrying a young man out to bury him. He was dead. Dead perhaps a day or two. ...This young man was dead longer than the little maid, but life was just as truly extinct in her case as in his. Then you have the blessed Lord at the grave of Lazarus. The sisters told Him not to roll the stone away, for their brother had been dead four days and would already be offensive. Corruption had set in, but the Lord Jesus brought new life to that man" as well as to the others. In the same way, we are all genuinely dead apart from the life-giving Spirit of Jesus Christ. There may be degrees of corruption so that relatively speaking some men are far less offensive than others. But all men are dead spiritually. All need the divine life. Where does it come from? It comes from Jesus Christ. He is the life of the world. Because we were dead in our sins, God sent Jesus Christ to give us new life. Because we were guilty of sin, God sent Jesus to be the propitiation for our sins by bearing them in his own body on the tree.

Eternal Life

There are two more truths that should be noticed before concluding this study. First, the life that God gives through Jesus Christ is not merely an earthly life or a life of such quality that it can be lost, but eternal life. It can never be lost. Thus the life that we receive from God in the moment of our belief in Jesus Christ is the same life that we will be living with God in eternity in what we would call unending millions of years from now.

What is eternal life? It is life without end, the life of God. If it could be lost, as some persons think is the case, then it would not be eternal life. For instance, what would eternal life be if it could be lost at the end of one million years? It would not be eternal life. It would be onemillion-years life. But if God said that it was going to last for one million years, then it could not be lost before the expiration of that period. If God said that he was going to give us onethousand-years life, then the life could not be lost before the end of one thousand years. If he said that it was one hundred-years life, it could not be lost before one hundred years had expired. But we thank God that he has not given us merely one-hundred-, one-thousand-, or even one-million years life. He has given us eternal life. It is truly eternal or everlasting. Thus, the apostle John writes, "And this is the testimony: God has given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son" (1 John 5:11).

The second truth is that God has not only given us eternal life (which no one can take from us); he has also given us a life that is meant to be abundant even in our present circumstances. The Lord Jesus Christ once said, "The thief comes only to steal and kill and destroy; I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full" (John 10:10).

It is unfortunate that many Christians, though they have eternal life, nevertheless do not have life abundantly. This was not meant to be. Instead of living a miserable life and always complaining, Christians are meant to live lives of such joy and exuberance that their lives will be a blessing to others.

There is a magnificent picture of this abundant life in the first verses of the beloved Twenty-third Psalm. "The LORD is my shepherd, I shall not be in want. He makes me lie down in green pastures, he leads me beside quiet waters, he restores my soul. He guides me in paths of righteousness for his name's sake" (Ps. 23:1-3). I believe that the reason this psalm has been so beloved by Christians throughout all the ages of church history is that it sets forth as something quite practical the abundant life that is ours because of God's care for us. We know that we were once sheep that were lost. Even now we wander away from Christ's fold. But still we are his, and we know that the abundant life is ours whenever we will leave our wandering and lie down in the company of our Shepherd.

Did you know that a sheep will not eat or drink when it is lying down? Most people have never heard this. But it is a fact, and it gives special meaning to the phrase, "He makes me lie down in green pastures." If a sheep is lying down, even in the greenest of pastures and even with the most tender morsel of grass within an inch of its nose, the sheep will not eat the grass. Instead, if it is hungry, it will scramble to its feet, bend over, and then eat the morsel that was much easier to reach before. Thus, when the psalm tells us that the Lord Jesus Christ, our Shepherd, makes us lie down in green pastures, it means that he is able to satisfy us so completely that we cannot possibly yearn for anything more.

Oh, the joys of living out the abundant life of Christ! They are the joys of increasingly finding him to be the bread of life that satisfies all our hunger and the water of life that quenches our deepest thirst.

Chapter 6.
The Light of the World

John 1:4-5

Several years ago an old woman in the bush country of southern Rhodesia in Africa said to a missionary, "You have brought us the light, but we don't seem to want it. You have brought us the light, but we still walk in darkness." She was speaking only of the life she knew in Africa. But her words aptly describe the reaction of people everywhere to the light of Jesus Christ when he first shone upon the world. He was the light of the world. In one sense he had always been the light of the world. Yet, when he appeared the world rejected him because it preferred darkness.

This great image—the image of Christ as the light of the world—is the second theme that John the evangelist introduces in the fourth and fifth verses of his opening chapter. Later we are told quite pointedly by Jesus, "I am the light of the world" (8:12). Here we read, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men. The light shines in the darkness, but the darkness has not understood it."

God Is Light

What does John mean when he declares that Jesus Christ is the light of men? By this title, Jesus is revealed as the One who knows God the Father and who makes him known. Light is a universal image for the illumination of the mind through understanding. Before Christ came into the world, the world was in darkness. The world did not know God. Christ came. His light shone before men. Then men had light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

The context for the significance of this image lies in the fact that God is pictured as light throughout the Old and New Testaments. David writes in one psalm, "The LORD is my light and my salvation" (Ps. 27:1). Psalm 36:9 says, "For with you is the fountain of life; in your light we see light." Another psalm says: "Praise the LORD, O my soul. O LORD my God, you are very great; you are clothed with splendor and majesty. He wraps himself in light as with a garment; he stretches out the heavens like a tent" (Ps. 104:1-2). John writes, "God is light; in him there is no darkness at all" (1 John 1:5).

God is light! We recognize this truth personally every time we sing some of our most beautiful hymns:

> Eternal light! Eternal light!
> How pure the soul must be > When, placed within Thy > searching light, It shrinks not, but with calm delight

Can live, and look on Thee!

Or this great hymn by Walter Chalmers Smith:

Immortal, invisible, God only wise,
In light inaccessible hid from our eyes,
Most blessed, most glorious, the Ancient of Days, Almighty, victorious, Thy great name we praise.

How perfect the image seems to be! And how appropriate as a term for the One who makes the Father known! E. M. Blaiklock, former professor of classics at Auckland University in New Zealand, makes these comments: "God is light. The image is satisfyingly complete. Light penetrates the unimaginable depths of space, far beyond the limits of human vision. In all the vastness of the great globe of vanished millennia into which the telescope can probe, the gleaming galaxies float, or tell in light how once they floated, when the effulgence which we see today began its endless journey.

"Without light there is no vision, no view of reality, no confident journeying, no growth save of chill and evil things, no health, no life. The hand shrinks from the cold and slimy life which survives sluggishly in dark caves. When some plant of the open day strikes root in such places, it becomes a pale and flaccid thing distorted beyond recognition, as it reaches for a gleam through some chink or crevice in the rock.

"But light, like God, exists by itself, apart from that which it illuminates. ...Light on earth is a medium, a means by which we see this and that object. It picks up and reveals the loveliness of shape and color. But light exists by itself and apart from that which it gilds and glorifies. It is an environment, a condition, a wonder which fills and floods the whole immensity of space."

Blaiklock is right. The image is rich, and it is totally appropriate to describe the Lord Jesus Christ. God the Father is light. So also is Christ the Son. He is the image of the invisible God, the One who fills all in all. In him we see and know the Father.

Light and Darkness

The image also teaches that by his coming into the world Jesus exposed the works of darkness. For he shone in the darkness, and the darkness did not like it. B. F. Westcott, in The Revelation of the Father, has written, "The light which reveals the world does not make the darkness, but it makes the darkness felt. If the sun is hidden, all is shadow, though we call that shadow only which is contrasted with the sunlight; for the contrast seems to intensify that which is, however, left just what it was before. And this is what Christ has done by his coming. He stands before the world in perfect purity, and we must feel as men could not feel before he came, the imperfection, the impurity of the world. The line of separation is drawn forever, and the conscience of men acknowledges that it is rightly drawn. Whether we know it or not the light which streams from Christ is ever opening the way to a clearer distinction between good and evil. His coming is a judgment. The light and the darkness are not blended in him, as they are in us, so that opinion can be doubtful."

The coming of Jesus into the world exposed the world's darkness, even where men thought they had most light. When I was very young I spent a number of summers at a Christian camp in Canada. At this camp during the course of each summer my friends and I took several camping trips. The trips were fun, as I remember, but the sleeping conditions were not. The ground was hard. Often it was damp and cold. Sometimes it rained. I remember often lying awake for most of the night talking or fooling around with the other campers. During a particularly long night we would play with our flashlights. We would shine them in one another's eyes, and the game was to see which was the brightest. Generally, the one with the brightest reflector or the largest number of batteries won. Of course, the game could be played only in the dark, for eventually the sun came up, and after that the differences between the flashlights faded into insignificance by comparison to the strong light of the sun.

That is the experience people have when they come face-to-face with Jesus Christ. So long as we live in the darkness of this world you and I are able to compare the relative merits of human goodness or righteousness. We are able to see the difference between a three-battery character, a two-battery character, and one whose battery has almost gone out. We rate men accordingly. But all these distinctions fade away in the presence of the white light of the righteousness of Jesus Christ. His coming reveals the profundity of the darkness.

What is your reaction to that? It can be one of two things. You can hate Christ for it, as many people have done. You can try to get rid of his presence in your life. This is what John implies when he says that the darkness did not overcome the light. He could not say that unless the darkness had tried to overcome it. You can do that. Or you can do what God wants you to do. You can say, "Lord, I see now that my own good works are far from perfect. In fact, they seem quite dark, almost nonexistent, by comparison with your righteousness. I realize that they will never take me to heaven. But you have the goodness which I do not have, and you have promised to give it to all who will believe on your Son and receive him as Savior. That is what I do now. I trust you to remove my sin and accept me as your child forever."

If you will say that, God will do as he has promised. For this is the reason why the Lord Jesus Christ came. We are told, "God made him [Jesus Christ] who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21).

Light Victorious

The third important point to note in studying this image is the fact that the light of the Lord Jesus Christ has not been overcome by the darkness. In fact, John says, "The light still shines in the darkness, and the darkness has never put it out" (PHILLIPS).

The word that occurs most prominently in the second part of this verse—the word that is translated "comprehend" in the King James Version of the Bible and is translated as "put it out" by Phillips in the paraphrase that I have just quoted—is a word with at least three meanings. Thus, there has been a wide diversity of interpretations of the verse by translators. On the most literal level the word means "to seize" or "to apprehend," whether physically (as in John 8:4, where the scribes and the Pharisees claimed that they had seized the woman taken in adultery), or intellectually, in which case it would mean "to understand." This is the interpretation given to the verse by the King James translators, who rendered the verse, "and the darkness comprehended it not," as well as by the Latin Vulgate that says, "tenebrae eam non comprehenderunt."

However, the word can also mean "to overtake" and, thus, by extension "to overtake in pursuit" or "to overcome." This is the clear meaning of the verb in the only other place where it occurs in John's Gospel—John 12:35—where we read, "Walk while you have the light, before darkness overtakes you." In this sense the word passed into the sports vocabulary of antiquity and was used when a wrestler was said to have "taken down" his opponent. This is the meaning adopted by Williams, who says that the darkness "never overpowered" the light, and by the New Scofield Bible and the Revised Standard Version, which use the verb "overcome."

All these translations are right. The darkness certainly did not understand the light. It did not overcome it. And yet, there is another meaning of the word that I believe comes even closer to John's true meaning and is more appropriate. It is "to quench," "to extinguish," or "to eclipse," the concepts employed by J. B. Phillips and the New English Bible. Thus, to use the terms of astronomy, which may certainly be involved here, we can say that God's light is shining in the darkness and that it has never been eclipsed.

We do not see this on earth in the unending natural cycles of light and darkness. Here darkness always overcomes light. You can be in the gloomiest country on earth, or the brightest, and night will always follow upon day. It can be retarded by artificial means, but night comes eventually. I have often noticed how long daylight lasts on evening flights to this country from one of the European capitals. The flights take only six or seven hours, and there is a gain of three hours in flying the 3,000 miles from east to west. The planes fly high, and one can follow the sun for a greater distance over the horizon. On such a flight dusk lingers for almost four hours. Yet the night comes at last, and the plane eventually settles into the blackness that shrouds the eastern seaboard of the United States.

What the physical darkness does each evening, spiritual darkness tried without success to do in the case of Jesus Christ. He simply overcame it. One man who learned this truth rather late in life is Malcolm Muggeridge, England's well-known satirist and social critic. In his words, "Having seen this other light [the light of God revealed in Jesus Christ], I turn to it, striving and growing toward it as plants do toward the sun. ...Though, in terms of history, the darkness falls, blacking out us and our world, You have overcome history. You came as light into the world in order that whoever believed in You should not remain in darkness. Your light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it. Nor ever will."

"You Are the Light"

In order to see the full teaching of the Gospel of John about light, we need to add to these truths that there is a sense in which in our day Jesus is no longer the light of the world directly but is so only as his light is reflected to the world by Christians. It is true that John uses the present tense in describing Christ's light—"the light shines in the darkness"—but John would be the first to say that Christ shines in our day only through Christians (cf. 1 John 2:7-11). Thus, when Jesus was in the world he said, "As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world." But when he turned to those who had believed on him, he said, "You are the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). He did not mean that they were to glow in their own right like fireflies. Rather, they were to be kindled lights, like John the Baptist, whom Jesus termed a "lamp that burned and gave light" (John 5:35).

To those who did not believe he said, "You are going to have the light just a little while longer. Walk while you have the light, before darkness overtakes you" (12:35).

Do you see what Christ is saying? He is saying that today Christians are the light of the world.
But they can be the light of the world only because he is their light and they reflect him. It is as Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "For God, who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' made his light shine in our hearts to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6).

Do men see Christ in you? They will not find him in the world today—not in the world's literature, culture, or pastimes. They will see him only as you look to Jesus, as he increasingly becomes your light, and as he is reflected from your life to others.

Is Jesus your light? He is if he does for you what light always does when it issues forth from the Father. First, it puts confusion to flight. This is the picture that we have in the opening chapter of Genesis where we are told how God moved upon the formless void that existed before the world began and said, "Let there be light." The light of God dispelled the darkness and brought forth life and order. If Jesus is the light of your life, he also dispels the darkness and places your life in order.
Second, the light of Jesus Christ is revealing. That is, it penetrates the darkness and shows us what has always been there. If the light of the Lord Jesus has had this effect in you, then you will not be playing the part of the hypocrite. You will have seen your heart. You will have been able to say with Isaiah, "Woe to me! ...I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips" (Isa. 6:5); or with Peter, "Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man!" (Luke 5:8); or with Paul, "I am the worst" of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15).

Finally, if Christ is your light, you will have guidance in the midst of darkness and, with the guidance of God, true liberty.

Long my imprisoned spirit lay,
Fast bound in sin and nature's night:
Thine eye diffused a quickening ray,
I woke, the dungeon flamed with light:
My chains fell off, my heart was free,
I rose, went forth, and followed Thee.

Chapter 7.
John the Baptist

John 1:6-8

In the previous studies we have been looking at the person of Jesus Christ and at the things John the evangelist says about him in the first five verses of his Gospel. Now we want to turn to the second person John mentions—John the Baptist. He is mentioned in order that we might learn about his witness to Jesus Christ. John writes, "There came a man who was sent from God; his name was John. He came as a witness to testify concerning that light, so that through him all men might believe. He himself was not the light; he came only as a witness to the light."

The Forerunner

Most of us tend to overlook the importance of the ministry of John the Baptist. For we focus on the ministry of Jesus Christ, as we should, and we remember that John the Baptist was only the forerunner of the Lord. John says that the Baptist came to bear witness to Jesus Christ. This was his reason for existing. John himself said, "He [Christ] must become greater; I must become less" (John 3:30). And yet, if John the Baptist had not lived in that age and if the preparation of Christ's way had not been his primary ministry, we would no doubt look back on him with the highest praise, much as we look back on Isaiah, Daniel, Jeremiah, Amos, or any of the other great Old Testament figures.

Certainly John was a charismatic figure. We read that droves of people went out to him, much as they later did to hear the Lord Jesus Christ. This following was so substantial that it even disturbed the priests and Levites in Jerusalem who sent delegates to investigate John's teaching. Some of these were also convicted, repented, and were baptized as a sign that they had turned from their sins (Mark 1:4-5).

In some sense, too, John was the pivot of biblical history, for we read in Luke that "the Law and the Prophets were proclaimed until John" (Luke 16:16). This means that John was the last of the Old Testament prophets and, hence, the last of the representatives of the old order. After this Jesus came preaching the Kingdom of God, which was entered from that time forward by faith in his person. John was also the herald of the new dispensation. So he earned the praise of the Lord Jesus Christ, who said, "I tell you the truth: Among those born of women there has not risen anyone greater than John the Baptist; yet he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he" (Matt. 11:11).

This last verse probably refers primarily to the fact that those who came after John and who believed in Jesus would receive the Holy Spirit. But it might also refer to John's extraordinary humility. Jesus said that the one who humbles himself shall be exalted, and John certainly did that. He called himself a voice crying in the wilderness. You cannot see a voice; you can only hear it. Thus, it was John's role and pleasure merely to be the herald of the Lamb who takes away the sin of the world. Like Paul, who came later, John's concern was solely that Jesus be magnified, whether by his life or his death (Phil. 1:19, 20), and in this he was a true and faithful forerunner.

A Witness

John was also known for his ministry of baptism, and for the fact that he baptized the Lord Jesus Christ. However, when John the evangelist refers to John the Baptist in the first chapter of the Gospel, he does so not for the sake of his ministry itself or his baptism of Jesus but solely for the sake of his testimony to Jesus. In this sense, the witness of John the Baptist takes its place in the first chapter of the Gospel as an established, historical testimony—so that we might learn that the One who was the light of the world was identified historically for the response of faith and obedience of men.

We see this emphasis upon John's testimony by the way in which the evangelist handles the material relating to Christ's forerunner. Most noticeable perhaps is the absence from John's Gospel of many aspects of John the Baptist's ministry that are present in the synoptic Gospels—Matthew, Mark, and Luke. For example, John eliminates all references to his preaching of repentance and all mention of him as the herald of God's kingdom. He does not issue a call to repentance in John's Gospel, as in the others (Matt. 3:8; Mark 1:4; Luke 3:8), and he does not engage in water baptism, although several references to baptism in the Gospel show that the evangelist was aware and knew his readers to be aware of this part of the Baptist's activity (1:26; 3:22-26). Moreover, as I have pointed out in my book, Witness and Revelation in the Gospel of John, "When John meets the priests and Levites in Matthew's Gospel, he denounces their hypocrisy, terming them a 'brood of vipers' and pointing to his own baptism as a way of repentance and of salvation from the wrath to come (Matt. 3:7-10). In the fourth Gospel, by contrast, a similar encounter appears in an official character without apparent conflict and is the occasion for the formal presentation of the Baptist's testimony (l:19-34)."

Even more significant than these changes and omissions is the fact that the evangelist does not report the baptism of Jesus himself, even though he shows Jesus to be present in the area of the Jordan during John's ministry and even though the baptism is the crowning point of John's ministry in the synoptic Gospels. Apparently the actual baptism did not have much interest for John the evangelist. Instead, everything is focused on Jesus Christ. In place of the baptism there is Jesus. In place of an act there is the verbal proclamation.

We can find a good illustration of what this means by imagining that we have been reading an article dealing with Abraham Lincoln. The article speaks of his Gettysburg Address, but there is no reference to the actual battle of Gettysburg or to the fact that Lincoln traveled there in its aftermath to give this eulogy. Suppose further that the article goes on to discuss the president's Second Inaugural Address but again without any reference to the fact that the Civil War was now over and that this address was designed to bind up the nation's wounds. If that were the case, we would recognize at once that the article was interested in Lincoln as a writer and not primarily as a general or a statesman. The article would probably be entitled something like, "Lincoln: The Writer" or "Abraham Lincoln in Prose." It is exactly the same type of selection that is present in the handling of the Baptist's witness in John's Gospel.

Moreover, while it is the case that John's account of the Baptist's ministry is lacking in many of the themes found in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, it is no less striking that it is also lacking in themes peculiar to the fourth Gospel. Thus, although John tells us that the Baptist was sent to bear witness to the Light, nowhere does the forerunner actually identify Jesus as the Light. And neither does he term Jesus the vine, the bread from heaven, the shepherd, the door, the way, the truth, the life, or any of the other themes that occur later on in John's narrative.

The same point can be made another way. That is, just as the words of the Baptist do not develop the themes of the Gospel, neither does the Gospel develop the themes that are present in the Baptist's witness. If John had wanted to do this, the obvious starting place would have been the Baptist's reference to Jesus as God's Lamb. But in spite of the fact that the evangelist seems to make clear that Jesus was crucified in Jerusalem at precisely the moment when the lambs were being sacrificed for the Jewish Passover, the theme of the sin-bearing lamb does not recur. On the basis of such observations, we are justified in believing that John the evangelist preserved the witness of the Baptist word for word so that he might present it almost as what we would call "legal evidence" for the benefit of the readers of the Gospel.

The final proof of this unique interest on the part of John is that the words for "witness" replace those for "preaching" (Matt. 3:1; Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3) and "exhortation" (Luke 3:18), which the synoptic writers use of the Baptist's ministry. Thus, in John's evaluation the Baptist emerges as the first and greatest witness to the person and ministry of the Lord. John indicates his interest in him precisely as a witness to the Lord.

A Faithful Witness

We are going to be studying the actual testimony of John the Baptist later on. But even at this point we should notice that we have here an outline of what made the witness of Christ's forerunner effective. This is important because it tells us how we too can be effective as we also seek to bear a testimony to our Lord.

The outline is stated quite clearly in verses 7 and 8, although, to be sure, it is clearer in the Greek text than it is in the English. It has three parts. John writes that the Baptist, who was sent from God (1) was not the Light but (2) was sent to bear witness to the Light in order that (3) men might believe through him. This outline was pointed out quite clearly by Professor C. H. Dodd of Cambridge University, England, who also shows that this is precisely the outline that the evangelist employs in the verses immediately following the prologue. That is, verses 19-28 show that the Baptist was not the Light; verses 29-34 picture him pointing to the Light; and verses 3551 show how that witness resulted in the first men coming to believe in Christ's person.

Think what this means personally. In the first place, John the Baptist was aware that he was not the Light. This is important simply because all successful witnessing to Jesus Christ must start with this self-realization. Whenever a Christian layman, minister, writer, teacher, or whoever it might be, gets to thinking that there is something important about him, he or she will always cease to be effective as Christ's witness. The testimony will stop. Unfortunately, this has been true of many Christians and of many important Christian movements.

Second, John bore witness to the Light. This is important also, because there are always many shy or uncertain Christians who feel that they are bearing a witness simply because they are "living" the Christian faith or refusing to do certain things and doing others. They "live" it at work, at school, in their homes. Unfortunately, important as it may be, this is not in itself witnessing. It is what Paul Little, the author of the helpful and stimulating little book How to Give Away Your Faith, calls "pre-evangelism." Living the faith is a most essential basis for any effective witness. If we do not live what we profess, the profession will be discredited. Yet, living the faith is not itself witnessing.

Witnessing is speaking to others about Jesus Christ. This is implied in the very word itself, for witnessing is a legal term that points to verbal testimony rendered in a court of law. If we are to do this effectively, we must be able to tell who Jesus Christ is, what he said about the depravity of man's nature, why his death and resurrection are the essential elements in the solution to the problem of man's sin and depravity, and how one comes into a relationship with Jesus personally.

Finally, the witness must be given with the belief of other persons in Jesus Christ as its object. John, we are told, bore witness to the Light "that through him all men might believe." It should be almost unnecessary to mention this, of course, for it is obvious. Yet it is necessary simply because it is possible for a person to become so mechanical in his witness that he can go through all the motions of witnessing without actually looking and praying for the response to Christ in faith by the other person. If we could remember this, we would find witnessing exciting, and we would learn that winning the argument often becomes far less important than winning the person to the Lord.

The Results

Two conclusions follow. First, when a witness is so given—that is, with the awareness on the part of the one witnessing that he or she is not the Light but is only pointing to the Light in order that men and women might believe—then men and women will believe. This is God's way of doing things. He says that he has chosen to save men by the foolishness of preaching, and this means by the foolishness of verbal proclamation. It is foolish, as men think of it. But it is the power of God unto salvation for those who will believe.

We have a demonstration of this in the remainder of the chapter, in the verses referred to earlier. For after John has borne his witness to the Light, declaring, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29), the evangelist records that there was a whole string of disciples who followed Jesus as the result of this testimony. First, there were two disciples, one of whom was Andrew. Andrew found his brother Simon, and Simon became a follower. After this there was Philip, then Nathanael. Then there were others. Clearly, when a witness to Jesus Christ is given in the way John the Baptist gave it, people will believe.

The second conclusion is related to this. It is simply that if you will witness in this way, men and women will believe as the result of your testimony.

There are seven different kinds of witness mentioned in the pages of John's Gospel. The most important is the witness of Jesus Christ himself. Jesus said, "Even if I testify on my own behalf, my testimony is valid, for I know where I came from and where I am going. But you have no idea where I come from or where I am going" (John 8:14). The second witness is the witness of the Father. Again Jesus noted, "I am one who testifies for myself; my other witness is the Father, who sent me" (8:18). There is the witness of the Holy Spirit who "will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you" (16:13-14). In addition to the testimony of the three persons of the Trinity, there are also these: the witness of the Scriptures, the witness of Christ's works, and the witness of John the Baptist, which we have just been considering. That makes six witnesses, but there is one more. It is the witness of ordinary men and women. The first of these very human testimonies is given by the Samaritan woman, and her witness is followed by the testimony of the multitude that had seen the raising of Lazarus; the special witness of the eleven disciples; and the testimony of the beloved disciple who was an eyewitness of the crucifixion. You and I are, therefore, included in this last category of witnesses.

What does that mean? It means that God regards your testimony as being important enough to be included among all those other monumental testimonies to the person and work of the glorious Lord Jesus Christ. Your testimony may not have a very wide scope. It is certainly not as world embracing as the testimony of the Scriptures. It may not be spectacular, as was the testimony of John the Baptist. Still it is most important. You know a special aspect of Christ's personality or work to which only you can point adequately. And what is more, as you do point to it and witness to him, men and women will come to know him personally as their Savior.

Chapter 8.
Light for Every Man

John 1:9

What was the greatest moment in the history of the world? The traditional answer would be either the discovery of fire or the invention of the wheel. A historian might refer to the flowering of the intellectual life of Greece in the fifth century B.C. Another might argue for the imposition of world law under the authority of the Roman Empire. A modern person might refer to the discovery of atomic energy or, in our own time, to travels beyond the earth—to the moon and perhaps one day to the planets.

These moments in the history of the human race are interesting, of course, and important. In their own way they are very significant. But no thinking Christian would ever answer the question by pointing to one of these happenings. The only answer that a Christian can give would be the coming into human history of the Lord God Almighty in the person of Jesus Christ. Beside that event all other events fade into insignificance by comparison. This moment alone is preeminent. It is about this moment that our text speaks when it points to the coming of Jesus Christ during the days of John the Baptist. "The real light which enlightens every man was even then coming into the world" (John 1:9 NEB).

The Light Was Coming

If we are to understand this verse properly, we need to understand at the outset that it is talking about the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ and not, as some versions of the Bible indicate, the coming of light into the lives of all men.

In the Greek text that stands behind our English Bibles, the word translated "coming" occurs in such a place and with such endings that the reference itself is ambiguous. This ambiguity was noticed as far back in church history as the time of the early church writer Origen, in the second century. On the one hand, the word "coming" could refer to the phrase "every man." In that case, the words should be translated the way we find them in the King James Bible ("That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world") or in the paraphrase of the New Testament by J. B. Phillips, which makes it even clearer ("That was the true light that shines upon every man as he comes into the world"). In this form the text is a proof text for the doctrine of natural revelation, the teaching that God has given all men sufficient illumination to come to him. The early Quakers, who believed in natural revelation, were so fond of this text that some of them even called it "the Quakers' text."

There are some difficulties with this interpretation, however, even though the Greek text makes it theoretically possible. For one thing, in this form the verse is redundant. Thus, it is hardly necessary to add that the light shines on every man as he comes into the world, for that much is implied by his very existence. For another thing—and this is even more significant—the phrase "coming into the world" is not used elsewhere by John of a man being born. It always has an entirely different meaning, as we shall see.

Another interpretation suggests that "coming" refers, not to "every man" but to the "Light." In this form the reference is to the incarnation of the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is far better. This is the view of all the major commentators, including Frederick Godet, B. F. Westcott, J. H. Bernard, and others, and it is the view reflected in translations of the Revised Standard Version, the New English Bible, and the New International Version.

There are several reasons why this translation should be preferred, besides the fact that the Bible does not elsewhere support the idea of an inner light for every man. First, the phrase "coming into the world," while not used elsewhere in John of the birth of a man, is used frequently for the coming into human history of Jesus Christ. Thus, at the multiplication of loaves and fishes the multitude exclaimed, "Surely this is the Prophet who is to come into the world" (6:14). Martha told Jesus, "I believe that you are the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world" (11:27). Jesus said, "I came from the Father and entered the world; now I am leaving the world and going back to the Father" (16:28). To Pilate's remark, "You are a king then!" the Lord Jesus replied, "You are right in saying I am a king. In fact, for this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me" (18:37).

Second, the verse in this form fits perfectly into the context of John's prologue, which proceeds from the ministry of Jesus before the incarnation, through the preparatory work of John the Baptist, to a description of the incarnation itself and of men's response to it. Without this interpretation John would be speaking of the reaction of men to Christ's coming in verses 10-12 before he actually says that Jesus came into the world. With it the passage flows along perfectly. When John wrote his first epistle he could say, "The true light is already shining" (1 John 2:8), but here he acknowledges that the true Light was only coming when the ministry of John the Baptist began. We should therefore translate the passage, "John the Baptist was not that Light. He was only sent to bear witness to the Light. Nevertheless, the true Light, which shines upon every man, was even then (i.e., during the lifetime of John the Baptist) coming into the world."

A Genuine Light

John 1:9 is interesting for several reasons. First, it says that the Light that was even then coming into the world was the "true" or "genuine" Light. In the Greek language there are two different but related words that are almost always translated "true" in our Bibles. The first is the word alēthēs which means "true" as opposed to "false." That is, if you were to make a statement in a court of law, it would be either true or false, right or wrong. But that is not the word that John uses here.

Here John uses the word alēthinos. This word means "true" as opposed to "partial" or, as we would say, "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" as opposed to part of it. A better way of translating this word would be by use of the terms "real" or "genuine." Thus, we should say that the light of the Lord Jesus Christ was the real light beside which all other lights were imperfect or misleading.

This is of great importance. Every now and then we hear a Christian say that there is no good to be found in anything that has its origin in the world. But that is not entirely true. It is true that no good coming out of man or out of his world will ever please God, but still there are good things in life when they are seen from man's perspective. The things I referred to earlier fall into this category—inventions, philosophy, law, atomic energy, adventure, and so on—and we would be poorer without them. John is not denying that these things have value in a limited way. However, he is saying that these lights are only partial lights and are misleading if followed exclusively. Christ alone is the Light that enlightens all darkness and gives illumination spiritually.

Unfortunately, men will always mistake the partial lights for the real one. Take a few current examples. One light that men followed, particularly in the nineteenth century and well into this one, was the light of "progress." A belief in "progress" was based upon the discoveries of science and diplomacy, and it was linked at least psychologically to the theory of evolution. Men followed this light by droves. But the dream of progress burst like a bubble in the history of two world wars. Before the Second World War men would laugh at those who spoke literally of the judgments recorded in the Book of Revelation—massive destruction and the loss of life, great plagues, geological catastrophes, and signs in the heavens. But now, since the advent of the world's nuclear arsenals, the subject is not so humorous. Most persons are willing to admit that the doctrine of inevitable progress was illusory.

Another partial light is the pursuit of material prosperity. We follow the dream to great excess in America. Thanks to us, much of the world now follows it also, or would like to. This is the idea that happiness comes through an annual wage hike, second car, summer home, four-day workweek, or round-the-world vacations. Once again, these things have a limited benefit. They are at least relatively better than the kind of abject poverty we find in much of India or in the Far East. They are better than death by starvation, better than illiteracy and unemployment. Still they are not the way to contentment. They do not make the heart of a man right with God. Thus, a few years ago, in the midst of the most prosperous age this world has ever known, Time magazine spoke of ours as "the age of anxiety" and could find no cure for its malaise.

The world's lights are not necessarily false lights. But they are imperfect lights. They are partial. They do not provide that which men most need for the satisfaction of the inner hunger of their souls. John is saying that the place where men and women can find adequate illumination about themselves and about life under the eye of an almighty and righteous God is Jesus. We are to look to him. Those who will do that will find that he is the One able to guide them through the darkest night, who will enable them to distinguish between the lights that are better and the lights that are worse, and who will cause them to grow spiritually and in every other way.

Every Man

The second important teaching in this verse is that today the light of the Lord Jesus Christ shines on every man. Here we are helped by realizing that John is writing out of a definite historical situation. John was writing toward the end of the apostolic era, and he had known the conflicts that had come about as the result of preaching the gospel to the Jews. The Jews, like some modern American Christians, thought that because God had blessed them in a certain historical way they were therefore the only ones whom God could be blessing. They looked back to their religious heritage and boasted in it. They considered the light that God had shed abroad to be their property exclusively. John writes that Jesus came to shine upon all men so that Greeks and Romans, as well as Jews, might share in his kingdom.

That is glorious, of course. But it also has a somber side. For we ask ourselves, "What does the light do when it shines, as it does, on every man?" We must answer, "It brings the works of darkness to light." When Jesus Christ came into the world he was a light such as the world had never seen before, and men hated him for existing simply because he revealed how dirty and vile their lives were morally. He did that then and he does that today. Hence, if you will allow his light to shine upon you, the first thing you will discover is that you are at heart a child of the darkness.

Suppose for a moment that in your town some soap manufacturer would hold a huge contest and invite the homemakers to come together and wash their linen tablecloths. The cameras would be there to record it for television commercials. One manufacturer would be pushing his product as "the hungry detergent." Another would be saying that his was "enzyme active." A third would say his had "punch." The homemakers wash their linen in these products and when the washing is over and the linen is dry, they spread the tablecloths on the grass to get the benefit of the natural light. Just as they are getting around to the judging, it snows. Isn't it true that in spite of the washing, every tablecloth there would seem to be dirty yellow?

It is the same spiritually. Between persons there is some ground for comparison. We can say that Joe is better than Sam and that Bill is worse than both. John is so-so. George is not bad. But next to the Lord Jesus Christ all that we are appears to be dirty, and God says that at best "all our righteous acts are like filthy rags" (Isa. 64:6). Have you seen that? If you have, then you are ready to yield to Christ for your cleansing, your transformation, and your true growth.

Not long ago a longtime missionary to Korea named Archibald Campbell wrote a book comparing Korea as he found it with Korea now. He had served in Korea for more than forty years. "In Korea... there was spiritual darkness until the gospel of Christ was brought in. Men sold their daughters, their sisters, and sometimes their wives into prostitution without a qualm of conscience. Better-class women were not to be seen on the streets. Young girls had to wear great hats, made of reeds, four feet across, which completely hid their faces from view. Wife beating was commonplace. I have seen a man dragging his wife along the street by the hair. Onlookers shrugged their shoulders and said, 'That thing's going to die.' My own frantic appeal to the Chief of Police proved useless. There was little that could be called integrity. ...Selfishness was in the very physical make up. ...Medicine men were in business for a living, but hospital service for the sick and afflicted was beyond comprehension. If they can't pay for it, let 'em die! Lepers were outcasts. The blind were beggars."

It is a grim picture, although one not without parallels elsewhere. But then, as Campbell shows, the gospel of God's grace through the Lord Jesus Christ arrived, and in the space of just two generations the country began to be transformed. Values changed, and this was true even though the light of Christ had begun to shine in only a small percentage of the vast population.

The effect can be seen by the following story. In one of the refugee camps that came into being as the result of the Korean War, there was a Korean couple who had a son named Oh In Ho. Oh In Ho had a chance to come to America, an almost unbelievable opportunity at that time, and he chose to come to Philadelphia where he enrolled at the University of Pennsylvania. One evening, on the way to mail a letter, he was attacked by a gang of teenage thugs and was killed. His refugee parents were miles away in Korea. They were living in a hovel made of scrap lumber. But they were Christians, and they were surrounded by Christian friends. From their friends and from their own almost nonexistent savings, these Korean Christians collected hundreds of dollars. Then they sent it to America with the request that the murderers of their son be forgiven and that, with this money, they be sent to a Christian school where they might learn about the Lord Jesus Christ.

What a judgment that act was on so-called "Christian" America. It is an example of the transforming light of the Lord Jesus Christ who in the lifetime of John the Baptist was even then beginning to shine upon our world.

Chapter 9.
Jesus, the Unknown

John 1:10

Have you ever heard the story of the medieval king who left his kingdom in the hands of servants and rode away to battle? He was gone for years. During those years the kingdom became more and more corrupt. When he returned at last, the king discovered that those whom he once had commanded had quite forgotten him and wherever he went he was unrecognized. This is what happened when the King of kings, the Lord Jesus Christ, first entered human history. He had made the world, the apostle John says, but the world had forgotten him. Thus, although "he was in the world, and though the world was made through him, the world did not recognize him" (John 1:10).

Jesus, the unknown! It is a puzzling and astonishing idea. I suppose that in our century the bestknown person in the whole history of the world is Jesus Christ. His name is known, not only in the Western world but also in the East and, indeed, in the farthest corners of our globe. His name is on millions of tongues daily. Yet John is telling us that for some thirty years, from the birth of Jesus until the time of the public ministry of John the Baptist, the Lord of glory was in the world of men but was unknown by them. This fact points a most instructive finger at the extent of the depravity of man, for it shows that men were (and are) spiritually blind.

Depravity of Man's Will

Why was it that the world did not know and recognize the Lord Jesus Christ when he was present? The first answer to that question is that the world did not want him. We know from experience that if a man does not want to see a truth (or an injustice either, for that matter), he will not see it. So, in exactly the same way, men and women did not recognize the Lord Jesus Christ primarily because they did not want to recognize him.

Of course, this runs counter to the estimate most people have of themselves. Some time ago a well-known Bible teacher was interviewed on a Christmas television program by a young woman who was apparently very ignorant of spiritual things. She wanted to add a religious note to her program. So she began by saying how much the spirit of Christmas is needed in our day, just as it was at the birth of Jesus nearly two thousand years ago. She noted how eagerly the whole world waited for the coming of the baby Jesus. The Bible teacher replied that he did not want to seem contradictory but that he was obliged to say that her statement was far from the truth. In fact (and he gave the details) even the various elements of the Christmas story show that the world actually wanted to go about its merrymaking and cupidity without being disturbed by any thoughts about God.

We ourselves can see the truth of this statement. In our Bibles we have the story of Mary and Joseph traveling from Nazareth to Bethlehem when Jesus was about to be born. What happens?

We find that the innkeeper does not want him, and so the Lord of glory is born in a stable.
Perhaps as much as two years later wise men come to Jerusalem inquiring after the one born King of the Jews, and Herod doesn't want him. He has the babies of Bethlehem murdered, thinking by that means to eliminate a potential rival to his earthly throne. The same story shows the religious leaders correctly answering Herod's question concerning the birthplace of the Messiah: "In Bethlehem in Judea," they replied, "for this is what the prophet has written" (Matt. 2:5). But it is the wise men from the East and not the spiritual leaders of Jerusalem who travel to Bethlehem and there fall down and worship Jesus. The world will always miss the real Christmas because it does not want to be disturbed in its affairs.

A text that puts this great fact theologically is found just two chapters later in John's Gospel: "This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil" (3:19). Jesus was the Light of the world. When he came into the world his light shone upon men's darkness and revealed the darkness for what it was. Men hated him for it. Thus, they would not acknowledge him to be God's Son, the Lord of glory.

Men and women simply did not want to acknowledge Christ, and they do not want to acknowledge him now. So the corruption that was in the world at Christ's first coming continues.
I remember how shocked and astonished I was at my discovery of the moral depravity of the Roman world of Christ's day the first time I visited the remains of the ancient Roman city of Pompeii.

Pompeii was buried by an eruption of Vesuvius in a.d. 79. Today it has been uncovered, and a person can therefore visit the city and come away with the feeling that he has almost seen life as it was during the first century. I remember my visit, and I remember my shock at discovering the visual record in Pompeii of the city's moral and sexual depravity. But it is the same today. The point of John's statement is that men and women are so in love with their sins that they do not want anyone to dissuade them from them.

Today, in so-called "Christian" America, identical things are practiced; the same kinds of pictures are sold. And the heart of man is again demonstrated to be "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," as God declares it to be. Men do not want Jesus Christ.

Spiritual Blindness

The second reason why the world did not know the Lord Jesus Christ at his coming is that the world was unable to recognize him; that is, not only did men not want to see him, they also were spiritually blind. Thus we read in Paul's two great letters to the Corinthians, "And even if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled to those who are perishing. The god of this age has blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:3-4), and "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

What happened when man fell into sin? How far did man fall? There are only four answers to that question theologically, and only one of them is biblical. The first view is that man fell upward. This idea has entered Western thought largely through the impact of the evolutionary theory, and it is held by those who believe that just as man is supposed to have evolved from lower forms of life to higher forms so also has his understanding of God and his morality moved upward. This is entirely false, however, and we must see that man is no better today because, instead of being able to pick up one stone hammer and hit one other man over the head so that he kills him, he is now able to pick up a nuclear bomb and annihilate thousands. Our own recent history of wars and violence should be enough to teach us that, whatever man did when he fell, he certainly did not fall upward.

The second answer is that man fell but that he only fell part way. It says that he fell over the edge, but that he caught the edge with his fingers and dangles there until someone comes along and helps him back up. This is where religion comes in; sometimes the tools that are used are the sacraments. This view is obviously found in the Christian church. But it is not biblical.

The third view is that man fell over the edge but that he got stuck on a shelf halfway down. Those who believe in this doctrine would be quick to admit, verbally at least, that man is a fallen being. They would even use biblical language to insist that he is indeed "dead in trespasses and sins." Nevertheless, if you press them closely, you will find that they believe that even though a man is dead spiritually he is still capable of doing something. In other words, as Donald Grey Barnhouse once said, you might say that such persons believe that although man is in his coffin he nevertheless has one arm outside of it working for himself. Clearly this is not the biblical view either. The biblical view is that when man fell into sin he fell all the way to the bottom and there he lies hopelessly lost, blind to all spiritual truth, and unable to help himself until God reaches down by grace, lifts him up, sets him on the edge, and then says, "Now, this is the way, walk in it." This is a true picture of man's spiritual inability or blindness, and it is as a result of such blindness as well as man's willfullness that the Lord Jesus Christ was unrecognized.

When we understand that this is an accurate picture of man as God sees him, then we also understand why it was that John the Baptist had to appear as Christ's forerunner. What was the Baptist's ministry? John tells us that the Baptist came to bear witness to the Light. And the point is that if he had not come to bear witness to the Light, no one, including Christ's disciples, would have noticed him.

A story about Donald Grey Barnhouse perfectly illustrates John's function. Dr. Barnhouse was preaching in Ireland at the beginning of the Second World War at a time when, because of the German bombing, a blackout was imposed at a certain hour each evening. It happened that this hour occurred in the midst of Dr. Barnhouse's evening studies. One evening after he had been preaching in the dark for about twenty minutes, someone in a back room accidentally threw the main switch that turned on all the lights in the church. Instantly, there was considerable commotion in the congregation. In particular, a man in the front row began to paw at the person next to him and ask in a loud whisper, "What happened? Why did he stop?" He was quite agitated until his friend explained that the lights had come on accidentally. The man, of course, was blind. He was the one person in the auditorium who could not see the light.

This man is a picture of all men when the light of Jesus Christ first shone upon the world. He was the Light. He was in the world. But the world went about its business until John the Baptist came, crying, "The light is on! The light is on!" When that was said the world looked up with its sightless, sunken eyes, and asked, "What is light?" And they did not respond until God reached down and began to touch their eyes so that some of them might see. To some of these the apostle Peter later wrote, "But you are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God, that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light" (1 Peter 2:9).

If we have understood the significance of the fact that men and women did not recognize the Lord Jesus Christ when he came into the world, then we have also begun to understand three of the most important teachings of John's Gospel. The first is the glory of Jesus Christ. The second is the total depravity of man, which, indeed, is taught throughout Scripture. The third is the necessity of God's sovereign and unconditional election as the basis of our salvation.

Everything we have said up to this point substantiates the first two of these teachings. The glory of Jesus Christ is evident, and the spiritual depravity of our race is demonstrated by the willfullness and spiritual blindness of all men apart from the unmerited grace of God in their lives.

If there is any doubt of this, we need only to ask, "After the Light of the world was pointed out to men by John the Baptist, what did men do about him?" and then weigh the answer. The answer is that after the Lord Jesus Christ had been forced upon man's gaze, both by the ministry of the forerunner and by Christ's own public ministry, men responded not by falling down and worshiping him as they ought to have done but by crucifying him. The cross of the Lord Jesus Christ is the response of fallen men to God's goodness.

The third of John's teachings—the need for the sovereign and unconditional election of men by God as the basis of their salvation—flows from the first two and, in fact, is taught just three verses farther on in John's Gospel. If it is true (as it is) that people are totally unable to seek or find God, then the only basis on which anyone ever finds God is that God comes first of all seeking him. And isn't that what we are taught quite openly and repeatedly in the Bible? What happens in the opening pages of the Book of Genesis? Man sins and immediately reveals the nature and extent of that sin by running away from God. He hides. But then—marvelous truth— God comes to him, seeking him out. The first recorded question of God in the history of the universe is this one: "Where are you?" In the same way today he comes calling.

You may be saying, "But I am an exception. I have not run away from God. I have sought God. I sought God in the Presbyterian church; and when I couldn't find him in the Presbyterian church, I joined the Methodist church. When I couldn't find God there, I became a Baptist. After that I became a Christian Scientist. Now I am hunting for God by means of drugs through mysticism." The answer to that is that you have not been seeking God; you have been running away from him. When God got close to you in the Presbyterian church you left it and became a Methodist. When he got close to you in the Methodist church you became a Baptist. So it was. You went from church to church to church. And God is calling out, "When are you going to stop running away from me, my child? I want you, and I want to take you to myself."

Let us learn that the first great word that God has to speak to us is that we—you and I—do not naturally want him. But his second word is that in spite of that fact, in spite of our sin, he still loves us and comes to us in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, his Son, to draw us back to himself. If you believe that, God is already at work in your heart and will in time add to that faith a full measure of spiritual understanding.

Chapter 10.
His Own Received Him Not

John 1:11

The opening verses of John's Gospel have already introduced us to two very significant themes: the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the depravity of man. These themes are foils to one another. For in this magnificent prologue to the Gospel, the depravity of man is seen precisely in the fact that men failed to recognize the Lord Jesus Christ when he came among them. No sooner has this been said, however, than someone will ask, "But certainly there should be an exception to this blanket description of human depravity. Haven't you forgotten about the Jews, his own people? They had the prophecies of his coming; they had the law; they even had John the Baptist. He came to them especially. Surely they must have recognized him?" But John answers that this is no exception; for, "He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him" (John 1:11). In fact, John would say, it is in the light of this inexplicable rejection of Jesus by the Jews that we see the depravity of man most clearly.

From early Greek history comes the story of Agamemnon, the king who (according to Homeric lore) commanded the expedition against Troy. There were three great figures on the Greek side: Agamemnon, Achilles, and Odysseus. Of the three, only Agamemnon returned home quickly with honor after the long war. Achilles was killed at Troy. Odysseus returned only after many years of wandering and many hardships. Agamemnon alone returned in triumph and in safety. But then tragedy struck. For Agamemnon was killed by his wife, who had in the meantime proved unfaithful to him.

This was the great story of infidelity in ancient times. For most ancients it was the sum of perfidy. But it was far less significant and far less dramatic than the rejection of the Lord Jesus Christ by Israel. He had created them, called them into existence as a nation, and foretold his coming to them. Then, when he came, he was rejected by Israel and was crucified. John states it very simply. "He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him" (John 1:11). This is now the supreme demonstration of the wickedness of the heart of man.

Past History

This is not surprising, of course. For it was only an act illustrated many times previously in Jewish history. Indeed, throughout the Old Testament we find that the people of Israel despised the men who brought them the blessings of God and spoke for him, and they chose instead the counsels of their own hearts.

We see the principle first in the patriarchs. Abraham had been told by God that he and Sarah were to have a son through whom Abraham would become a great nation and all the families of the earth would be blessed. But Abraham followed his own way instead of God's. He had a son by Hagar, Sarah's Egyptian slave girl. When God came to him again to repeat the promise, Abraham replied, "If only Ishmael might live under your blessing!" (Gen. 17:18). His heart, like our hearts, did not naturally want God's way. In the same way, Isaac tried to bless Esau instead of Jacob, in spite of the fact that God had chosen Jacob to carry on the line of Israel. God was obliged to overrule him. A generation later we find the sons of Jacob trying to murder their brother Joseph because God had revealed that he was going to exalt Joseph and use him for a special purpose.

Moses was the first leader to find out what this tendency on the part of the people was to mean nationally. God had delivered them from Egypt and had done so through ten great miracles, beginning with the changing of the waters of the Nile into blood and ending with the death of Egypt's firstborn. But the people had no sooner left Egypt—in fact, they had not yet crossed the Red Sea—than they began to murmur against Moses and the Lord. They said, "Was it because there were no graves in Egypt that you brought us to the desert to die? What have you done to us by bringing us out of Egypt? Didn't we say to you in Egypt, 'Leave us alone; let us serve the Egyptians'? It would have been better for us to serve the Egyptians than to die in the desert!"

(Exod. 14:11-12). Later, when they were actually in the wilderness, they rebelled again, crying, "You have gone too far! The whole community is holy... why then do you set yourselves above the LORD'S assembly?" (Num. 16:3).

When Jeremiah preached to the southern kingdom of Judah the people said, "We will not listen to the message you have spoken to us in the name of the LORD!" (Jer. 44:16). When Amos came to Bethel to preach against the corruption of the northern kingdom, Amaziah, the court priest, reported his activities to the king saying, "Amos is raising a conspiracy against you in the very heart of Israel" (Amos 7:10). He told Amos, "Get out, you seer! Go back to the land of Judah. Earn your bread there and do your prophesying there. Don't prophesy anymore at Bethel, because this is the king's sanctuary and the temple of the kingdom" (Amos 7:12-13).

Christ's Parable

When the Lord Jesus Christ came he was received with the same contempt and disdain. Thus, toward the end of his ministry but before his crucifixion he summed up their reaction in the parable of the landowner and his vineyard.

"There was a landowner who planted a vineyard. He put a wall around it, dug a winepress in it and built a watchtower. Then he rented the vineyard to some farmers and went away on a journey. When the harvest time approached, he sent his servants to the tenants to collect his fruit. "The tenants seized his servants; they beat one, killed another, and stoned a third. Then he sent other servants to them, more than the first time, and the tenants treated them the same way. Last of all, he sent his son to them. 'They will respect my son,' he said.

"But when the tenants saw the son, they said to each other, 'This is the heir. Come, let's kill him and take his inheritance.' So they took him and threw his out of the vineyard and killed him. "Therefore, when the owner of the vineyard comes, what will he do to those tenants?"

"He will bring those wretches to a wretched end," they replied, "and he will rent the vineyard to other tenants, who will give him his share of the crop at harvest time." Jesus said to them, "Have you never read in the Scriptures:

"'The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone; the Lord has done this and it is marvelous in our eyes'?

"Therefore I tell you that the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit."

Matthew 21:33-43

Later we read that when "the chief priests and Pharisees heard Jesus' parables, they knew he was talking about them" (v. 45).

In this parable God himself is the householder. The earth is the vineyard. The people of Israel are the tenant farmers. The prophets are the servants who came with the Lord's message and were beaten, stoned, and murdered. The son is the Lord Jesus Christ. The murder of the son is Christ's crucifixion. The casting out of the wicked servants is the replacement of Israel as a special people by the Church in this age of Gentile blessing. Clearly this is a picture in the Lord's own language of the truths preserved for us in John's prologue. "He [Jesus] was in the world, and though the world was made through him, the world did not recognize him. He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him. Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (John 1:10-12).

No Excuse

At this point we naturally want to go on to describe the free offer of the gospel to people in our age. But before we do we need to answer one more objection. It is an important objection. Someone will say, "But surely they must have had an excuse? There must have been a failure of communications." But this is only the way men think, not God, and the objection is invalid.

Men are always ready to make excuses for their conduct, even when it is obviously wrong. Sometime ago I heard a story of a little boy who was at home several days before Christmas and who knew that all the presents had been brought in and were hidden away in his father's closet. He was not supposed to go into that closet. But the time came when he could no longer resist the temptation. So he slipped up to his father's room, opened the closet door, and began pulling the presents out and unwrapping them. Suddenly, in the midst of his unwrapping, he heard the front door open and his father's footsteps ascending the stairs. Quickly he pushed the wrappings inside the closet. Then, since he had nowhere else to go, he stepped in after them and closed the door.

He stood there breathless as his father entered the room and approached the closet. When his father opened the door, there he stood with wrapping paper all around him, feeling guilty. His father asked, "What are you doing here?" And the little boy said, "Everybody's got to be someplace."

That is a revelation of the human heart. We make excuses for our conduct. But God will not allow us to get away with excuses and will force us instead to face up to the reality of our situation. Thus, we are not allowed to make excuses for any rejection of the Lord Jesus Christ on the part of Israel.

We say, "But surely there must have been an excuse for Israel." But there was no valid excuse. And there is no excuse for people who reject the Lord Jesus Christ today. Think of the reasons why Israel should have recognized their Messiah. In the first place, they had the prophecies of his coming. These included the prophecies of his suffering and death just as much as the forecast of his glorious reign.

They are found in Psalm 22, Isaiah 53, and so on. Like all men, Israel found what they wanted to find in the Word of God and ignored the rest. They opened the Old Testament: there were the prophecies that told how the Messiah was to be beaten and killed, bearing the iniquities of the people. They should have understood, for they had the history of the sacrifices in Israel to help them interpret these things. Yet they flipped over these pages and instead chose ones that spoke of Christ's triumph. That they talked about and anticipated.

Also they had the evidence of Christ's miracles. To some extent the evidential value of the miracles is overrated by Christians; that is, the miracles are taken as having more value in leading a person to faith in Christ than they were intended to have. People have said that the miracles prove Christ's divine origin, but that does not necessarily follow. For one thing, in Christ's own day some saw his miracles and attributed them to Satan, and even Jesus did not deny that as a possible conclusion. He only pointed out that it was invalid in his case since his miracles were directed against the power of Satan himself. For another thing, the miracles do not in themselves prove any more than that Jesus was a miracle worker.

For the gentile world, then, the miracles are of only very limited value and interest. But this is not the case within Judaism. In Judaism the miracles had exceptional value. And this was true precisely because they were prophesied in the Old Testament about the Messiah. When Jesus came he fulfilled them; thus, he should have been recognized by Israel on this basis.

It was just as though a spy, who wanted to be able to identify a person bearing a message from his friend, should tear a dollar bill in half and give one half to his friend to be given later to the messenger. When the messenger came, the two halves of the dollar bill would be matched perfectly. In the same way, God declared beforehand to Israel what the Messiah would do. When Jesus came he did it, miracles and all. Thus, they should have received him. Interestingly enough, this was precisely the argument that Jesus used with the disciples of John the Baptist who came to him at one point with John's question, "Are you the one who was to come, or should we expect someone else?" (Luke 7:20). Jesus answered, "Go back and report to John what you have seen and heard: The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the good news is preached to the poor. Blessed is the man who does not fall away on account of me" (vv.. 22-23). In other words, "You may judge by that whether or not I am fulfilling Scripture."

The third reason why the Jews of Christ's day should have believed on him is the ministry of John the Baptist. John was an extraordinary figure, and he attracted a great deal of attention, so much so, in fact, that the leaders of the nation sent priests and Levites to ask him if he was himself the Messiah. This was an official delegation, and John's answer was an official response. He said, "I am not the Christ." The following day he pointed to Jesus and said, "Look, the Lamb of God." Israel should have followed John's testimony and received Jesus.

All Are Guilty

But where does this leave us—in some sort of privileged, protected position? Can we say, "Well, the Jews are guilty, but thank God we're not like that"? Not at all. In fact, if we really understand the Jews' reaction, we will understand the Gentiles' reaction also. And we will learn that the reaction of Israel is only typical of the reaction of all mankind to Christ's coming.

The Jews had prophecies of Christ's coming, but so does the world today. In fact, the Scriptures of the Old Testament are far more widely translated and circulated in our age than in any age previously. And for us there is the added advantage that we are told in the New Testament how Jesus of Nazareth fulfilled them. The Jews of Jesus' day saw the miracles, but we also have a record of the miracles. What is more, we have evidence of the miraculous power of Jesus Christ in the lives of countless millions of Christians, many of whom have demonstrated Christ's ability to be victorious in them over the worst that life can offer. Finally, we also have the witness of John the Baptist and of that great host of men and women since him whose lives have been transformed by Jesus and who have been called by him to proclaim the eternal gospel.

Where do you stand? If you are running away, saying, "Well, those things are interesting as myths or stories, but I won't take them seriously," you are trying to escape reality. You cannot get away with it permanently. You must face these truths now or at the judgment seat of Christ. On the other hand, you need not continue to run. You need not be identified with those, both Jews and Gentiles, who will not receive Christ. Receive him, and thereby become a child of God by faith in his name.

Chapter 11.
The Free Offer of the Gospel

John 1:12

We have seen two very important themes in the prologue to John's Gospel: the glory of Jesus Christ, and the depravity of man. The glory of Jesus is described in verses 1-9. The depravity of man is shown by man's rejection of Jesus when he came. These two themes leave us at the end of verse 11, with a very depressing picture. Men as a whole did not know Jesus; and, by and large, his own people, the Jews, who should have known better, rejected him. Are we to think then that no one believed? No, that would be a false inference. So John hurries to point out that although the Lord of glory was unknown by the world at large and was rejected by the nation of Israel, nevertheless, there were some who did receive him. He writes, "Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (John 1:12).

This is a glorious verse, especially since it comes, as it does, after the dismal picture of the preceding verses. It is a verse for you personally. It reminds us here at the very beginning of the Gospel—even before the account of the crucifixion and the resurrection—that the gospel of salvation by grace apart from the keeping of the law is today offered freely to all men, and it points to the glorious privilege of those who receive it.

God's Children

We need to look at this statement in parts, beginning with the part declaring that those who believe become God's children. How are we to understand this? If we are to understand it rightly, we need to recognize first that people are not (or do not become) God's children naturally. The ideas of the universal fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man have been popular themes in the past. But this is not biblical teaching. It is true that Paul told the men of Athens: "We are his offspring" (Acts 17:28), but that is not the same thing as saying that we are God's legitimate children. And what is more, in that verse Paul was actually only quoting a Greek poet, either Aratus or Cleanthes, obviously in order to establish a point of contact with his Greek hearers. In his own teaching, by contrast, he stresses that we become God's children only by means of the new birth.

It is also true that there are verses in the Old Testament that speak of the nation of Israel as God's child or of the Jews as God's children. In Exodus 4:22 Israel is called the "firstborn" son of God. David says in the Psalms: "As a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear him" (Ps. 103:13). Isaiah has written, "O LORD, you are our Father" (Isa. 64:8). Jeremiah says, "I thought how I would set you among my sons, and give you a pleasant land, a heritage most beauteous of all nations. And I thought you would call me, My Father, and would not turn from following me. Surely, as a faithless wife leaves her husband, so have you been faithless to me, O house of Israel, says the LORD" (Jer. 3:19-20 RSV). Although this is true, we must note that these verses are not talking about the Babylonians, Egyptians, Syrians, or even Americans. They are talking about God's relationship to Israel and, thus, about a special relationship that they had to God and that was possessed by no other people at that time. Moreover—and this is much to the point—not one of these verses makes the relationship of father to son the relationship of God to any individual Israelite.

The true biblical teaching is seen most clearly in the great discussion of this theme by Jesus Christ as recorded in the eighth chapter of the Gospel. The starting point of the discussion, as John records it, was the question of freedom. Jesus had said, "Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:32). Because this was a touchy theme in a country that was then under the rule of the Roman armies, Jesus' Jewish hearers reacted to Christ's words violently, saying, "We are Abraham's descendants and have never been slaves of anyone. How can you say that we shall be set free?" (v. 33). Jesus did not bother to refute their absurd contention although he could have. They had been slaves to the Egyptians, Babylonians, Syrians, Moabites, Edomites, Ammonites, Philistines, Greeks, and Romans. There had almost never been a power in the ancient Near East to which they had not been in bondage at some time or other. But Jesus did not speak about this. He was speaking of a slavery to sin.

Even this was a sore spot with Jesus' hearers, as it is to people today. So they answered by becoming vicious, probably accusing Jesus of being illegitimate. "We are not illegitimate children," they protested. "The only Father we have is God himself (v. 41). At this point Jesus nailed down the whole subject by denying that they were in any sense God's children. For, "If God were your Father, you would love me.... You belong to your father, the devil, and you want to carry out your father's desire" (vv. 42, 44).

Now if the Jews, who had a special historical relationship to God, could not be called his children even by Jesus Christ, who was himself a Jew, how much less can this be true of the rest of us. It is true that not all men are children of the devil. A person becomes a child of the devil in the same way that another becomes a child of God; that is, by a moral commitment to him and to his principles. Nevertheless, a man is not naturally a child of the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ either. According to the Bible he becomes a child of God only through a new birth.

By Whose Authority?

The second important part of the verse is the part that declares that we become God's children not on the basis of any human authority but on the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ. The verse says, "Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God."

The importance of this is that it gives the one who believes on the Lord Jesus Christ great boldness. On one of the military campaigns of the emperor Napoleon, when Napoleon had dropped the reins of his horse in order to read papers, the horse reared up and nearly unseated him. A corporal of the grenadiers, a very lowly soldier, leaped forward and caught the bridle of the emperor's horse so that in a few seconds he had brought the animal under control. Napoleon turned to the corporal and said, "Thank you, Captain."

"Of what company, sire?" asked the soldier who had just been called a captain.

"Of my guards," answered Napoleon.

In an instant the young man threw aside his musket and walked across the field toward the headquarters of the general's staff, tearing off his corporal's stripes as he went. He took his place among the emperor's officers. Someone asked what he was doing, and he replied that he was a captain of the guards.

"By whose authority?" they asked him.

"By the authority of the emperor," the young man answered.

It all depends upon the authority of the commander involved. If one of the soldier's friends had called him a captain, the two corporals might have had a good laugh together, but that would have been all. The title bestowed by the friend would have meant nothing. However, when the emperor gave the order, the corporal seized upon it instantly and was then received as a captain by the staff. In the same way, our position before God as God's children depends upon the highest authority in the universe, the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings and Lord of lords, before whom every knee shall bow. And we can be as bold in seizing our rank as Napoleon's soldier was.

Will we step back into the ranks and boast, "Jesus has called me God's child," but fail to assume the privileges and responsibilities of that position? Or will we take him at his word and come to God to enjoy all the privileges of being his own? If you have believed on the Lord Jesus Christ and understand this verse properly, then you will come to God as his child with great boldness.

Faith in Christ

At this point someone might say, "That is wonderful. It must be a great privilege to be God's child. But how do I become God's child? How does this special relationship become mine?" The answer, which is the same answer given throughout the New Testament, is that you become a child of God through faith. This means that you must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and also believe that by means of his death and resurrection he is your Savior.

The letter to the Hebrews says: "Without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6). Romans tells us that "a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith'" (Rom. 1:17). Ephesians says, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith" (Eph. 2:8). In Romans 10 we read, "If you confess with your mouth, Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (vv. 9-10). It is the same in the opening verses of John's Gospel.

There is one more truth to be seen. When you believe in Jesus Christ there must be also a verbal expression of that belief. The Bible does not acknowledge any such thing as secret discipleship. On the contrary, it teaches that Christ must be professed publicly. The reason, of course, is that verbal testimony indicates the reality of that faith, just as the cry of the newborn child reveals the existence of life to the doctor and the mother. The verses just quoted, Romans 10:9-10, say that if we "confess" with our mouth the Lord Jesus and "believe" in our hearts that God has raised him from the dead we shall be saved. Confession is proof that belief in the Lord Jesus Christ is genuine.

Have you confessed your faith in the Lord Jesus Christ publicly? One of the most famous characters in the New Testament was a man who came to Jesus by night and held a long conversation with him, yet left Christ's presence without any outward confession of faith. As a result, we do not know whether he was genuinely converted or not. His name was Nicodemus.

Nicodemus came to Jesus as a result of Christ's preaching, as many people travel to hear great preaching today. We know this because he referred to Christ's teaching and miracles in his opening remarks: "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him" (John 3:2). In other words, he was very impressed. This alone was no evidence of his conversion, however, and Christ's reply to him was in essence a rebuke. The one thing that Jesus was not was a teacher sent from God. There had been thousands of teachers sent from God in the previous history of the world, and there have been thousands of teachers since. He was not one of them. He was God sent to teach, and to die, and to rise again. So he corrected Nicodemus by telling him that unless he was born again, he would never be able to understand things that were spiritual.

Nicodemus was puzzled. "How can a man be born when he is old?" he asked. "Surely he cannot enter a second time into his mother's womb to be born!" (v. 4). Jesus answered by showing that the new birth was spiritual and that it would express itself as faith in his death and resurrection.

How much of this entered into the heart of Nicodemus? We do not know, for Nicodemus left no outward expression of his belief. He had heard great preaching, but so have thousands of other unbelievers. Later he would say to the Jewish leaders who were plotting against Jesus, "Does our law condemn anyone without first hearing him to find out what he is doing?" (John 7:51). But many unbelievers have argued for the due process of law and for civil liberties. We even see him bringing spices to Joseph of Arimathaea in order to embalm the body of Jesus on the day of his crucifixion (John 19:39), but many a guilty, unbelieving conscience has donated a stained-glass window or a chapel to Jesus.

Was he one of God's children? We do not know. His witness to the Lord of glory is missing, and we search in vain for his confession.

How different, on the other hand, is the account John gives us of the woman of Samaria, just one chapter later. Donald Grey Barnhouse, in Epistle to the Romans, has pointed out that the contrast between these two personalities is striking. "The one is the story of a man, the other of a woman. The one is seemingly a seeker, the other is found by Christ, almost by accident, but definitely by design. The first was a Jew, the second a Samaritan. The one was an aristocratic Pharisee, the other a village harlot. The one wanted Jesus to talk to him, the woman tried to avoid the probing truth and attempted to change the subject. The one came at midnight, the other at noon."

Both Nicodemus and the woman heard great truths during their conversation with the Lord Jesus, but the effect of his words on them was different. Nicodemus questioned Christ, but he showed no verbal response to Christ's teaching. The woman tried to evade Christ's questions. But at last she believed and thereafter showed signs of her faith and transformation. Who was Jesus? To the woman he was revealed to be God's Messiah. So we read, "Then, leaving her water jar, the woman went back to the town and said to the people, 'Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?'" (John 4:28, 29). We are told that the men then went to Jesus and asked him to remain with them, and that as the result of his words and of the testimony of the woman many others believed in him also.

The importance of public confession arising out of true faith in the Lord Jesus Christ can hardly be overestimated. It is true that there is a type of confession that is insincere. It is this type of confession that the apostle James refers to when he speaks of a faith without works that is dead (James 2:20, 26). But there is also a sincere confession that will always arise out of a life transformed by Jesus. Have you told others of your faith in him?

Chapter 12.
Rebirth

John 1:13

Several years ago I talked to a young man who was experiencing many difficulties in his life. He had difficulties with his family, in his work, and in many of his social relationships. He was at that time involved in an extramarital relationship. As I talked with him I discovered that he tended to blame all his troubles on his background and his birth. According to him the fault lay with his parents, and with his place in society. To this young man I had the opportunity of pointing out that, no matter what his birth may or may not have been, there was always the possibility of a new birth through faith in Jesus Christ.

This great possibility, the possibility of beginning anew, is something that came into the world with the Lord Jesus. It is one of the main themes of John's Gospel. Thus, in John 1:12-13, where John has been speaking of the ones who believed in the Lord Jesus Christ when he came, he adds in the same connection that the ones who received him did so because they had experienced rebirth. He writes that these were "born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God" (John 1:13).

Not of Blood

Before we can speak about the possibilities of the new birth, we need to look first at the ways in which a person cannot be born again. We need to do this to clear away false ideas that hinder our understanding of this aspect of God's truth. Sometimes it is imperative that we do this. If you were a building contractor and wanted to build a twenty-story building in the heart of New York City on a lot that already had a two-story brownstone on it, you would have to go with your bulldozers to clear away the brownstone before you could erect the higher building. It is the same in theology. Thus, in order to build an enduring structure of God's truth regarding the new birth, it is necessary to clear away the false ideas that some men and women have about it.

One false idea confuses spiritual birth with physical birth—the mistake of Nicodemus (John 3:4). It is the thought that a person can be reborn by means of some human agency. To deny this false premise is the main burden of our text, for the verse tells us that it is "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man"—all human agencies—that a man is reborn, "but of God" (KJV).

We need to look at each of these three negative phrases individually. What does John mean when he says that we are not born into God's family by "blood"? The various commentators on this verse are fairly well agreed that it refers to physical birth. We would not refer to human birth in this way in English idiom, of course, but the reference is a natural one in the thought patterns of Judaism. For instance, in Leviticus 17:11, we read, "For the life of a creature is in the blood." This means that in Jewish thought, to refer to blood was nearly the equivalent of referring to human life. Thus, to deny that spiritual birth comes by blood is to deny that it can come about by any process of human regeneration.

I have said that we would not refer to human birth in this way in English. Yet there is a way of speaking that comes quite close. We speak of a person's "noble blood." Or we call someone a "blue blood," meaning that he comes from a privileged position in society. If we were, therefore, to use this idiom to express our denial of the first of these false ideas, we could say that no one is able to claim a position in God's family on the basis of his relationship to the important people of this earth. Even the children of Martin Luther or John Calvin or John Wesley were not saved on the basis of their family relationships. Kings as well as paupers need to confess with their mouths the Lord Jesus and believe on him with their hearts.

A great example of people believing they are right with God because of their birth is the Jews. In Christ's time they boasted to him of their physical ancestry, saying, "We are children of Abraham." How proud they were of that! Abraham had received the promises and the covenant from God, so they naturally thought they had it made just because they were descended from him physically. Jesus pointed out, however, that God was interested in a spiritual relationship and that they were indicating by their actions that they were really children of the devil.

In what are you trusting for your salvation from sin and for a right relationship with God? This verse was written to teach you that, among other things, you must not make the mistake of trusting in the fact that your parents were Christians, or that you were born in a so-called Christian country. The Bible teaches that nothing that relates to your physical birth will save you.

An Emotional High

The second negative phrase in our text is "nor of the will of the flesh." What does this mean?

Various explanations of this phrase have been given. One of the earliest was that of St.

Augustine, who took the phrase "not of blood" to refer to human birth (as we have already done ourselves), the phrase "nor of the will of the flesh" to refer to the woman's part in reproduction, and "nor of the will of man" to refer to the man's part in procreation. But these last two points seem to me highly unlikely. And so, too, do views that see it as a reference to adoption (Luther), the sensual imagination (Godet), or willpower (Calvin).

The clue to the true meaning of this phrase is to be found in all that is signified by the word "flesh" in the New Testament. The New Testament uses the word "flesh" to signify all that we are in terms of our natural appetites. This involves our emotions. Hence, John is saying that a person cannot become a child of God by exercising his emotions any more than he can become God's child by being born of privileged parents.

Many people believe themselves to be Christians simply because they get an emotional kick out of attending a certain kind of church service. This comprises much of popular religion today, and it is also a fair description of the kind of mystical religion that is connected with the drug cult. Are such experiences valid? Not according to the teaching of the Bible! The Bible teaches that a surge of the emotions does not produce rebirth. You can be moved to tears in a meeting, but that alone will not transform you into one of God's children.

Not by Determination

There is also a third phrase. For God not only says that those who become his children are not born by blood or by the will of the flesh, they also are not born by the will of man. This means that no one can become a child of God by determination or by the powers of positive thinking.

Someone may say, "But certainly a man can get ahead in life by the power of human determination? In this life, yes, but not spiritually. It is possible for a man with a powerful will to move ahead in this world. He may start from a family that has nothing to offer him either in terms of this world's goods or in basic values or encouragement. He may have no education or skills. Nevertheless, he can set doggedly to work, earning a living by day and going to school at night. In this way he can earn a high school diploma, and later a B.A. or a B.S. When he finishes that, he can use his training to get a good job to earn more money. He can collect a fortune and use his fortune to launch himself in politics. From there, he could move from alderman to mayor, to state senator, to United States congressman, and perhaps even to president! A man can do that by willpower, plus (we must admit it) a little "luck."

In the same way a man can achieve certain things for himself morally and ethically. He can found a new religion. But even this will not make him a child of God. In order to become a child of God a man needs to be given God's life, and this comes only from God and is imparted to a man only on the basis of God's grace. The Bible says, "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (James 1:18). It is true that a person must believe in Jesus Christ in order to become a Christian. John says that Jesus gives power to become children of God "even to them that believe on his name." You must believe. At the same time, however, you must know that if you do believe, it is only because God has already taken the initiative to plant his divine life within you. In other words, you must learn that man never makes the first move toward God and that no one would be saved unless God operated in this way.

God's Children

Moreover, isn't this exactly why the Bible speaks of our conversion to Christ as rebirth? Why does God use this image? He could have said merely that we must gain an intellectual understanding of these things. That would be legitimate in some sense, because an intellectual understanding is part of it. He could have said that we must attain a certain degree of commitment. The idea of commitment is valid. Instead, God, in the Bible, speaks of life—eternal life—and rebirth. Jesus told Nicodemus, "You must be born again." Clearly God uses this image because it alone shows that the initiative lies with the Father entirely and not with the son or the daughter who is engendered.

What did you have to do with your birth? Did you say, "I would like to be a boy and be born to Mr. and Mrs. Smith; they seem like a nice couple"? Did you say, "I'd like to be a girl, five feet, six inches tall, and have blond hair"? Of course, you didn't! You had absolutely nothing to do with it! Instead, your father met your mother and between them they produced you, and you only realized what had happened afterward. It is obvious, therefore, that when God uses this image he does so to show that he alone is responsible for your salvation and that you believe only because he first created the life within you to do it. Many verses support this truth by showing that the basis of our sonship lies in God's electing love. John writes: "How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!" (1 John 3:1). Paul declares that God has "predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ" (Eph. 1:5). James says, "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth" (James 1:18).

There are reasons why God has done things in this manner, of course, and the first reason is simply that we might become aware of God's great love and mercy and serve him because of it. In other words, we are to read a passage like Romans 9:14-16—"What then shall we say? Is God unjust? Not at all! For he says to Moses, 'I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion.'"—and we are to say, "Lord God, if it is not of anything human but solely of your mercy that we are saved, then how great is your mercy!" We are to serve him better because of it.

Many people (even Christians) will not like what I am saying because it detracts from man's efforts. But that is exactly the point. The biblical doctrine of rebirth takes everything away from man and gives everything to God. It is the principle of the "seesaw" in theology. It is the principle that you cannot have both ends of the seesaw—God and man—up at the same time. You know how a seesaw operates. When Johnny is at the bottom, Suzie is at the top. And when Suzie is down, Johnny is up. In the same way, you can never have God and man up or down at the same time. If you exalt man in your thinking so that he is able to take care of himself spiritually and eventually inch his way into heaven, then God will be down and there will not be much need for him. But if man is down where he should be and where the Bible places him, dead in trespasses and sins, with a depraved will and utterly without any genuine spiritual potential, then God will be up where he belongs. He will be great and mighty and altogether lovely, as he is. And the Christian, who has come to see these things, will look up from the dung heap of this world, still covered with much of the world's refuse, and say, "Oh, my God, how could you love me?" And when he gets to that point the love of Christ will begin to constrain him, and he will begin to learn that God has set things up this way so that it will be with the bonds of love and not the whip of the law that we are drawn to holiness through the Lord Jesus Christ.

We have this thought stated in the fourth stanza of that great hymn written by Isaac Watts, "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross":

> Were the whole realm of nature mine,
> That were a present far too small,
> Love so amazing, so divine,
> Demands my soul, my life, my all.

The Uncommitted

It is a pity that we are not able to give an exposition of the whole Gospel of John at one time, because someone could conceivably stop at this point and go away, saying, "Well, then, there is nothing for us to do at all." But I am not saying exactly that. I am saying that the initiative is with God in salvation, and that no one—absolutely no one!—would believe in the Lord Jesus Christ unless God had taken the first step by planting his own life within those persons. At this point, however, I must add (and, indeed, I will be adding it more and more as we go on in our studies) that when God does take the first step in saving us, we then become what I would call "free spiritual agents" so that thereafter we are able to obey him and follow his leading. By our rebirth we are initiated into an entirely new series of relationships and duties within his family.

No one who has believed on Jesus Christ is to take these doctrines as an excuse for going out and living as he or she pleases. Paul says, "God forbid" that any true child of God should do that. At the same time, it should not be an excuse for spiritual inactivity on the part of the uncommitted either. Every time I come to such themes and preach them I know that there will be some persons who will react by saying, "Well, if the entire initiative is with God in salvation, then I obviously can do nothing. I'll just sit back and wait to see if he will save me." That does not follow. It is true that you cannot give yourself divine life, but you can expose yourself to the claims of the Christian faith and ask God (if there is a God) to reveal himself to you.

Let me make two suggestions. If you have never honestly faced the claims of the Lord Jesus Christ and of Christianity, begin by reading a Gospel. It doesn't really matter which one, but John is an excellent one with which to start. Read it slowly, and ask yourself what kind of a man could speak and act as Jesus did and have the kind of effect he had upon his contemporaries. I can assure you that this will not be wasted motion, because God says that it is through reading the Word that one is converted. The Bible says that we are "born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23).

Second, you can pray. You do not even need to be convinced of God's existence to do this. For you can merely say, "God (if there is a God), I want you to know that I am an honest seeker after the truth concerning you—or at least I would like to be. And I know that I come to spiritual things as if I were blind. Still, I come. I am as open to the truth as I can be. If you exist, I want you to speak to me. And, furthermore, I want you to know that if you do exist and if you convince me that Jesus Christ is really your Son and died for my sin, then I promise to submit myself to him and follow him all the days of my life." That you can do if you are an honest seeker after truth. If you do that, God will already have taken the initiative in saving you and will already be leading you out of darkness into his light.

Chapter 13.
God with Us

John 1:14

I wish it were possible to approach John 1:14 as though reading it for the first time. The verse contains something that was new and quite startling when it was first written, and yet for us who read it nearly two thousand years later it has become commonplace. We read: "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth." This was the great sentence for which the Gospel of John was written. It tells us—inexplicable as it may be—that God became man. Nevertheless, because we have heard that verse from childhood, we read it and are often strangely unmoved.

The Church Fathers

Fortunately, we can capture a sense of the original, shattering newness of this sentence from the writings of the church fathers, particularly those who were converted to Christianity out of paganism. Augustine, who became the greatest theologian of the early church, was no mean scholar. He had drunk deeply at the spring of Platonic philosophy. He had spent years soaking up the religious and philosophical system of the Manichaeans. Yet, as he said later, although he had read all about the Word in non-Christian books—that the Word was God and had been active in the creation of the world—nevertheless, that the "Word became flesh" he had not read there.

Another church father, Junius the younger, has also written of his reaction to first reading these verses. "My father, who was frequently reading the New Testament, and had long observed with grief the progress I had made in infidelity, had put that book in my way in his library, in order to attract my attention, if it might please God to bless his design, though without giving me the least intimation of it. Here, therefore, I unwittingly opened the New Testament thus providentially laid before me. At the very first view, although I was deeply engaged in other thoughts, that grand chapter of the evangelist and apostle presented itself to me—'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was God.' I read part of the chapter, and was so affected that I instantly became struck with the divinity of the argument, and the majesty and authority of the composition, as infinitely surpassing the highest flights of human eloquence. My body shuddered. My mind was in amazement, and I was so agitated the whole day that I scarcely knew who I was. Nor did the agitation cease, but continued till it was at last soothed by a humble faith in him who was made flesh and dwelt among us."

This was the astounding new thing—that the Word of God could enter into our history as a man so that men could see him. In him men could behold God's glory.

He Pitched His Tent

Actually, as John wrote this verse he was doubtlessly referring to the great days of Israel's desert wanderings; and he was making the point that, although those days were great days for Israel, in our day something much better has happened. It involves all men. We know that John was making this contrast, because of an unusual word that occurs in the verse. In English it is the word "dwelling." We have it in the phrase, "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us." Literally, the phrase means "to dwell in a tent." So we could also translate the verse: "The Word became flesh, and pitched his tent among us," or "The Word became flesh, and tabernacled among us." This last translation is particularly significant because the word refers beyond any question to the portable wilderness tabernacle or temple of the Hebrew nation. The tabernacle was the center of their worship and the most important single object in their camp.

In all, the tabernacle was about forty-five feet long and about fifteen feet wide; that is, it was three times as long as it was wide. And it was divided into two distinct parts, the inner section being in the form of a square fifteen feet by fifteen feet, and the outer section being twice as long as it was wide. It was made of boards covered with curtains. The inner chamber contained the ark of the covenant. The outer chamber contained the golden altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the golden candlestick. This entire structure stood in a courtyard surrounded by curtains of pure linen rising to a height of over eight feet. The courtyard measured 175 feet long and about 87 feet wide. In the courtyard there was a great brazen altar for sacrifices and a laver for purifications.

Everything about the tabernacle—its dimensions, furnishings, colors, functions, and arrangement—was designed to communicate spiritual truth. Hence, many of its functions were previews of the functions Jesus Christ would fulfill when he eventually pitched his tent among us. We can list several of the more obvious parallels.

1. The tabernacle was the center of Israel's camp. We see this in the laws ordering the distribution of the various tribes in the Jewish encampment as recorded in the early chapters of the Book of Numbers. On the eastern side of the tabernacle were the tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun. These set out first when the nation began to break camp. On the south were Reuben, Simeon, and Gad. These marched second. After these tribes came the Levites, who surrounded the tabernacle in the encampment. Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin were on the west. Dan, Asher, and Naphtali always camped to the north. These came last when the people were on the move. We see this position of the tabernacle reinforced by the instructions given to the Levites for their place in the march; for we read in Numbers 2:17, "Then the Tent of Meeting and the camp of the Levites will set out in the middle of the camps. They will set out in the same order as they encamp, each in his own place under his standard." This is highly significant in reference to Jesus Christ, for he is the center of the Christian encampment. He is our gathering place. This is why Jesus could say, "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself (John 12:32). He told his disciples: "For where two or three come together in my name, there am I with them" (Matt. 18:20).

2. The tabernacle was the place where the law of Moses was preserved. The first two tables of stone, which had been given to Moses by God, were broken (Exodus 32); but the second set was deposited in the ark of the covenant within the Holy of Holies of the tabernacle for safekeeping. This also speaks to us of Christ Jesus. Speaking of his perfect obedience to God and of his perfect keeping of the law, the Lord Jesus Christ said, "for I always do what pleases him" (John 8:29). In the same manner Psalm 40 is prophesying Christ's perfect obedience when it reports him as saying, "I desire to do your will, O my God; your law is within my heart" (Ps. 40:8).

3. The tabernacle was the dwelling place of God. This was no doubt largely symbolic during the Old Testament period, although it was symbolized in a very striking way. Within the Holy of Holies, between the wings of the cherubim that stretched out over the covering of the ark of the covenant, there was the shekinah glory that symbolized God's presence. The shekinah was what we would call "light." At times it was hidden by the cloud that spread out over the tabernacle. At other times it flashed out in judgment against some evil in the camp of Israel. The glory within the Holy of Holies symbolized the presence of God. Thus, John, who knew that God had been revealed in the flesh in Jesus, could write, "We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father."

4. Because the tabernacle was the place where God dwelt among his people, it was also the place of revelation. It was the place where God met with men and spoke to them. For this reason the tabernacle was also called "the tent of meeting," a phrase that occurs scores of times in the Old Testament.

The second tabernacle, Jesus Christ, is the place where God meets with men today and speaks to them. If you have ever visited a mint, you know that the coins manufactured there are produced by large presses that stamp out a whole sheet of coins at one time. A sheet of silver or alloy is fed into the machine, there is a clump, and a shower of coins tumbles out into a basket. I am told that a skilled engraver can take a coin, examine it under a magnifying glass, and tell not only the actual die from which the coin came but even the condition of the die, which cannot be seen where it is within the press. It is on the basis of such an examination that the dies are replaced when they show signs of wear. In the same way, we cannot see God. The Bible reports God as saying to Moses: "You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live" (Exod. 33:20). Yet God is revealed to us perfectly in Jesus, in whom we see the Father. The Bible tells us that, like the coin from the mint, he is the "exact representation" of God's invisible person (Heb. 1:3).

5. The tabernacle was also the place where sacrifices were made. In the outer court of the tabernacle, on the east side near the only opening into the courtyard, stood the brazen altar on which sacrifices burned continually. For anyone approaching the tabernacle from outside, this was the first of the furnishings of the tabernacle seen by him. This was significant, for it indicated that there is no approach to God except by means of the sacrifice. "Without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness [of sin]" (Heb. 9:22; cf. Lev. 17:11). In the same way, today there is no approach to God except through faith in the sacrifice provided by Jesus Christ, who in the tabernacle of his flesh offered himself up on Calvary.

This is the answer to the supreme question of man in all ages of human history. It is far more important than any scientific question or political question. How can a sinful man, corrupt by nature, approach a holy God? We all need God, but how can we find him? How can we come close enough to him to understand him? How can we become acceptable before him? How can we know forgiveness for sin? How can we know God's peace? How can we find fellowship with the One in whom we live and move and have our being? The answer is in the tabernacle and in the Christ whom the tabernacle prefigures. At the cross of Christ the perfect sacrifice is performed; Jesus dies in our place. He is the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world. On the basis of his sacrifice, we who were once children of wrath have now become God's children and can approach God the Father.

6. Finally, the tabernacle was the place where the people of Israel worshiped. We worship in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ today. The people of Israel brought their sacrifices to the tabernacle, gave their gifts there, and asked their questions. On occasion they were summoned to hear the voice of God. Their priests ministered in the temple enclosure. In the same way, we gather around the person of our Lord, who regulates our worship and receives our homage. It is through Jesus alone that we have access by one Spirit unto the Father (Eph. 2:18).

Thou art the Way: to thee alone
From sin and death we flee;
And he who would the Father seek
Must seek him, Lord by thee.

Thou art the Truth:
Thy word alone True wisdom can impart;
Thou only canst inform the mind,
And purify the heart.

Thou art the Life; the rending tomb
Proclaims thy conquering arm,
And those who put their trust in thee
Nor death nor hell shall harm.

Thou art the Way, the Truth and the Life:
Grant us that Way to know,
That Truth to keep, that Life to win, Whose joys eternal flow.

Christ's Glory Beheld

The final point of our study is that when Jesus Christ pitched his tent among us, he did so in order that men and women might see him and thus come to know God. John indicates this when he observes: "And we beheld his glory."

This happened in a very literal way with the first disciples about whom John is certainly speaking in this verse, for they saw the glory of Jesus during the days of his flesh. We must not miss the point that John has constructed his account of the first momentous week in the earthly ministry of Jesus Christ to emphasize this great truth. Beginning with the nineteenth verse of this chapter, John begins an account of the most important events of seven consecutive days, beginning with the day on which John the Baptist received the delegation of priests and Levites from Jerusalem and ending on the day in which Jesus changed the water into wine at Cana of Galilee in the presence of his disciples. Significantly enough, the story of the wedding (and therefore also the story of the events of this first week) ends with the statement: "This, the first of his miraculous signs, Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. He thus revealed his glory, and his disciples put their faith in him" (John 2:11). This was the reason for his coming. He came that men might see his glory and believe on him.

It is also true, however, that the experience of the early disciples is duplicated in all who believe in the Lord of glory today, for Paul writes of the experience of all Christians when he says that "we, who with unveiled faces all reflect the Lord's glory, are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory, which comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:18).

Is that your experience? Have you beheld the glory of the eternal Son of God who tabernacled among us and who is revealed to us today by means of his Holy Spirit? If it is, then you are called upon to bear a witness to him, as John and the other disciples did. Can you testify to what he has done for you and in your life? I can testify to what Christ has done for me. I look at the second chapter of Ephesians and find myself placed among those who were "dead in ... transgressions and sins ... gratifying the cravings of our sinful nature and following its desires and thoughts" but of whom it can now be said, "But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions" (Eph. 6:16). He lifted my vision to see Christ, who is altogether lovely, and has drawn me toward himself with bonds of love, so that now I seek to serve him and exalt his name before men.

You say, "Is that something special?" Not at all. It is merely the experience of every true believer. To the giving of such a testimony each of us is called. What a vision! The glory of Jesus Christ! What a task! To make him known to a darkened and sinful world!

Chapter 14.

Grace and Truth

John 1:14

Dr. Francis Schaeffer, founder of the L'Abri Fellowship in Switzerland, tells a story about a prominent American government leader. He had been invited to address a group of student leaders in Washington and had chosen to speak on the theme of restoring values in our culture.
When he had finished there was a moment of silence. Then one student arose—a man from Harvard University—and asked, "Sir, upon what base do you build your values?" It was a brilliant question but a tragic moment for the speaker, for he simply looked down and replied, "I do not know." Here was a man who was calling upon the youth of America to return to a system of moral values, but he was offering them nothing to build upon. As Dr. Schaeffer remarks, he was a man trying to tell his hearers not to steal the company funds and run off to Morocco and yet giving no reason why they should not.

We miss the point of the illustration if we think that the experience of the speaker was unique. It is not unique at all. In fact, it is typical of millions of persons in our day who earnestly want to believe in a system of values and yet have no real basis for their beliefs. They are confused about life. They do not know what is right or wrong, true or false. They want to believe that there is a thing called truth. They want to believe that there is a God who is full of love and is gracious. They want to believe that life has meaning. But they have no valid basis for any of these beliefs. To these people the Bible speaks with special relevance when it says that there is a basis for the demands of ethics, belief in goodness, and truth.

What is the basis? This is the point of what is perhaps the most important theological statement in John's Gospel, the statement contained in the verse that we have already been considering: "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14). The verse states that Jesus Christ is the basis on which we can know that God is good and that the universe has meaning.

God's Grace

The first thing that John says was revealed in Jesus Christ was grace, God's grace. Because of this we know that God is gracious. What is grace? Grace is simply the unmerited favor of God toward humanity. The New Scofield Bible says, "Grace is the kindness and love of God our Savior toward man." Dr. Harry A. Ironside wrote, "Grace is the very opposite of merit. ...Grace is not only undeserved favor, but it is favor shown to the one who has deserved the very opposite." The Bible expresses it when it says that "God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). In other words, God is gracious toward us, not on the basis of what we have done but solely because it is his nature to be gracious.

In one sense, of course, all men are recipients of God's grace. That is what theologians have called "common grace." When the human race sinned in Adam, the entire race came under judgment. The race deserved nothing. God did not owe it anything. If God had simply taken Adam and Eve in the moment they had sinned and cast them into the lake of fire, he would still have been just; and the angels could still have sung, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is , and is to come.

Revelation 4:8

Moreover, if God had allowed the race to increase to an extent similar to what it has increased to today, and then had brushed it aside into everlasting torment and judgment, God would have been just even then. This is a most important truth. God does not owe man anything. Consequently, all the blessings that people enjoy are the result of God's grace.

Let me put this as clearly as I am able to before we move on. If you are not a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, you are a recipient of God's common grace whether you acknowledge it or not. If you enjoy good health, that is common grace. If you are not on the poverty rolls but instead enjoy the comfort of a home and plenty to eat, that is common grace. If you have a good job and are able to hold it down because of your natural abilities and hard work, that is common grace. The list could be endless. There is no person living who has not been the recipient of God's common grace in some way. If you think that it is not of grace that you receive your blessings but that you deserve them, you are merely showing your ignorance of spiritual things.

Yet, if such grace is wonderful, the grace that is shown in Jesus Christ is even more wonderful. This is "saving grace," for this is a grace that does not spare men merely for a certain limited time; it redeems them for time and eternity. It transforms them from what the Bible calls "children of wrath" into God's sons.

A great example of such a transformation is John Newton. In his very early years Newton had been raised in a Christian home in England; but his parents died when he was only six years old and he was sent to live with an unbelieving relative. There Christianity was mocked, and he was abused. Finally, to escape these conditions, Newton ran away to sea, joining the British navy. He fell into gross sin; it gained a hold on him. He eventually deserted the navy and went to one of the worst areas of Africa. As he tells it, he went there for only one purpose and that was "to sin his fill."

In Africa Newton fell in with a Portuguese slave trader. When the trader went away on slavehunting expeditions, as he often did, the power in the compound passed to the slave trader's African wife. She hated white men and took out her venom on Newton. He was cruelly abused, so much so that at times he was forced to eat his food off the dusty floor like a dog.

After a time Newton fled from the compound and made his way to the coast, where he signaled a slave ship. The captain of the ship was disappointed at first when he learned that Newton had no ivory to sell. But when he found that Newton could navigate a vessel, he made Newton a shipmate. Even then Newton got into trouble. One day he broke into the ship's supply of rum and got so drunk that he fell overboard and would have drowned if an officer had not saved him by thrusting a harpoon into his thigh and hauling him back into the ship. The harpoon made such a wound that years later Newton could still put his hand into the fist-sized opening.

Near the end of one voyage, as they were nearing Scotland, the ship ran afoul of bad weather, was blown off course, and began to sink. Newton was sent down into the hold to work the pumps. He was terrified. He thought surely the ship would sink and he would drown. For days he worked the pumps, and as he pumped the water out of the hold he began to cry out to God. Bible verses about God's love and the death of Christ that he had heard as a child and thought he had forgotten came to his memory, and as he remembered them he was miraculously transformed. He was born again. When the storm had passed and he was again in England, he went on to become a highly educated preacher and teacher of the Word of God in that country, even preaching before the queen. It was of this storm and this conversion that William Cowper, the poet, wrote:

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.

Newton himself, who, through this experience, became in England a great proclaimer of God's grace, declared:

Amazing grace! How sweet the sound,
That saved a wretch like me!
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind but now I see.

Newton was a great preacher of grace, and the fact is not at all surprising. For he had learned, as all Christians have learned, that God is exceedingly gracious. He had been assured of this as he had thought upon the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ through whom God's grace is known.

Truth

The second aspect of God's nature that John speaks of in this verse is truth. John tells us that this too is revealed in Jesus Christ. Truth is a great word in John's writings. In all it occurs about twenty-four times. This is the first reference, and in almost every case (including this one) it is related to the character of God.

We find this in the rest of the Bible also. For instance, we read in Deuteronomy and Isaiah that God is truth (Deut. 32:4; Isa. 65:16). We read that God desires truth in our inward parts (Ps. 51:6). We are told that the Lord hates a lying tongue (Prov. 6:17). Jesus declared that he was himself the truth: "I am the way and the truth and the life" (John 14:6). Jesus called the Holy Spirit the Spirit of truth (John 14:17; 15:26; 16:13). He spoke of the Word of God as the truth (John 17:17). When we put all these statements together we find that God the Father is truth, that God the Son is truth, that God the Holy Spirit is truth, and that everything that takes its nature from God is also characterized by truth. In other words, truth is of the character of God. We who are Christians must, therefore, for that very reason, take our stand upon it.

We do not deal with the opinions of men when we deal with Christian doctrine. We deal with truth. Thus, a person's eternal destiny depends upon his relationship to the eternal truth in Jesus Christ.

I have been impressed by the extent to which we have seen the opposite of this in our day. That is, we have entered a period of history in which truth is supposed to be relative and in which no system of ideas is recognized by the majority of all men to be binding. I am impressed too by the fact that all the great present-day apologists have seen this.

One man who has been pointing this out is Francis A. Schaeffer. He points out that people no longer believe in truth. They did believe in truth before the impact of the philosophy of Hegel. In that day, if one fact was true, the opposite of that fact was believed to be false. There was antithesis, and what was true or false then was believed to be true or false forever. After Hegel, the idea grew that reality was to be represented not by what is true as opposed to what is false but rather by what is true now or, worse yet, by what is true only for the individual. Under this system my truth is not necessarily your truth, and what is true for me now may not be true for me tomorrow.

"But what does that mean for our day?" you may ask. The answer is that we are dealing with truth, real truth, when we present the claims of Jesus Christ and of Christianity. What happens most often when you testify to the saving power of the Lord Jesus Christ today? Isn't it true that the most common reaction is simply: "Fine; that's good for you. I'm glad it helps you, but, after all, what you say is only relatively true. If something else helps me, then that is perfectly valid also." This is the view we need to fight against.

C. S. Lewis is another Christian apologist who saw the changing attitudes toward truth. Here is an example of his insight from the first of The Screwtape Letters, in which a senior devil named Screwtape gives some basic instruction to a junior tempter named Wormwood: "I note what you say about guiding your patient's reading and taking care that he sees a good deal of his materialist friend. But are you not being a trifle naive? It sounds as if you supposed that argument was the way to keep him out of Enemy's clutches. That might have been so if he had lived a few centuries earlier. At that time the humans still knew pretty well when a thing was proved and when it was not; and if it was proved they really believed it. They still connected thinking with doing and were prepared to alter their way of life as the result of a chain of reasoning. But what with the weekly press and other such weapons we have largely altered that. Your man has been accustomed, ever since he was a boy, to have a dozen incompatible philosophies dancing about together inside his head. He doesn't think of doctrines as primarily 'true' or 'false,' but as 'academic' or 'practical,' 'outworn' or 'contemporary,' 'conventional' or 'ruthless.' Jargon, not argument, is your best ally in keeping him from the Church."

That is true. For today, even in the books of theology, we are presented with the idea that Christian doctrine is not so much true as it is helpful. And the conclusion is that you can take it or leave it, sift it or drop it, all according to its practical value to you personally. This is diabolical. It is not the philosophical basis of Christianity.

Instead, when you come to the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, you come to a declaration that certain things are really true for all time, whatever they may mean to you personally. And furthermore, we are told that it is on the basis of such truth that you as an individual will be forced to give a reckoning.

You say, "But what are these truths?" Let me give you a summary. First, there is the truth about man. We have been hearing for generations that man is doing better and better, and that given time enough things will turn out all right and all his problems will be solved. How foolish! Given enough time things will turn out exactly as they have been turning out since the beginning of the world. The reason for this is that there is something wrong in the heart of man. The Bible calls it sin. It may also be called rebellion, selfishness, pride, or any number of similar words. It is the same principle. The truth about man is that man carries his greatest problem about within him.

People always want to blame someone else, even the devil. There is a wonderful story about a little girl called Mary Ann who one day got into a fight with her brother. The mother stopped the fighting by yanking Mary up sharply and sitting her down in a corner. She asked, "Mary Ann, why did you let the devil put it into your heart to pull your brother's hair and kick his shins?" Mary Ann thought a minute and then said, "Well, maybe the devil did put it into my head to pull brother's hair, but kicking his shins was my own idea." That was tremendous theology, and it shows what is wrong with the world. It is not what the devil, the environment, or our history makes us do that makes the world such a bad place, but it is what we do. The truth about the problems of man is that man himself is the problem.

The second truth that we receive from Christianity is the truth about God. This is most necessary, for there are profound misconceptions about him. People think of God as removed, arbitrary, unconcerned, indulgent. But God declares that he is love and truth and justice and that he cares enough about men and women to die for them in order to bring them back to himself.

There is the truth about the atonement. People look to the death of Jesus and call it an example of a man who was deluded but who meant well. Others call it a tragedy. Some call it a demonstration of outstanding courage. That is not what the atonement means. It is true that there are aspects of Christ's death that relate to us as a moving example. Peter writes to encourage those who were suffering from persecution in his day, saying, "Christ suffered for you, leaving you an example" (1 Peter 2:21). But even as he says this he takes pains to point out the real meaning of the death of Christ by showing that it was essentially a death for others. "Christ suffered for you." And he immediately adds, as if to give that meaning, "He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness; by his wounds you have been healed" (1 Peter 2:24). That is the truth about the atonement. Christ died for us in order that "whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16).

Do you believe these things? The truth about them did not come to the world through philosophy or through any other form of human speculation. Truth came into the world through Jesus Christ. It is recorded for men in the Bible. Your eternal destiny will depend upon the way you respond to it and upon whether or not you will commit yourself to Jesus Christ. Will you do it? To do it is to learn that God is indeed gracious and to uncover the only valid basis for truth and sound morality.

Chapter 15.
The Unique Christ

John 1:15-18

In France every child who goes to Sunday school learns John 3:16, as children do the world over. He recites it like this: "Car Dieu a tant aimé le monde qu'il a donné son Fils unique." Literally translated this means: "For God loved the world so much that he gave his unique Son." Unique means being without a like or equal, single in kind or excellence, matchless. It is an important word, and it is particularly important at just this point in our study since it occurs twice in the space of five verses. In Greek the word is monogenes; the New International Version says "One and Only"; the French say unique. In each case, however, the same teaching is in view.

In verse 14 John speaks of having beheld Christ's glory, "the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father." In verse 18 we are told, "No one has ever seen God, but God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known." We see at once, then, that Jesus is unique because there is no one quite like him (in fact, with the exception of the Father himself, not at all like him) and because he can do for men what no one else can do.

Jesus is unique in every aspect of his being. He is unique in his person, birth, doctrine, works, miracles, death, resurrection, and future triumphs. In the verses that are included within these two uses of the word in John's first chapter (vv. 15-18), four things are singled out particularly: (1) Jesus is unique in his origins; (2) he is unique as the channel of God's blessings; (3) he is unique as the source of grace and truth; and (4) he is unique because he is the only one in whom you and I may see God. We need to look at each of these carefully.

Unique in His Origin

In the first place, Jesus Christ is unique in his origins, for John the Baptist, who is actually speaking these words, declares, "'This was he of whom I said, 'He who comes after me has surpassed me because he was before me'" (v. 15).

It is possible on a theoretical level at least that this verse could have three meanings. William Barclay points out that since Jesus was actually six months younger than John, the Baptist could be saying, "He who is my junior in age has been advanced before me." John could also be saying, "I was in the field before Jesus, I occupied the center of the stage before he did; my hand was laid to the work before his was; but all that I was doing was to prepare the way for his coming; I was only the advance guard of the main force and the herald of the king. "John could have been saying either of those two things. But in actual fact it is highly unlikely that these were any more than fleeting thoughts in his mind. John the Baptist was impressed with the uniqueness of Christ's person, and the phrase should therefore mean (as the evangelist intends it to mean) that Jesus was entirely without historical origins. He was preexistent. This is clearly the equivalent of declaring him to be God.

Unique in his origins! How exalted this makes the Lord Jesus! Donald Grey Barnhouse has written in The Cross through the Open Tomb: "The history of every other human being begins at birth: but the Lord Jesus Christ exists eternally as the Second Person of the Godhead. Before He was born at Bethlehem, He lived; He was one with the Father in essence and being. Before He came to earth as a baby, He walked among men and revealed Himself to them. The Old Testament, which was completed four centuries before His birth, contains many stories of His appearing among men before He came as babe, child, and man." Abraham saw Christ in his day; for Jesus declared, "Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad" (John 8:56). He later added, "before Abraham was born, I am" (v. 58). Isaiah saw Jesus when he had his vision of the Lord high and lifted up (vsa. 6:1-3), for John refers to this vision, saying, "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him" (John 12:41). There were others.

It is no wonder, therefore, that in almost every instance in which the writers of the New Testament refer in depth to Christ's person they refer almost instinctively to his preexistence. The author of Hebrews begins by writing: "In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, and through whom he made the universe" (Heb. 1:12). Paul in the Book of Philippians writes: "Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus: Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!" (Phil. 2:5-8).

Some people consider Jesus Christ only a man, and indeed he is a man. Some point to him only as an example, and he is that also. But if that is all you can see in Jesus Christ, then your view of him is entirely misleading. For the first and most important thing to be said about him is that he is without any historical beginnings and that this is the equivalent of calling him God. Everything he did and said takes its meaning from this great truth and flows from it.

Source of All Blessings

The second point made in these verses is that Jesus is the unique channel of all God's material and spiritual blessings. This is what is meant when we are told, "From the fullness of his grace we have all received one blessing after another" (v. 16).

On one level this verse is a statement that all men have been recipients of God's grace. This is "common grace," the type of grace discussed previously. Everything truly good that comes into your life—health, prosperity, knowledge, friendships, good times, whatever it is—comes from God. This is true whether or not you recognize him as the source of such blessings.

In the Book of Hosea there is a story that illustrates this truth. Hosea was a preacher, and God had told Hosea to marry a woman who was to prove unfaithful to him. He was to do this as an illustration of the relationship between God and Israel because God had taken Israel to himself as a wife and she had proved unfaithful spiritually. The object and goal of the illustration was that Hosea was to remain faithful to her and love her, even after she had left him, because God remains faithful even when people turn from him to serve other gods.

The time came, some years after Hosea's wife had left, that she fell into poverty and ended up living with a man who no longer had enough money to take care of her. At this point God said, "Hosea, I want you to go down to the marketplace and buy the things she needs, because that is the way I do with my people. They run away from me, and I pay the bills." So we read in Hosea, "Their mother has been unfaithful and has conceived them in disgrace. She said, 'I will go after my lovers, who give me my food and my water, my wool and my linen, my oil and my drink.' ...She has not acknowledged that I was the one who gave her the grain, the new wine and oil, who lavished on her the silver and gold" (Hos. 2:5, 8). So it is! We run from God, but he pays the bills; he still takes care of us. He takes care of you. We need to learn that Jesus Christ is unique as the source of all material and spiritual blessings, even when we fail to acknowledge his goodness or thank him for them.

There is another sense in which Jesus is the source of all blessing, however. He himself is a blessing; and the true Christian—not the non-Christian—has an opportunity to be enriched by him personally. We are apt to tire of his presence because of the sin in us and to be lured by the pleasures of the world. The world does have pleasures. The trouble is simply that they do not satisfy us long or satisfy us completely. They are much like a Chinese dinner: you eat it, it tastes good, but an hour later you are hungry again. Jesus Christ is not like that. He said, "If you are thirsty, come to me and I will give you satisfying water. If you are hungry come to me; I am the bread of life. He who drinks of me and feeds on me will never hunger and never thirst." Have you done that? Are you doing that today?

If you have once known the Lord Jesus Christ and have turned back to the world's pleasure for a time, I guarantee that the world will prove increasingly insipid and empty to you. One hymnwriter knew this experience at one point in his life, and he has left us a poignant verse about it. He wrote:

How tedious and tasteless
the hours When Jesus no longer I see!

Sweet prospects, sweet birds, and sweet flowers, Have all lost their sweetness for me!

Is that your experience? It need not be, for you can turn to Christ again and find him truly satisfying. Another hymn writer composed a verse which tells the other side of the story.

Hast thou heard Him, seen Him, known Him?
Is not thine a captured heart?
Chief among ten thousand own Him, Joyful, choose the better part.
What has stript the seeming beauty From the idols of the earth?
not a sense of right or duty,
But the sight of peerless worth.
Draw and win and fill completely, Till the cup o'er flow the brim;
What have we to do with idols Who have companied with Him?

Jesus! Unique in his origins, unique as the source of all material and spiritual blessings.

Knowledge of God

Finally, in verses 17 and 18 the apostle John records two other things about the uniqueness of Jesus. First, he says that Jesus is unique as the source of grace and truth. "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ" (v. 17).

This verse suggests a contrast that gives the words "grace and truth" a slightly different meaning than they had three verses earlier. The contrast is between the law with all its regulations and the new era of salvation by grace through faith apart from the works of the law that has come with Jesus Christ. It is a great contrast. Under the law, God demands righteousness from people; under grace, he gives it to people. Under law, righteousness is based on Moses and good works; under grace, it is based on Christ and Christ's character. Under law, blessings accompany obedience; under grace, God bestows his blessings as a free gift. The law is powerless to secure righteousness and life for a sinful race. Grace came in its fullness with Christ's death and resurrection to make sinners righteous before God.

Then, in the last place, we are told that the Lord Jesus Christ is unique because he is the only One in whom you and I may see God. John puts it like this: "No one has ever seen God, but God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known" (v. 18).

No one in the ancient world would have disagreed with the first part of that statement—"No one has ever seen God"—for, as William Barclay notes in his commentary, "In the ancient world men were fascinated and depressed and frustrated by what they regarded as the infinite distance and the utter unknowability of God. ...Xenophanes had said, 'Guesswork is over all.' Plato had said, 'Never man and God can meet.' Celsus had laughed at the way that the Christians called God 'Father,' because 'God is away beyond everything.' At the best, Apuleius said, men could catch a glimpse of God as a lightning flash lights up a dark night—one split second of illumination, and then the dark." Even the Jews would have thought this way, for they knew that God had spoken to Moses in the Old Testament, saying, 'You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live" (Exod. 33:20). There would have been no disagreement at all when John the Baptist declared that no one could see God.

Yet John did not stop with that statement. It is true that no man can see God and live, as God said to Moses; but it is also true that in Christ God came to men in a way that enabled men to know him. In Jesus Christ the character of God may be known. There is no true knowledge of God apart from him. Do you want to believe that God is loving? Good! But do not base your belief on some fantasy of your imagination. What could be less reliable than that? Instead, base it on the revelation of God's love in Christ and at Calvary. Do you want to believe that God is powerful, able to bring a transformation in your life? If so, do not depend on your own wishful thinking. Look to Jesus Christ. He will reveal it; because the same One who died for your sin also rose again in power and now lives to apply that same death-conquering power to the lives of those who follow him. Are you searching for wisdom? Look to the One who has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our "righteousness, holiness and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30).

Three Problems

What is your reaction to these things? Do you know the truth of them personally? One of the most memorable sermons that I have ever come across was preached by the late Emil Brunner at the Fraumünster Kirche in Zurich, Switzerland. It was based on the phrase "faith, hope, and love." The points were these. Every man has a past, a present, and a future. Every man has a problem in his past, a problem in his present, and a problem in his future. The problem in our past is sin, but God has an answer to that problem. The answer is faith, faith in the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. The problem in our future is death, but God has an answer to that problem also. The answer to that problem is hope, hope in Christ's return based on the fact of his historical resurrection and his promises. The problem in our present is hate, and God's answer to that problem is love. It is the love of Christ lived out in the lives of those who trust him.

Brunner was entirely right. And he was right not only in highlighting the three great problems; he was right in pointing to the unique Christ as the answer. Has Christ become the answer to the problems in your life? He is the only One who will ever answer them completely.

Chapter 16.
How to Witness for Jesus Christ

John 1:19-28

We come now to the first major division in the Gospel of John. The material of the prologue goes through verse 18. With verse 19 the reader is launched at last into the events of the first momentous week of Jesus' ministry.

In all, seven days are involved, beginning with the day John the Baptist met with the delegation that had come to him from Jerusalem and ending with the day Jesus attended the wedding in Cana. On the first day (vv. 19-28), John the Baptist confesses that he is not the Messiah; that is, he denies that he possesses any independent importance of his own. On the second day (vv. 2934) John identifies Jesus as the Lamb of God, for whom he had come to prepare the way. On the third day (vv. 35-39), John's testimony causes two of his own disciples to follow Jesus. On the fourth day (vv. 40-42), one of these disciples, Andrew, finds his own brother, Peter, and brings him to Jesus. On the fifth day (vv. 43-51), Jesus calls Philip, and Philip calls Nathanael. The journey to Galilee occurs on the sixth day. The seventh day (2:1-11) centers around Jesus, his mother, and his disciples at the wedding.

In no other Gospel are the marks of the passing of time so clearly noted as in John. And what is perhaps even more significant, in no other Gospel are the opening events of the narrative fraught with such lasting significance.

The very fact that the tone of the Gospel changes at this point means that our handling of it must change also. Up to verse 19 we have been studying the Gospel almost verse by verse, and the eighteen verses we have considered so far have required no less than fifteen separate studies. From this point on we will move faster. In five studies we will cover the remaining half of the first chapter to see what it teaches about the way a believer can witness to the Lord Jesus Christ. We will then return to the same general ground in four more studies to uncover the teaching of the chapter about baptism. Finally, we will return once more to pick up several of the themes remaining.

In this study we begin with the witness of John the Baptist to the Lord Jesus Christ, and ask the question: How can a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ witness for him? This is an important question, particularly since the writer of the Gospel so obviously had it in mind as he composed this narrative section.

Chosen to Witness

I suppose that the greatest mistake a person can make as he reads about the witness of John the Baptist is to think that the task of the witness was somehow peculiar to John. No doubt there are many who think this, just as there are many who think that the task of witnessing today should be fulfilled primarily by ministers. But this is an error, and a serious one at that. Witnessing is every Christian's job. When Jesus Christ spoke to his disciples, saying, "You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit—fruit that will last" (John 15:16), it was evident that salvation consisted not so much in the fact that they had chosen him but that he had chosen them and commissioned them and us to the task of telling others about him.

An acceptance of this task was, many believe, the single most important factor in the astounding outreach and expansion of the early Christian church. It was not simply that Paul and the other leaders carried the gospel to the farthest corners of the Roman world. In fact, many of the early leaders were not particularly zealous about the missionary effort. It was rather that all Christians—small and great, rich and poor, slaves and freedmen—made it their consuming passion to tell others about the Lord.

Tertullian, writing slightly before and after the year a.d. 200, declared in his *Apology: "*We are but of yesterday, and we have filled every place among you—cities, islands, fortresses, towns, marketplaces, the very camp, tribes, companies, palace, senate, forum—we have left nothing to you but the temples of your gods." How did this happen? Gibbon suggests how in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, noting that in the early church "it became the most sacred duty of a new convert to diffuse among his friends and relations the inestimable blessing which he had received." Harnack, the church historian, declared in his Expansion of Christianity: "We cannot hesitate to believe that the great mission of Christianity was in reality accomplished by means of informal missionaries. Justin says so quite explicitly."

Informal missionaries! That is what the early Christians were; it is what all Christians should be.

Moreover, when John the evangelist tells us in thirtythree verses of the first great witness to the Lord Jesus Christ and of its effect upon Christ's first followers, it is evident that he does so that we might be encouraged by the account and instructed in the matter of our own "informal" witnessing.

The Witness of John

We have already seen in an earlier study that the evangelist has a specific outline in mind as he presents these events from John's ministry. The outline is given to us in verses 6-9: "There came a man who was sent from God; his name was John. He came as a witness to testify concerning that light, so that through him all men might believe. He himself was not the light; he came only as a witness to the light." If we outline these verses, we see at once that they contain three statements about John the Baptist's testimony: (1) he was not the Light but (2) was sent to bear witness to that Light in order that (3) all men through him might believe. This outline is then followed quite closely in the narrative section of the chapter. Thus, in verses 19-28 we have John denying that he is the Light; that is, that he has any personal, independent importance. In verses 29-34 we have him bearing witness to the Light, a section that concludes with the formal statement: "I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God." Finally, the remainder of the chapter shows the results of John's testimony as the first disciples begin to believe in Jesus.

No doubt there are many other important things that can be said about witnessing for Jesus Christ. Yet I believe that if only these three points are followed, the witness of any Christian, no matter how halting it may be, will be effective. First, the believer must recognize in the depths of his being that he is not the answer to other people's problems, that he is not the Light. Second, he must know that Jesus is the Light and must point men to him. Third, he must do it with the express intention of having men and women believe. Sometimes we hear that it is only the giving of a testimony that is important, not the results. But this is not entirely right. It is true that we cannot produce the results. That is God's job. So, in a sense we are not responsible for them. Nevertheless, we must want them and look for them just as earnestly as a man who pulls the fire alarm anxiously awaits the evacuation of the building.

The Workman's Voice

The evangelist begins, then, by telling us of John's confession that he was not the Christ. The section begins with the sentence: "Now this was John's testimony." If we were composing the Gospel today, this phrase would be a subheading, or what we might call a chapter title. It indicates that we are beginning a new and important section of the narrative.

The story goes on in verses 19-23: "Now this was John's testimony when the Jews of Jerusalem sent priests and Levites to ask him who he was. He did not fail to confess, but confessed freely, 'I am not the Christ.' They asked him, 'Then who are you? Are you Elijah?' He said, 'I am not.' 'Are you the Prophet?' He answered, 'No.' Finally they said, 'Who are you? Give us an answer to take back to those who sent us. What do you say about yourself?' John replied in the words of Isaiah the prophet, 'I am the voice of one calling in the desert, "Make straight the way for the Lord."'" These verses anchor the testimony of John firmly in the context of first-century Judaism, just as our testimony (if it is to be effective) must be anchored in our own century.

The delegation from Jerusalem could think of three things that John might claim to be, and the first of these quite obviously was "the Messiah." Was he the Messiah? We must remember as we read these words that the Jews were a people living under the dominion of Rome and that they were looking with great expectation for their deliverer, as any captive people do. If we want a feeling of this from our own time, we need only think of the Philippines under Japanese rule during World War II. At the start of the war General Douglas MacArthur had been in the Philippines, but he had been forced to abandon his base there in the face of the Japanese attack. As he left, however, he gave a speech in which he uttered a promise. The promise was: "I shall return." It was a simple promise. MacArthur was not even a Filipino. Yet, this promise sustained the island people during the days of the occupation as they waited for their deliverance. In fact, they remember MacArthur by these words today. In the same way, the Jews of John's day waited for the deliverer that had been promised to them in the Old Testament.

Moreover, there had been many messianic pretenders. We know of some of them through such works as the Antiquities of Josephus or his account of The Jewish War. Other false messiahs are mentioned in the New Testament (Acts 5:36-37; 21:38). It would have been easy for John, who by this time had received quite an impressive following, to have announced that he was the Messiah. But not only did he reject the temptation, he even rejected it with the hint that the One who actually was the Messiah was present. By this time he knew that Jesus was there, for the baptism of Jesus by John must have taken place before the events that John the evangelist narrates. Hence, when he rejects the title "Messiah," John does so by emphasizing the first person pronoun "I." It occupies a prominent place in the Greek text. It is as though John had said, "I am not the Messiah, but the One who is the Messiah stands among you."

The delegation of priests and Levites next asked him whether he was Elijah. Why should they have asked him this? The answer is that the Jews of John's time believed that the prophet Elijah would appear on earth once more before the coming of the Messiah. This idea is evident from several passages in the Gospels. For instance, in Matthew 16 there is an account of Christ asking the disciples, "Who do people say the Son of Man is?" There is the answer, "Some say John the Baptist [who had been killed by Herod in the interval]; others say Elijah; and still others, Jeremiah or one of the prophets" (vv. 13-14). In chapter 17, after the disciples had seen the Lord glorified in the transfiguration, they asked Jesus, "Why then do the teachers of the law say that Elijah must come first?" (Matt. 17:10).

The Jews had a reason for their expectation, of course, for in Malachi 4:5-6, in the very last verses of the Old Testament, there was the promise: "See, I will send you the prophet Elijah before that great and dreadful day of the LORD comes. He will turn the hearts of the fathers to their children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers; or else I will come and strike the land with a curse." This was the basis of their belief. John the Baptist was not an entirely unlikely candidate for the fulfillment of this prophecy. He was rugged like Elijah. He resembled Elijah in his work (cf. Matt. 17:12). Nevertheless, John was not Elijah, and he refused this designation.

Finally, the interrogators asked him whether he was "that prophet." This was a reference to the prophet predicted by Moses in Deuteronomy 18: "The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among your own brothers. You must listen to him" (Deut. 18:15; cf. v. 18). But John denied that he was "that prophet" also.

Who then is John? John says that he is "a voice" who has come to prepare the way of the Lord, as Isaiah had prophesied. "A voice of one calling: In the desert prepare the way for the LORD; make straight in the wilderness a highway for our God. Every valley shall be raised up, every mountain and hill made low; the rough ground shall become level, the rugged places a plain. And the glory of the LORD will be revealed, and all mankind together will see it. For the mouth of the LORD has spoken" (Isa. 40:3-5).

You cannot see a voice. You can only hear it. No one looks much at the workman who is only preparing the road for the coming of the king. Yet, this was what John the Baptist declared himself to be: a voice and a workman. The last thing in the world that he wanted was for men to look at him. He said elsewhere, "He [Jesus] must become greater; I must become less" (John 3:30). John wanted men to forget him and see only the King.

In the Service of the King

This should be true of every good preacher, Christian worker, and witness. If we are to witness for Jesus Christ, we must first of all forget ourselves—our likes, our dislikes, our needs, our personal interests, our free time, even at times our work or our ambitions. We must think first of the other person and of his need for the Savior.

What is it that will make a person forget himself in order to point to Jesus? Only an awareness of Jesus' worth and his glory! I read a story some time ago of an African convert who told many people about Jesus, despite his great suffering from elephantiasis. This is a terribly painful disease, causing enlargement and thickening of body tissues, specifically the enormous enlargement of a limb. The disease had affected this man's legs so that it was extremely difficult for him to walk. Yet he thought nothing of making his way around the village to introduce others to the One who had transformed his life.

After a period of several months, during which he had visited all the huts in his village, this man began to take the gospel to another village that lay two miles away through the jungle. Every morning he started out painfully on his monstrous legs, and every night he returned, having visited as many homes in the second village as he possibly could. Then he would remain in his own village for several weeks before he once more became restless.

He asked the missionary doctor if another village he had visited as a child had heard the gospel. The missionary said, no, it had not. The African Christian wanted to take the Good News there, but the missionary advised against it because the village lay more than twelve miles away, over dangerous jungle paths. The burden so grew upon the African Christian that one day he slipped away quietly before dawn. The missionary learned later that the convert, arriving in the new village some time after noon, his legs bruised and scratched, had begun immediately to tell the people about Jesus. He went to everyone there, and it was not till the sun was sinking low in the sky that he began his lonely and dangerous trip through the jungle toward home. At midnight he arrived, bleeding and almost unconscious, at the house of the missionary doctor, who tended to him and dressed his feet.

Here was a man, sent by God to point people to Jesus, who was effective because he had forgotten himself in the service of his King.

Chapter 17.
Witnessing to Jesus Christ

John 1:29-34

How can a believer witness to Jesus Christ? It is an important question, not only because each of us is called upon to witness (as we have already seen) but also because the expansion of the gospel in our time (as in all ages of the Christian church) depends in no small measure upon whether or not we will do it and, if we do, how well. We have already looked at the first great principle for being a witness: the witness must recognize that he has no independent importance in himself. The evangelist expresses this in the case of John the Baptist, whose witness has been the basis of our story, by reminding us that he was not the Light. This teaches us, among other things, that a Christian will never be an effective witness if he is placing either himself or his own needs first in his thinking. Our own needs possess a certain degree of importance, of course. But we will never be able to focus on the needs of others if our own needs dominate us. For one thing, there is a sense in which our own needs are already met, whether we recognize it or not, for Paul wrote to the Philippians, saying, "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19). Our needs are met in Christ, and we have little to testify of if we do not see that clearly. Besides, we cannot really show love to the other person, which is the essence of witnessing, if we are not placing his needs before our own.

All that is true. Yet, we must go on from this point to see that our recognizing that we are not the Light is not in itself witnessing. That is only the first and preliminary principle.

A Verbal Witness

The second great principle for witnessing is that we must bear witness to the Light, and this means that we must witness verbally. Our witness must move out of the area of life and into the area of words. If it does not, we will be like the young man who went from a Christian home to a secular college. His parents were concerned how he would make out. So when he arrived home at Christmas they asked him anxiously, "How did you get along?" He answered, "Oh, I got along great. No one even knows that I'm a Christian." I am not denying the importance of the Christian life, of course. There must be the kind of upright character and true commitment to Christ that will back up the witness by words. We will see more about this in our next study. But, important as it is, the living of the Christian life by itself is not enough for a complete witness; there must also be a verbal witness.

We can easily see why this must be so. For one thing, a nonverbal witness is at best merely puzzling to the non-Christian, and it can be totally misunderstood. Some time ago, after I had mentioned witnessing in the context of a message I was giving in a church other than my own, a woman came up to me to tell how she was bearing a witness in her place of employment. She apparently worked in a large office. Just that morning, so she said, as she was going out to lunch, one of the other workers handed her fifty cents and asked her to pick up a packet of cigarettes for him. What did she do? She returned the money, saying that she did not believe in smoking. She said to me that she believed God had helped her to bear a witness for Christ in that situation.

I do not want to be too hard on this woman. She had a right, if she wished, to disapprove of smoking. In view of the warnings being given in our day about smoking, probably more nonChristians than ever before are taking this position. Still, the point that I want to make here is that in this case the "witness" to Christ that the woman thought she was giving was really no witness at all. For had I been the man who had asked the favor and been refused, I would probably have considered her rude and never even have thought of her views in terms of Christianity.

The second reason why a nonverbal witness is inadequate is that, if it is effective at all, it should lead to a verbal witness. That is, if you are attempt-ll ing to honor Christ by the way you are living, the things you are doing should lead to conversation about Jesus Christ and what he has meant in your experience.

Someone will say, "Oh, but isn't it true that many persons have been led to Jesus Christ by means of the conduct of some Christian?" That is quite true; many have! The conduct of Christians has been an important step, even an essential step, in the salvation of many thousands of persons. But I am convinced that the matter has never stopped on that level and that these thousands would never have come to Christ unless the witness through the lives of Christians had not moved beyond actions at some point to a consideration of the person and claims of Jesus Christ as these truths were presented to them verbally.

People who have greatly moved the world for Christ have been ready to speak at any opportunity. In his book Henceforth, Hugh E. Hopkins tells of Douglas Thornton, an English believer who was being seen off at a railway station in Egypt. With some difficulty his friend found him an empty compartment on the train: "An empty compartment!" Thornton exclaimed. "Why, man, I want to fish." He moved into a crowded compartment. It is also recorded that, when exploring the Great Pyramid on the outskirts of Cairo, Thornton redeemed the time by evangelizing the guide who was then crawling up a narrow passage on his hands and knees behind him.

We find another example in the conversion experience of John Wesley, the father of the Methodist church. Wesley had been a preacher for years before he was genuinely born again, and during this time (as might be expected) his ministry was a failure. After a particularly discouraging experience in the United States, as he was returning from Georgia to England by ship, he came into contact with a body of Moravian Christians. He was very much impressed with the calm they maintained in the midst of a storm at sea. It was not on the ship, however, but later at a meeting in the little chapel at Aldersgate in London, while someone was reading from Luther's exposition of the letter to the Galatians, that Wesley "felt his heart strangely warmed" and was converted. After that he became one of the greatest evangelists in church history.

A verbal witness is a true witness. Thus, throughout the Gospel of John, the stories of those who are reached by Jesus Christ almost without exception end with a spoken profession of their belief. The man born blind is last seen in an attitude of worship, voicing the confession: "Lord, I believe" (John 9:38). The woman of Samaria grows in her understanding of Jesus. At the beginning of the narrative she regards him merely as a Jew (John 4:9). In verse 12 she raises the possibility that he may be greater than the patriarch Jacob. In verse 19 she calls him a prophet. The conclusion comes in her testimony to her neighbors when she argues that he is the Messiah (v. 29). In the same way John the Baptist testifies to the One who takes away the sin of the world.

The Message

Now, if we are to bear a witness to Jesus Christ, clearly we must know something about him. And this means that we must have a message. What is our message? The major parts of the answer to this question are suggested in our story. They are: 1) a witness to who Jesus Christ is; 2) a witness to what he has done; and 3) a witness to how a man or woman can come to know him personally.

First, we witness to who Jesus Christ is. John did this when he testified, "This is the one I meant when I said, 'A man who comes after me has surpassed me because he was before me'" (v. 30). Again, "I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God" (v. 34). This is where we begin in our witness, because most of the points of Christian doctrine gain their significance from the fact that Jesus Christ is God. If Christ were only a man, then his death on the cross might have been inspiring as an example or a means by which we are excited to good works. We might say, "I never want such a tragedy to happen again" and become a great social worker. But if this is all that Christ is, then his death was in no sense an atonement; he did not die for our sin, and we are still under the condemnation of God and are still the children of wrath. In the same way, if he is not God, then we have no living God to worship, for we cannot know God apart from Jesus Christ.

As you begin to witness, let me suggest that you begin here. Begin with Christ's claims about himself. You might refer to John 5:18, which tells us that Jesus "was even calling God his own Father, making himself equal with God." He said, "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30). He told the disciples: "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father" (John 14:9). Most nonChristians have never actually faced these claims, and many have never even heard them.

Second, we witness to what Jesus Christ has done. In one sense, of course, this is an overwhelming topic. For if Jesus is God, then all that God has done, and does, Christ does. He has been active in the creation of the world, in guiding the history of redemption, in giving us the Old and New Testaments, in helping us today in temptation, and in other things. Yet there is a sense in which the work of Christ focuses on something much more limited and therefore much easier to share. The focus of Christ's work is to be found in his death on the cross. Hence, we want to share the meaning of his death when we try to tell others about him.

In his day, John the Baptist did this by reference to the Jewish sacrifices. He said, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (v. 29). Have you ever given thought to what must have been involved in that statement—for John and for his hearers? For centuries Israel had known all about the sacrificial lamb. They had learned about it first from the story of Abraham, who was the father of their nation. At God's command Abraham had been going up the mountain to sacrifice his son Isaac when Isaac had turned to him and asked, "Father, ...Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" Abraham had answered, "My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering." And God did! Israel had also known about the lamb as a result of the institution of the Passover. On that occasion the blood of the lamb on the doorposts of the house was the sign for the angel of death to pass by. Moreover, they knew that daily in the services of the temple lambs and goats were sacrificed. They knew that in every instance the sacrifices meant the death of an innocent substitute in place of the one who had sinned.

On this basis John the Baptist came along and exclaimed, "Look, the Lamb of God." He recognized that the sacrifices were to be fulfilled in Jesus and that he would bear our sin as Isaiah had said. "Surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows.... he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities; the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed" (Isa. 53:4-5).

I like to think, as many other commentators have suggested, that as John identified Jesus as the sin-bearing Lamb, there may have been passing by the flocks of lambs that were driven up to the walls of Jerusalem each year to serve as sacrificial lambs for the Passover. The Passover feast was not far off (John 2:12-13). Perhaps John was led to refer to Jesus in this fashion because it showed vividly that he was able to deliver from death those who believed on him.

Do you believe that? Jesus is able to deliver us from death today. There is that final death, the second death, which is the separation of the soul of the individual from God. He delivers from that. But there are also the little deaths that we experience daily because of our natural alienation from God. Jesus is the answer to those deaths also. If you are a Christian, it is your privilege to tell others of the means by which sin is removed—through faith in the person and death of Jesus Christ—and that the one who believes in him is given new life, peace, joy, and freedom of access to God.

Finally, we also witness to the way in which a person can come to know and trust Jesus for himself. John did it by pointing to the fact that Jesus is the giver of the Spirit. He said, "I would not have known him, except that the one who sent me to baptize with water told me, 'The man on whom you see the Spirit come down and remain is he who will baptize with the Holy Spirit'" (v. 33). What does that mean? It means that Jesus Christ was the One who would give of his Spirit to those who should follow him. Or, to put it another way, it means that Jesus would come to live within the lives of his followers. Thus, when we bear witness to Jesus today, we talk not only of who Jesus is and of what he has done but also of how a person can come to have him enter his life and fill it.

Opening the Door

Someone will ask, "You say that Christ must enter our lives, but you have not told us how that can happen. How does that happen?" The answer is that it happens by faith as we "receive" him or "open" the doors of our lives to his knocking. One statement of that principle occurs in this same chapter in the verse that says: "Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (v. 12). Another verse is Revelation 3:20: "Here I am! I stand at the door and knock; if anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in and eat with him, and he with me." According to these verses there are two steps to the process. There is the step in which we first "hear" his voice or "believe" in him. Then there is the step in which we "receive him" or "open" to his call.

We do this by praying. We say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I admit that I am a sinner and in need of the salvation that you bring to men. I believe that you died for me, so that my sin is atoned for and borne away forever. I now open the door and invite you into my life and ask that you will cleanse me and rule my life forever. Amen." It is as simple as that, but it must be a definite commitment. The act itself is indispensable.

Have you done that? If you have not, you are not a real Christian. It is not enough merely to know about Christ; you must belong to him. On the other hand, if you have done that, then let me ask whether you have ever invited another person to make the same commitment. I can tell you on the basis of my own experience—and that of many others—that there are few joys equal to that which is ours when the invitation is given to believe in Jesus and the person to whom we are witnessing responds and comes to him.

Chapter 18.
Family Evangelism

John 1:35-51

Not long ago I heard of a group of people who disseminate their beliefs in a very unfortunate and, in my opinion, unbiblical way. Having memorized a presentation of their doctrine, they buttonhole a person, unload their presentation, and then dart away as if to say, "Well, that's finished; now it's up to the person either to believe it or go to hell." If you have ever found yourself doing that or even something close to that as you present the gospel of Jesus Christ, then these verses deserve your special consideration.

In the last few chapters we have learned two very important principles for witnessing. Both have been illustrated by the witness of John the Baptist to Jesus during the earliest days of Christ's ministry. The first, quite simply, is that John did not bear witness to himself. He confessed that he was not the Light. The second principle is that he did bear witness to the Light. The Light was Jesus, and John bore witness to him verbally. These two points lead now to a third great principle, which is, if we understand it properly, the direct antithesis to the distorted idea of witnessing that I have described above. John bore witness to Jesus; but he did so not to unload a certain amount of information but to lead others to believe in Jesus personally. This means that he had their life and destiny in view when he was witnessing.

We see this in two ways in John's Gospel. It is presented doctrinally, and it is illustrated clearly in the narrative. The doctrinal statement is found in the verses we have already referred to several times previously (verses 6-8), although it is somewhat hidden in the English translation. In English we read that John "came as a witness to testify concerning that light, so that through him all men might believe" (v. 7). In Greek the flow of thought is emphasized by a succession of relative clauses that build the thought in a characteristic Greek construction. The Greek says that John came for a witness in order that (as a specific and immediate object) he might identify the Light and in order that (as a final and ultimate object) all men might believe. These were the two objects of his witnessing.

Moreover, no sooner is the witness of John given in the narrative section of the Gospel (vv. 1934) than we find this doctrinal statement illustrated by the account of the conversion of those who actually did believe as the result of John's witness. In brief, they are Andrew and an unnamed disciple (whom I believe to be the apostle John), and then, through their witness and the witness of Philip, also Peter and Nathanael. The story of these conversions occupies the next three days of the first week of Christ's ministry and fills out the next seventeen verses.

A Brother

The lesson of the verses at this point is that the witness-giving of John was immediately picked up by those who believed as the result of his testimony, so that Andrew and Philip, and eventually John the evangelist, Peter, and Nathanael, became the next witnesses. What is more, they followed the same pattern of witnessing that John the Baptist had followed. That is, (1) they did not attract attention to themselves, (2) they bore a verbal witness to Jesus, and (3) they did so in order that those to whom they were speaking might believe in him also.

This is the story. As John the Baptist was standing with two of his disciples near the place where they had been baptizing, Jesus walked by. Presumably Jesus had returned only the day before from his forty days in the wilderness and his temptation by Satan (recounted in Matt. 4:1-11; Mark 1:12-13; Luke 4:1-13) John said, "Look, the Lamb of God!" (v. 36). The two disciples heard John speak and followed Jesus.

Jesus turned when he saw them following and said to them, "What do you want?"

They answered, "Rabbi [which John tells us means 'Teacher'], where are you staying?"

Jesus said, "Come, and you will see." So they went with him and remained with him the rest of that day, for by the time they had arrived at the place where Jesus was staying, it was already four o'clock in the afternoon.

We do not have a record of what was said that evening, but whatever it was it must have been tremendously exciting for these two original disciples, for when morning came one of the two who had followed Jesus (Andrew) immediately set out to find Simon Peter, his brother. We are told that when he had found Peter he said to him simply, "We have found the Messiah" (that is, the Christ), and he brought Peter to Jesus (v. 41).

We should stop at this point, I believe, to think of the significance of this first example (John the Baptist's being excluded) of a normal human witness. It was the witness of Andrew to his brother. And it was therefore a witness that began, as all true witnessing should begin, at home.

Donald Grey Barnhouse has written of this passage: "Even before the Lord Jesus told His disciples that He would make them fishers of men, Andrew witnessed to his brother and landed the big fisherman, Simon Peter. Many who think that they can be used in far fields have never begun where the Lord Jesus meant them to begin—right at home."

This is doubly important, first because it introduces us to a whole sphere and order of evangelism that is often overlooked in missionary conferences and missionary appeals, and second because it is through the home that the great majority of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ come to faith in him.

Barnhouse, in First Things First, has also written, "Oh, it is true that the first generation of believers in any tribe come straight out of heathenism, generally by the witness of some foreigner who has brought the witness to that particular tribe. And so it is that most of church history is the story of some alien who entered a tribe with little knowledge of the language, and who preached Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit so that people were saved. Paul, the Greek Jew, took the gospel to the tribes of Asia Minor, to Macedonia, and to Greece. Irenaeus, a Greek, was the first to take the gospel to Gaul, which is now France. A Latin from Rome, the second St. Augustine, was the first missionary to England, while an Englishman, Boniface, was the first to carry the gospel to Germany. Young Patrick, of high family, was kidnapped by marauders and carried to Ireland at the age of sixteen, later to become the instrument of the conversion of Ireland. In modern times the list of similar instances crosses the world. Henry Martyn took the gospel to Hindustan and to Persia. We have Adoniram Judson of Burma; Hudson Taylor of China; Mary Slessor of Calabar; Livingstone of Central Africa; and the list goes on until we have Betty Elliot of the Aucas, as well as Wycliffe Bible Translators in many other tribes.

"But in spite of all this list, which grows longer every year, these pioneers win but a small proportion of those who come to Christ. The informant who teaches his language to that strange creature, the missionary, usually ends up by coming to know the missionary's Savior. He has seen Christ in the missionary first of all, and then the informant goes and finds his own brother! That is a first in countless tribes. The God of Abraham became the God of Sarah, Abraham's wife, and then the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob. Household salvation is a very precious truth, and while there are definite promises which give positive assurance only of the salvation of our children, other statements give us large hope that the gospel will penetrate throughout our households."

Charles Spurgeon once observed that although grace does not run in the blood, and regeneration is not of blood or of birth, yet it often happens that God uses one of a household to draw the rest to himself. He calls an individual, and then uses him as a sort of spiritual decoy to bring the rest of the family into the gospel net. Has God used you in that way? Have you a brother or a sister still outside of Christ? Do you have a husband who does not know him? A wife? I do not see how you can ever consider yourself a true witness to the Lord Jesus Christ if you are not making a maximum effort to lead to him these whom you know best.

But perhaps you are saying, "I have no brother. I have no sister. In fact, I am quite alone in this world." If that is the case, then you must go on to see that the story of the opening week of Christ's ministry also includes the witness of Philip, who had no brother, but who brought his friend to Jesus. We are told that on the next day when Jesus was about to depart for Galilee, he called Philip, saying, Follow me." And Philip, who did follow, then went to his friend Nathanael with the report: "We have found the one Moses wrote about in the Law, and about whom the prophets also wrote—Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph."

At first Nathanael was skeptical. He asked, "Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?"

Philip replied, "Come and see."

When Nathanael came and had his meeting with Jesus, he then concluded for himself: "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (vv. 43-49).

If you have no brother or sister (or any other family), then you must begin, as Philip did, with your friend or your neighbor. He is the one whom God has placed in your path; it is a witness to him that God has most entrusted to your charge.

"Come and See"

It is clear that if we are to witness successfully in the circles where we are best known, then we must meet certain conditions. What are they? In the first place, there must be a change in our manner of life, and this must be seen in our willingness to take second place in order that the ones to whom we are witnessing might see Jesus.

If you are sitting in a waiting room somewhere with a packet of tracts in your pocket and a person sits down next to you whom you do not know, you can witness to him and it will hardly cost you anything. That is not difficult. But if you are going to witness effectively to your brother, there must be a change in your life.

Unlike the man on the seat next to you, your brother knows you. He knows whether the thing you are professing has affected you personally. He knows whether you take your turn drying the dishes at home or whether you try to wiggle out of the responsibility. He knows whether you put thought into caring for other members of the family. He knows whether or not you are touchy and anxious above all to defend your own interests. In short, he knows whether the faith you profess is real or ineffectual. He knows whether Christ occupies the highest point in your life or whether you do.

Andrew was one who placed himself second in order that he might bring others to Jesus. We do not know a great deal about Andrew because he was not terribly well known. In fact, he was so little known that he is often introduced to us in the New Testament as Simon Peter's brother. Everyone knew who Peter was; Andrew was the man who was related to Peter. There are only three stories in the Gospels in which Andrew plays a significant role. There is the story recorded here. There is the time in which he brought to Jesus the lad with the five loaves and two small fishes (John 6:8-9). And there is the incident in which the Greeks were brought to Jesus (John 12:22). In each case Andrew put himself second in order that he might introduce others to the Savior.

The second condition for an effective witness to those who know us best is that we must be willing to let Jesus win them through us and not depend on our clever techniques or our arguments. There is no record of Andrew arguing with Peter or of Philip arguing with Nathanael.
They merely invited the one to whom they were witnessing to "Come and see."

Where did they learn this technique, if we may call it that? They learned it from Jesus. When Jesus turned around and saw them following him, he first asked the question, "What do you want?" We can always begin with that question, for the gospel always relates to the needs and longings of men. When they then expressed an interest in knowing more about him, he replied with the invitation: "Come and see." It was this approach that Andrew and Philip then emulated, and Philip actually used the identical words in his approach to Nathanael (v. 46).

William Barclay tells us in his commentary on this passage how the great nineteenth-century agnostic Aldous Huxley was once profoundly moved by the gospel. He had been at a weekend house party in the midst of which, on Sunday morning, most of the guests proposed to go to church. Huxley did not intend to go and instead approached a rather plain man who, nevertheless, was known to have a very simple and radiant faith. He said to the man, "Suppose you don't go to church today and instead stay home and tell me quite simply what your Christian faith means to you and why you are a Christian."

The man replied, "Oh, I can't do that. You could demolish my arguments in a minute; I'm not clever enough to argue with you."

"I don't want to argue with you," Huxley replied. "I just want you to tell me simply what this Christ means to you." The man then stayed home and told Huxley of his faith. When he had finished, there were tears in the eyes of the brilliant agnostic. He said, "I would give my right hand if only I could believe that." What touched his heart? It was not arguments. It was a genuine faith expressed by one who knew Jesus and was not ashamed to invite others to come to him.

Time with Jesus

There is just one more point that comes out of this story, although it is clearly related to everything that has been said previously. We return to the story and find that before Andrew and the other disciple became witnesses, they had first spent time with Jesus. John tells us that they arrived about the tenth hour at the place where Jesus was staying—that is, about four o'clock in the afternoon—and that they spent the night there. What do you suppose they talked about until nightfall? We are not told, but the story reminds us of that other story in Luke where Christ spoke to the Emmaus disciples, showing them from the Old Testament how it was necessary for him "to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" after which they confessed, "Were not our hearts burning within us while he talked with us on the road and opened the Scriptures to us?" (Luke 24:26, 32). After such time spent with Jesus, when the heart burns, one is constrained to go out and find his brother.

This is the secret of all effectual witnessing. If we spend time with Christ, the other matters— knowing that we are not the Light, pointing to the Light, desiring men and women to believe— will come naturally. Moreover, we will find ourselves going to the other one to say simply, "I have found Christ. He has changed me. Come with me to Jesus."

Chapter 19.
Credibility: Bridging the Gap

John 1:35-51

We live in an era in which credibility, or the lack of it, has become a significant issue. We talk about the credibility gap. It exists between parents and children, between those who are in authority and those under them, between races, between governments, between the electorate and those who seek public office. Credibility is also an issue when you and I attempt to bear a witness for the Lord Jesus Christ.

The law of the Jewish people always demanded two witnesses to any fact submitted in a legal proceeding. This is quite generally known, primarily because of the well-known phrase "at the mouth of two or three witnesses" that occurs often in the Old Testament. It is not so generally known that Jewish law, like contemporary law, also demanded that all the witnesses be credible. That is to say, it demanded that the witnesses be in a position in which they had knowledge of the facts involved, that they be morally above reproach, and that they possess a reputation for accuracy.

These factors were utilized on one occasion by the Lord Jesus Christ when he was called on to be a judge by those who actually desired to accuse him. They brought a woman to him who had been taken in adultery and who was quite possibly known to them because of their own participation in her sins. They asked him if he would uphold the law of Moses, which commanded that a person guilty of adultery be stoned, or if he would ignore the law and allow her to go free. Whichever way he answered they had him trapped, they thought. Instead of answering them immediately, however, the Lord Jesus stooped and wrote on the ground. Then he told the woman's accusers that the one who was without sin among them should cast the first stone at her. When they had been discredited as witnesses in their own eyes by their own consciences and had slipped away one by one, he turned to the woman and asked where her accusers were. She answered by saying that there was no one there to accuse her, and Jesus was able to dismiss the case under even the most demanding strictures of the law and deal with her in grace by means of his own righteousness.

Thus far in our study of witnessing we have dealt with only the first of these legal requirements. That is, we have shown that there must be witnesses so that what is established by one witness might be confirmed by God himself as he adds to that witness by his twos and threes and twelves and seventies. However, there is still the question of the witness's character, and this is also important. Luke recognized this indirectly in the opening verses both of his Gospel and the Book of Acts when he stressed that the facts concerning the life of Jesus Christ had been established by credible eyewitnesses chosen by God to bear testimony.

What about the credibility of the witnesses? What about your credibility and mine? What must you be and what must you know if your witness to the Lord Jesus Christ is to be validated?

I believe that at least eight things must be true of you if your witness to unbelievers is to be credible. (1) You must know that God's saving work has been done in your life and that it has been done forever. (2) You must know that you are a sinner and that in yourself you do not want to do God's will. (3) You must be surrendered to God. (4) You must spend time with Jesus. (5) You must be grounded in the great truths of Scripture. (6) You must be planted if you are to bear fruit. (7) You must be willing to do hard work. (8) Everything you do must be characterized by love. We now need to look at each of these requirements individually.

Assurance

The first principle is that you must know that God's saving work has been done in your life and that it has been done forever. It is easy to see why this is so. If you are uncertain about your salvation, or if you are afraid you might lose it, then all your efforts must be expended in solving these problems for yourself, and you won't be worth anything as a witness to others.

Take Martin Luther as an example. If there was ever a man who was concerned about the state of his soul, it was Martin Luther. It was this that drove him to the Erfurt Convent of the Augustinian Eremites and allowed him to submit himself to all sorts of rigors for the sake of his soul's salvation. He starved himself, beat himself, gave himself to a deep and systematic study of the Scriptures. These endeavors caused the other, less disciplined monks to regard him somewhat as a miracle of piety. His reputation for being a "young saint" spread throughout the other monasteries of Germany, even as far distant as the monastery at Grimma. Yet, at this stage of his life, in spite of his efforts and discipline, Luther was uncertain about the state of his own soul and consequently was of no use to anyone. It was only after Luther had come to the knowledge of the gospel of grace and was assured of his own salvation that he became a witness to others. Then God was able to take him out of the monastery at Erfurt and use him to shake a continent.

It is the same with you. If you are uncertain about your own relationship to God, you will never be worth anything as a witness. You may be saved. I do not mean that you cannot be a Christian and be uncertain of your salvation at the same time. That is true of far too many believers, though it should not be. But the point I am making is that if you are uncertain about your salvation, you will not be able to witness about the Lord Jesus Christ to others.

Let me pause at this point in order to ask whether the gospel itself has become real for you. We have read about Jesus Christ being the Light. Well, is he the Light for you? We have read about him being the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world. Has he taken away your sin? Is he your Teacher, your Lord, your Savior? If he is, then you must stand firmly upon the Word of God, which declares: "We accept man's testimony, but God's testimony is greater because it is the testimony of God, which he has given about his Son. ...And this is the testimony: God has given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have life" (1 John 5:9, 11-13). If these things are true for you and if you are assured of them, then you have taken the first important step toward becoming a believable witness.

Still a Sinner

The second step is to realize that you are still a sinner, even after your conversion, and that in yourself you do not want God's will. Naturally, that also includes witnessing about him to others. Do you want God's will? Do you want to witness? If you know your own heart, you will know that basically you prefer to be left alone to your own ways and reasoning.

We are like the Israelites during their march to the Promised Land. They rebelled against God's ways at almost every conceivable stage of their journey. God had taken them from Egypt when they were nothing but slaves, and he had brought them out of the country with signs and great miracles. Yet no sooner were they in the desert than they rebelled against Moses, saying, "If only we had died by the LORD'S hand in Egypt! There we sat around pots of meat and ate all the food we wanted, but you have brought us out into this desert to starve this entire assembly to death" (Exod. 16:3). When God provided the manna to eat and water to drink, they rebelled against the menu. They said, "We remember the fish we ate in Egypt at no cost—also the cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions and garlic. But now we have lost our appetite; we never see anything but this manna!" (Num. 11:5-6). Later, when they were instructed to enter and possess the land they protested that it was impossible because of the giants that lived there. Then, when God commanded them to remain in the desert, they tried to go into the land and were defeated.

In everything the Israelites rebelled against God's counsel. But God kept at them so they would eventually learn that nothing matters but the purposes of God and so they would determine to do his will even though they did not naturally want to do it. So it is with us. We are not paragons of faith or faithfulness. Left to ourselves we too would go back to Egypt. But we must learn that. And we must determine for this reason to pursue God's will in spite of our natural inclinations.

Surrendered to God

The third thing that must be true of you if your witness is to be believable is that you must be surrendered to God. Someone will say, "But isn't that a contradiction? You have just said that we must know that we do not want God's will and now you say that we must be surrendered to him. Doesn't that mean that we must want it?" Yes, in one sense! There are doctrines in the Christian life that appear as contradictions. Nevertheless, if we are to be effective witnesses for Christ, we must come to the point where we are willing to say, "Even though I do not naturally want your will, nevertheless I have come to the point where I want it even though I do not want it."

To be able to say that, we must recognize that we do not belong to ourselves. We are bought with a price. Therefore, we are to glorify God in our body and in our spirit, which are God's (1 Cor. 6:20).

How we bargain with God at this point! We want to give God anything but ourselves. We will give him our money, even though it sometimes hurts us to do so. We will give him our children—sometimes. I know of some husbands who would even give their wives, and wives who would gladly give their husbands. But we will not give ourselves!

We are like Jacob at the brook Jabbok. Jacob had been gone from his homeland for many years because of fear of his brother Esau whom he had cheated out of his birthright. But he had come back with the herds and servants and family with which the Lord had blessed him during the intervening years. He had started out boldly, but the closer he came to Esau's territory, the more frightened he became. He wondered whether Esau would still carry out his threat to kill him. He became even more terrified when he finally reached the brook Jabbok, which was the border of Esau's territory, and a servant who had gone on ahead reported to him that Esau was coming toward him with four hundred men.

What was Jacob to do? He thought about the matter and decided on this strategy. He called a servant and placed 200 ewes in his charge. He said, "Pass over before me. And when you come to Esau and he shall ask, 'Who are you? And to whom do these ewes belong?' then you shall say, 'They belong to your brother Jacob, and they are a present for you.'" Jacob thought that he might win Esau's favor by this plan. After the 200 ewes he sent 20 rams, and he gave the same charge to the servant who was sent with them. After the 20 rams there were 30 camels. Then there were 40 cows, 10 bulls, 20 asses, and 10 foals, each in a group by itself. Then Jacob sent over all the servants and the handmaids. After that he sent over Leah (who was the least popular wife) with her children. Then he sent over Rachel and her children. Then came the brook Jabbok. And there was Jacob, all alone—and trembling (Gen. 32:13-24).

We are like Jacob. We go to church and sing, "I surrender all ... the sheep; I surrender all ... the camels." But we do not give ourselves. That night the angel came and wrestled with Jacob, and brought him to the point of personal submission. Through this experience Jacob became a spiritual man and was used by God to give Israel some of the greatest revelations in the Old Testament about their future and the coming of the Messiah. At what period of Jacob's life are you? Before Jabbok or after Jabbok? If you are still before Jabbok, when is it that the angel is going to come and wrestle with you?

Time with Jesus

The fourth of the eight requirements for a credible witness is a simple one: you must spend time with Jesus. If you do not, then your witness, no matter how brightly it shone forth at one time, will eventually flicker and go out. We are like oil-burning lamps. If we are to shine, two things are prerequisites: (1) we must first be lit by Jesus Christ, and (2) we must be fed by him.

Probably the best illustration of this principle in the entire Bible is the story we looked at previously. Andrew and John became the first witnesses to Jesus Christ, and Andrew became the very first when he went and found his own brother, Simon Peter. What does John the evangelist say of that event? One of the most significant things he says is that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon when he and Andrew stopped and spent the night with Jesus. Four o'clock! What do you suppose they talked about during the hours between then and the fall of night? We can be certain that they did not talk about the weather. They talked about spiritual things. Jesus taught them about God and man and laid groundwork for the first principles of the gospel. After that they went out to be witnesses.

Do you spend time with Jesus? Nothing can be a substitute for that. We know that this is true even in secular terms, for there is not a judge in the country who will accept "hearsay evidence" in his court. Hearsay evidence is secondhand evidence, the kind that begins, "Well, I was not there, but I heard Mr. Smith say that...." No judge in the country will accept such evidence. And neither will the unbeliever, if you are attempting to provide hearsay evidence in place of your own personal witness to Jesus Christ. However, if you have been spending time with Jesus, then you will be able to say, "He has spoken to me. He has ordered my life. He satisfies my longings. Won't you allow him to do the same things for you?" If you can do that, then you will be a witness as well as be giving one, and the one who is not yet a Christian will know that your witness rings true.

We need to stop at this point, and you need to apply some of the principles that I have been stating. Many years ago I read Dale Carnegie's best seller How to Win Friends and Influence People. There is much in that book that I have forgotten; but I will never forget that at one point, about halfway through the book, Carnegie broke into his narrative to tell the reader that he had read enough. Instead of going on he was to put the book down and put some of what he had read into practice. When I came to that point I stopped. I never did read the rest of the book. But I did try to do some of the things he suggested. Let us do that also.

What are the first four principles for a credible witness? They are these: (1) you must know that God's saving work has been done in your life and that it has been done forever; (2) you must know that you are a sinner even after your conversion and that in yourself you do not want God's will; (3) you must be surrendered to God; and (4) you must spend time with Jesus. Let us practice these principles. If we do, we will find that God will bless our ministry and that men and women will come to faith in the Lord Jesus.

Chapter 20.

The Mark of the Christian

John 1:35-51

A common reason many non-Christians give for refusing to become Christians is a lack of credibility in the lives of those who profess to be Christ's followers. This lack of credibility may result from a number of factors. Quite a few years ago a certain Bible teacher was in Chicago for the wedding of a young man in business in that city, and after the ceremony he began to talk to him about his becoming a Christian. The young man replied, "You do not need to waste your time talking to me about that. I work for ... (here he named a prominent Chicago firm). These men are very prominent in the church, but we know how they carry on their business, since we work for them. I have no desire to be a Christian."

I know, of course, that the misinterpretation of Christianity by some Christians is not sufficient excuse for refusing to believe in the gospel. People should be willing to distinguish between authentic and counterfeit currency. But not everyone makes the distinction. And consequently, what a Christian is and does is necessarily a most important part of his witness for the Lord Jesus Christ.

In the last study, the first of two on the credibility of the Christian's witness, we saw what four of the prerequisites for a credible witness were. At this point we want to pick up our study and consider the next four prerequisites.

Knowledge

The fifth requirement, if you are to maintain a credible witness for the Lord Jesus Christ, is that you must be grounded in the great truths of Scripture. I do not mean by this that you must be a theologian or that you must have mastered the content of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. If that were required, few Christians could be witnesses. I mean that you must understand the basic content of the gospel as it is contained in Scripture and that you must be able to articulate it in some fashion to others. Of course, the more you know, the better. This is implied in the very nature of a verbal witness.

What does the word "gospel" mean? It means "good news." And what is the good news? The good news is that God has not left us alone in our sin and loneliness to face the certainty of spiritual death and judgment, but that he has come to us in the person of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die for us and, on the basis of that death, to offer us the gift of eternal life. Moreover, it is the assurance that anyone who will believe these things and receive Christ into his or her life will enter at once into an eternal relationship with God in which God will become his Father and he will enjoy all the privileges of being one of God's sons or daughters. It is this news with all its ramifications that we are to share with other men and women.

Think, too, of the Great Commission. Did you know that this is the main point of the most popular version of the Great Commission? It says, "Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you. And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:19-20). These verses seem to place the emphasis on going into the world to preach the gospel, and many have preached this. Actually, the verb that is translated as the imperative "go" is a participle, not an imperative. So it should be translated "going" or "as you go." The result is that "make disciples" is the only direct command left in the sentence, and the verse should read, "Therefore, going, make disciples of all nations." The word "teach" is used in the King James Version and is even repeated twice for emphasis.

Have you tried to fulfill that commandment? Christ was not urging us to go into the world. He expected that we would naturally do that. However, he was urging us to teach, and for that we need a knowledge of the Bible and its doctrinal content. If you do not have that knowledge, I urge you to study the Bible and to put yourself in a position where you can be taught. No one should want to be a "babe" in the Word. We need to go on to maturity.

You Must Be Planted

The sixth requirement for an effective witness is that you must be planted if you are to bear fruit. What must be true of a seed if it is to sprout and be fruitful? Well, first it must be alive. A dead seed will not germinate. Consequently, if you are to bear fruit as a Christian, you must first of all be alive in Christ. But even this is not all that is necessary, for even a living seed will not produce fruit if it is simply left alone on a shelf or in ajar somewhere and is never inserted into the ground. It must be planted. In the same way, you will never bear fruit as a Christian if you merely sit on a pew. You must be planted somewhere in our society.

Another way of saying the same thing is to say that you must know and be with non-Christians. I am afraid that we often find ourselves in the same condition in witnessing as we do in race relations. Many white Christians mean well toward African Americans in our society. The trouble is that they do not know any African Americans. In the same way, few of us know as many non-Christians as we should if we are to be effective evangelists.

How is the situation to be corrected? It will never be corrected by reading a book, although that may help. It will not be corrected by hearing a sermon. It will be corrected only as you roll up your sleeves, get into the world side by side with those who are not yet Christians, get to know them, share their hopes and frustrations, and speak to them. Only then will you be able to point to Christ as the answer to their particular problems. I have often pointed out that when God placed Israel in the world as a witness, he placed her not in the mountains of Tibet or the undiscovered plains of America but in Palestine, at the crossroads of the ancient world. It was there in the midst of the world (but not of it) that she was to bear witness.

Hard Work

The seventh prerequisite is that you must be willing to do hard work. This may seem quite obvious, but it is necessary to say this because not all Christians are noted for their hard work or diligence. In fact, some Christians are quite lazy.

Shortly before his crucifixion Jesus Christ told a story that pointed up the truth of this fact and that encouraged his followers to be diligent. He said that a certain man who was about to take a journey first called his servants and entrusted his wealth to their care. To one servant he gave five talents. The amount was equal to about $5,000, but we must remember that in terms of purchasing power the amount was probably closer to $500,000 as we measure wealth today. To a second servant he gave two talents; to a third, just one. After a time the man came back and demanded a reckoning. The servant to whom he had given five talents had invested it and presented his master with five more talents. The second servant had done the same, producing two more talents. To each of them the master said, "Well done, good and faithful servant. ...Come and share your master's happiness!"

At last the servant who had been given one talent came forward. His account was a sad one. "'Master,' he said, 'I knew that you are a hard man, harvesting where you have not sown and gathering where you have not scattered seed. So I was afraid and went out and hid your talent in the ground. See, here is what belongs to you.' His master replied, 'You wicked, lazy servant! So you knew that I harvest where I have not sown and gather where I have not scattered seed? Well then, you should have put my money on deposit with the bankers, so that when I returned I would have received it back with interest'" (Matt. 25:24-27). In this reproof the unprofitable servant was condemned for two failings. First, he was condemned for his wickedness, because he unjustly called his lord a hard man. And, second, he was condemned for his sloth or laziness. Quite clearly he was even blaming his lord for his own lack of diligence.

Do we do that? I am afraid we do sometimes. The Lord places a great opportunity before us, and instead of considering it an opportunity, we think it a burden. In fact, some Christians seem to consider every opportunity a burden. Watchman Nee, a Chinese Christian who, until his imprisonment in China, was himself a very diligent worker, has written in *The Normal Christian Worker, "*A person who regards everything as a burden cannot be a faithful servant of the Lord; he cannot even be a faithful servant of men. ... Our characters need to be disciplined till we cease to find work irksome and can delight in spending time and strength and material resources without stint in order to serve others."

Characterized by Love

The final point is that, if we are to win others for Jesus Christ, everything we do must be characterized by love. When E. Stanley Jones was in India on one of his many journeys he met with Mahatma Gandhi. In the course of the visit Jones asked this question: "Mr. Gandhi, what must the Christians do to win India for the Lord Jesus Christ?" Gandhi replied, "There are four things that the Christians must do. First, let Christians live like Jesus Christ. Second, do not compromise your faith. Third, learn all you can about the non-Christian religions. And fourth, let everything you do be characterized by love." I believe that the Indian leader had great insight into the nature of Christianity and that his last point in particular exposed its true priorities.

Is everything you do and I do characterized by love? To have it be so is not optional. It is actually to be what Francis A. Schaeffer in The Church at the End of the Twentieth Century, calls "the mark of the Christian," a label to distinguish a Christian "not just in one era or in one locality but at all times and all places until Jesus returns." According to the Bible, others are even to judge the credibility of our life and our witness to Jesus Christ by its presence.

Does this seem extreme to you? It is not, for it is based on the explicit teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ himself. During one of his farewell discourses to his disciples just before his crucifixion, Jesus said, "A new command I give you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another. By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another" (John 13:34, 35). How are the unsaved to know that we are Christ's disciples? By our love! If we love each other! On another occasion Jesus taught that this same love was also to be extended to those we are seeking to win; for he taught that the second most important commandment—after loving God with all our being—is this: "Love your neighbor as yourself."

Do we love like this? Is this our mark? The following two stories measure whether or not this essential mark of the Christian is present in our lives. The first story comes from the years I spent in Basel, Switzerland, doing graduate study. A girl named Sheila, who had come from a bad background in England, had gone to Switzerland when still quite young to make a better life for herself. She was lonely, and having no one to whom to turn, she unfortunately fell in with a young man who did not marry her but who left her with a child. By the time I had met her the child was about four years old, and Sheila herself was on guard with most people and very hostile to the church and Christianity.

In time, through the witness of the English-speaking community, she became a Christian. Some time later my wife and I left to return to America, and she immigrated to Canada. We corresponded with her for about six months after she arrived in Canada, and we had the impression that she was not fitting in with any Christian group in her area. We went to visit her and found that we were right; we began to talk with various Christian people about her. There was interest to a degree, but no real love. We were usually told, "Oh, there is a very good church in our city." And we were given the name. Sometimes it was a Presbyterian church, sometimes Baptist, sometimes independent. But in all our conversations not one person said, "Give me her name and address. I'll stop by and invite her to go with me on Sunday morning."

Finally, being very unhappy, she left that city for another one and (I am afraid) once again fell in with bad company. Eventually, in spite of much effort, we lost touch with her.

The second story is more promising. The Rev. Fernando Vangioni, assistant evangelist with the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, told it at the Berlin Congress on Evangelism (1966). He said that he was in South America for a series of meetings. After one meeting a woman came up to him and said, "I wonder if you would take time to speak to a girl whom I am bringing to the meeting tomorrow night. She went to New York some years ago full of hope, thinking that America was the land of opportunity. Instead of doing well she went through terrible times in the city. She was used by one man after another. All treated her badly. Now she has returned to this country very bitter, and hostile to all forms of Christianity." The evangelist said he would speak with her.

On the next night the girl was there, but when Mr. Vangioni and she met, there was not the slightest response to his attempts to speak with her. He said he had never looked into eyes that were so hard-looking or listened to a voice so hostile. At last, seeing that he was making no progress, Mr. Vangioni asked, "Do you mind if I pray for you?"

The girl said, "Pray if you like, but don't preach to me. And don't expect me to listen."

He began to pray, and as he prayed he was greatly moved. Something in the tragedy of her life caused tears to run down his face. At last he stopped. There was nothing to add. He said, "All right, you may go now."

But the girl did not go. Instead, touched by this manifestation of love for her, she replied, "No, I won't go. You can preach to me now. No man has ever cried for me before."

I do not know what your reaction to that is. Perhaps the tears came more easily to a man of Latin temperament. But I wonder if you have ever been touched at all for one who is lost and ignorant of Christ's love. Do you merely say, "Oh, we have a wonderful church; she should go there"? Or do you go out of your way to seek and save the lost, crushed, and lonely? We should be able to say, as Paul did, "If we are out of our mind, it is for the sake of God; if we are in our right mind, it is for you. For Christ's love compels us. ...We are therefore Christ's ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us. We implore you on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:13-14, 20).

Chapter 21.
The Baptism of John

John 1:29-34

Several studies ago, before I began to look at the subject of witnessing in John's Gospel, I noted that after we had completed that study we would be going back to some verses skipped earlier and consider the subject of baptism. The verses that refer to baptism are verses 29 to 34. These verses refer to John's baptism, the baptism of Jesus by John, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit or Christian baptism. Consequently, they are a proper base on which to discuss the whole subject of baptism and its significance.

I want to say at the outset, however, that almost nothing that follows will be directed toward the traditional differences within the Christian church regarding baptism. Nothing should be construed as a commentary on infant baptism versus adult baptism. Nothing should be applied to the various modes of administering baptism. Instead, it will be directed primarily at understanding the meaning of the identification of believers with Christ, which is what water baptism signifies.

A Difficult Subject

This is an enormous and complicated subject. The truth of this statement can be seen quite easily merely by reflecting on the number of books that have been written about baptism in recent years and on the fact that they do not agree. One of the most influential works on baptism is by Karl Barth, entitled, The Teaching of the Church Regarding Baptism. It restates many of the Reformed doctrines about baptism but opposes infant baptism. Shortly after Barth's book appeared, Oscar Cullmann, Barth's colleague at the University of Basel, Switzerland, also wrote a book on baptism, but he disagreed with Barth. His work is called Baptism in the New Testament. Joachim Jeremias, a great biblical scholar, wrote a masterful volume entitled Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries. He was contradicted by Kurt Aland (Did the Early Church Baptize Infants?). Now we have Jeremias's reply to Aland's contradiction. There are also many other substantial works, such as that by G. R. Beasley-Murray, called, like Cullmann's work, Baptism in the New Testament.

Bapto and Baptizo

The difficulty of dealing with the subject is compounded further by the fact that there are two very closely related words for "baptism" in the New Testament, instead of one. Although it is a difficulty, recognition of this fact is actually the first step toward solving the difficulty. The first word is bapto, which means "to dip" or "to immerse." The second word is baptizo, which has quite obviously been transliterated into English to give us our word "baptize."

Whenever a word is transliterated into English, this in itself is quite often an indication of a multiplicity of meanings. If the word baptizo had lent itself to an easy translation, an obvious English word would have been used to translate it. Thus, if baptizo had meant only "to immerse" (which is what bapto means), then "immerse" would be the word used. We would speak of "John the Immerser." Or we would recite, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, immersing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Actually, this is not the case. Therefore, even the fact of the transliteration is an indication that we must look beyond the purely literal meaning of the word "baptize" to the more important metaphorical meanings.

Here we gain a great deal of help from classical Greek literature, for there is evidence that the Greek classical writers used the word baptizo from about 400 B.C. to the second century after Christ. In their writings, baptizo always points to a change of identity by any means. Thus, to give a few quite general examples, it can refer to a change having taken place by immersing an object in a liquid, as in dying cloth; by drinking too much wine and getting drunk; by overexertion; and by other causes.

Of all the texts that might be cited from antiquity the one that makes greatest clarity of the distinct use of the two words is a text from the Greek poet and physician Nicander, who lived about 200 B.C. In it he used both the word bapto, which we have already seen means "to dip," and the word "baptize" (baptizo). It is a recipe for making a pickle. Nicander says that the vegetable should first be dipped (bapto) into boiling water and then baptized (baptizo) in the vinegar solution. Quite clearly, both operations had to do with immersing the vegetable in the solution. But the first was temporary while the other, the operation of baptizing the vegetable, produced a permanent change. We could say that the baptizing had identified the vegetable with the brine.

This meaning of the word is also obvious in several texts from the Greek translation of the Old Testament and from the New Testament. Thus, in Isaiah 21:4, we read literally: "Transgression baptizes me; my soul is overcome with fear." This means that the writer was changed from a state of quiet trust in God to fearfulness as a result of his transgressions. Similarly, Galatians 3:27 says, "For all of you who were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ"; that is, the Christians in Galatia had been identified with him.

This interpretation of the words bapto and baptizo is necessary if we are to penetrate to the deepest understanding of the subject. What is more, it is absolutely essential if we are to make sense of the word in some instances.

Identification

Since a firm grasp of the metaphorical meaning of the word "baptize" is essential to this and the studies that follow, let me take a moment to deal with a few verses in which only the understanding of baptism as identification makes any sense at all of the passage.

The first one is Mark 16:16. This verse says: "Whoever believes and is baptized [baptizo, not bapto] will be saved." There are persons who have read that verse and then drawn the entirely false and indeed foolish conclusion that unless a person is baptized with water he cannot be saved. According to this view, the unbelieving thief crucified with Christ would have been lost. Once we get away from the idea that the verse is talking about water, however, which it is not, and think in terms of the believer's identification with Christ, then the statement becomes clear; and we recognize that Jesus was calling for an intellectual belief in himself plus personal commitment. "He who believes in me and is identified with me shall be saved." In this form the verse is an exact theological parallel to John 1:12 ("Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God") and Revelation 3:20 ("Here I am! I stand at the door and knock. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in and eat with him, and he with me"). All three verses teach that there must be a personal identification with Jesus by the one believing.

The metaphorical meaning of the word "baptize" illuminates another passage—1 Corinthians 10:1-2: "For I do not want you to be ignorant of the fact, brothers, that our forefathers were all under the cloud and that they all passed through the sea. They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea." This passage is especially significant, since the people of Israel were quite obviously not covered or immersed in either the sea or the cloud. The cloud was not over them; it was behind them, separating them from the pursuing Egyptians. And if any group was immersed in the sea, it was the Egyptians, who were drowned in it. The only idea that gives any meaning here is a change of identity. Before they crossed the Red Sea the people were in rebellion against Moses. After the Red Sea their original attitude of rebellion was changed into an attitude of obedience and rejoicing, and they were identified with Moses for the remainder of their desert wandering.

My final example of a verse in which the metaphorical meaning of the word "baptize" is required is 1 Corinthians 15:29. It is the most striking of all. This verse says: "Now if there is no resurrection, what will those do who are baptized for the dead?" I guarantee that you will never make sense of that verse by taking it literally unless, like one of the major cults, you are foolish enough to conclude that you can provide salvation for your dead relatives by being immersed in water for them. So far as I know, this is the only group in the world that believes this. Not even the Roman Catholic church would affirm it, in spite of the fact that priests do say masses for the dead and that baptisms for the dead could be lucrative.

If we do not interpret this verse as evidence for the practice of water baptism on behalf of the dead, then, in what sense are we to interpret it? Take it in the sense that I have outlined, and in that sense place it into the context of Paul's argument in this chapter. Paul has been marshaling arguments for the existence of life after death. He has shown that Jesus was raised. He has argued that if there is no resurrection, then the fact of Jesus' resurrection could not have been established. After concluding in verse 20, "But Christ has indeed been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep," he deals with the consequences of the resurrection, speaking of the resurrection of all believers and the eventual victory of Christ over death and evil.

At this point Paul turns to a related subject and begins to talk about the foolishness of living a Christian life, with all its hardships and persecutions, if there is no resurrection. If this life is all there is, then we should get the best out of it and forget trying to live by Christ's standards. On the other hand, if there is a resurrection, then we should be willing to die to sin now in order that we might rejoice with Christ hereafter. That is his argument.

Now let us translate the verse in this context and with the idea of the believer's identification with Christ in place of the word "baptize."

"For what is the sense of being identified as dead men, if the dead rise not at all? Why should they be identified as dead? Why should they be crucified with Christ? And why are we standing in jeopardy every hour? Why are we in danger of persecution by the authorities for our way of life? I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I am identified with Christ in His death every day. That is, I am baptized every day. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what does it get me, if the dead rise not? If there is no resurrection, then let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall be dead."

When we understand the passage in this way, 1 Corinthians 15:29-33 becomes a great argument for our separation from the world's standards of conduct. It is an encouragement to put first things first because of our identification with the Lord Jesus Christ.

John and Jesus

We may now apply the full meaning of "baptize" to the baptism of Jesus by John and to John's baptism generally. Certainly we have looked at enough texts to establish the metaphorical meaning.

What was the significance of John's baptism? John explained it himself in Matthew 3:11 by saying, "I baptize you with water for repentance." That is, John came to prepare the way for Jesus by calling men to repentance; and those who repented of their sin he baptized, as a sign that they had repented. We might say that he identified the repenters. Thus, Today's English Version translates the verse, "I baptize you with water to show that you have repented." When Jesus came John also baptized Jesus, but in this case naturally the identification was not for repentance. Jesus had nothing of which to repent. In this case, John was identifying Jesus as the Messiah. Consequently, we are not surprised to find that this is exactly what John himself declares in our text from John's Gospel: "I myself did not know him, but the reason I came baptizing with water was that he might be revealed to Israel" (John 1:31).

Finally we must recognize that when Jesus submitted to John's baptism, he too was undergoing an identification—an identification with mankind. It was not an identification with man's sin, of course; it was a declaration that Jesus was fully man apart from man's sin and that he was not ashamed to be identified with his brethren.

In this, Jesus became the fulfillment of the type of humble and self-effacing character revealed in the Old Testament by Moses. We are told in Hebrews that Moses "when he had grown up, refused to be known as the son of Pharaoh's daughter. He chose to be mistreated along with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a short time. He regarded disgrace for the sake of Christ as of greater value than the treasures of Egypt, because he was looking ahead to his reward" (Heb. 11:24-26). That is what the Lord Jesus Christ did for us in an infinitely greater way. He turned his back upon the glories of heaven in order to be identified with us, in order to become one with us; and he did so in love in order that we might become identified with him.

Chapter 22.
The Baptism of the Holy Spirit

John 1:29-34

In the first chapter of John's Gospel, the same verses that tell us that John the Baptist came baptizing with water also tell us that Jesus Christ came to baptize with the Holy Spirit. Thus, we are led to the questions: What is the baptism of the Holy Spirit? How does one receive this baptism? For whom is the baptism of the Holy Spirit intended? The text itself says, "I would not have known him, except that the one who sent me to baptize with water told me, 'The man on whom you see the Spirit come down and remain is he who will baptize with the Holy Spirit.' I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God" (John 1:33-34).

As we begin to study this subject, we will be guided quite naturally by our previous discussion of the meaning of the word "baptize." Thus, we will not be talking about any particular mode of administering water baptism or about infant versus adult baptism. We will be talking solely about the nature of that "identification," or "transformation," that the Holy Spirit brings.

For All Believers

Here, of course, we are helped by a number of other verses that are found in the New Testament: 1 Corinthians 12:13, Romans 6:3, Ephesians 4:5, and others. These verses are not descriptive of any particular phenomenon associated with the giving of the Holy Spirit in the early church. They are verses that teach us about the meaning of our baptism with the Holy Spirit, and we turn to them because in relation to this doctrine as in relation to all other doctrines the Bible student must be guided by explicit teaching and not phenomena. To give an example, if we were to read in the Bible that someone in need of a great deal of money prayed for it and received it, that would not mean that each of us could invariably make the same prayer and receive the same answer. We would have to be guided in our understanding of prayer by what the Bible says explicitly about it. In the same way, we do not want to be guided in our understanding of the baptism of the Holy Spirit by the fact that some (not all) of the early Christians spoke in tongues as a result of receiving the Spirit, or saw the Spirit descend as small flames of fire. We want to be guided by what the New Testament teaches about the Holy Spirit in general and about his baptism.

One of the most instructive verses about the baptism of the Holy Spirit is 1 Corinthians 12:13. "For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body—whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free— and we were all given the one Spirit to drink." The context shows us that the body spoken of here is the body of Christ or the true church, and the point of the verse is that all who believe in Christ are baptized by means of the Holy Spirit into his body. Hence, the baptism of the Holy Spirit is for all believers.

As I say this I know there will be some who will question it primarily because of the way in which the phrase "the baptism of the Holy Spirit" is used in our day. It is used to denote an experience generally linked with the gift of speaking in tongues, but this use of the phrase is inaccurate. I am not entering here into a discussion of the gift of tongues. I question much of what passes today for the gift of tongues, but I also believe that God can do anything. If he has chosen to give this gift in a special way today, so be it. I am not questioning that. My point is that the experience of tongues or of any other charismatic gift is not the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

It is also inaccurate to refer to the baptism of the Spirit as a second work of grace, as some have done. I will not question for a moment the need for a second work of grace, so long as the person speaking of it acknowledges the need for a third work of grace, a fourth work of grace, a fifth work of grace, and so on up to infinity. There are many experiences of God's grace in the life of a Christian; the Holy Spirit is the vehicle of them. There is also a need, as the Bible indicates, for a constant filling and refilling with the Spirit. But this filling of the Holy Spirit is not the baptism of the Holy Spirit. That is the point. Therefore, the only accurate usage of the phrase is that which applies it to all true believers as the means by which they become identified with Christ as members of his mystical body.

Another verse is Romans 6:3: "Or don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death?" This means that all believers are identified with Christ in his death through the Holy Spirit. Ephesians 4:5 says that there is "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Correctly understood, this verse is a reference to the Trinity. "One Lord" is God the Father, Jehovah. "One faith" is the faith concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. "One baptism" is the baptism of the Holy Spirit. In each case the verses cited speak about an experience common to all who believe on Jesus Christ.

We now see why John the Baptist pointed to Jesus as the One who baptizes with the Holy Spirit.
To do so was a characteristic of his ministry. "In other words," as John R. W. Stott writes in The Baptism and Fullness of the Holy Spirit, "just as John is called 'the Baptist' or 'the baptizer' because it was characteristic of his ministry to baptize with water, so Jesus is called 'the Baptist' or 'the baptizer,' because it is characteristic of His ministry to baptize with the Holy Spirit." This happens to all who believe. In this the Lord Jesus Christ fulfilled a long list of prophecies (cf. Ezek. 36:26, 27; Joel 2:28-32) and ushered in the distinctive blessing for all true believers in this age.

Married to Christ

At this point of our study let me introduce an illustration. The illustration is a good one and will not only summarize much of what we have been saying but will also carry us farther along. What is the illustration that the Bible itself uses to describe our identification with Christ? The answer is: marriage (Eph. 5:22-23). In other words, we are identified with Christ in the moment of our belief by means of the Holy Spirit in exactly the same way in which a bride is identified with her husband in the marriage ceremony.

In the first place, the marriage changes the woman's name. She comes into the church as Mary Jones, let us say. She repeats, "I, Mary, take thee, John, to be my wedded husband; and I do promise and covenant, before God and these witnesses, to be thy loving and faithful wife; in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health; as long as we both shall live." There comes the point in the service where the minister says, "And now by the authority committed unto me as a minister of the Church of Jesus Christ, I declare that John Smith and Mary Jones Smith are now husband and wife, according to the ordinance of God and the law of the state." And Mary, who came into the church as Miss Jones, leaves the church as Mrs. Smith. Mary has been identified with her husband by means of the marriage ceremony. In the same way, the name of the believer is changed from Miss Sinner to Mrs. Christian as she is identified with the Lord Jesus Christ. You could even say that it is the Holy Spirit himself who performs the ceremony.

It is not only Mary's name that is changed as a result of the ceremony, however. There is also a legal change. If Mary owned property before the marriage ceremony, she could have sold it as late as that morning with no signature but her own upon the document. After the marriage ceremony she can no longer do that. Instead, she will need her husband's signature also. In addition to the legal change there is a psychological change. Mary knows that she is a married woman and no longer single. She expects to make adjustments. There is also a change socially. Many of her friends from her single days will now gradually be replaced with married friends, and other women will regard her differently as well.

In exactly the same way, there are also many changes that take place in the moment when the Holy Spirit baptizes us into Christ or identifies us with him. We are baptized with the Spirit. We are placed within the body of Christ. We are identified with Christ. We are sealed with the Holy Spirit until the day of the redemption of our bodies. All these changes take place simultaneously and can be summarized by the truths that we are "in Christ" and that it is the Holy Spirit who has placed us there.

"In Christ"

When we were baptized with the Holy Spirit we were baptized "into Christ Jesus" (Rom. 6:3). What does it mean to be baptized "into Christ" or to be "in Christ"? In all there are over a hundred verses in the New Testament that use the word "in" before one of the names of the Lord Jesus, and when these are arranged in order chronologically they show us that we have been placed in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we are identified with him in his birth, in his circumcision, in his death, in his resurrection, and that we are to be found in Christ forever.

1. The Bible tells us that we were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4). Donald Grey Barnhouse has written: "Since we have already seen that we enter Christ by the work of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, we must see that the very first work performed by the Holy Spirit in our behalf was our eternal election to be members of His body. In His eternal decrees our God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, determined that He should not be solitary forever, and decided that out of the multitude of creatures that would be born as sons of Adam, a vast host should one day become sons of God, and should be made partakers of the divine nature, and should be conformed unto the image of the Lord Jesus Christ. This company, which would become the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, would become sons by the new birth, but members of the body by the baptism of the Holy Spirit." Thus, our first identification with Christ was in our election.

2. We are also identified with the Lord Jesus Christ in his birth. Some will ask, "But how are we identified with Christ in his birth?" The answer is that his birth is a picture of our birth, spiritually speaking. We read in 2 Corinthians 5:17: "If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation." So we can say that by means of the Holy Spirit we have been identified with Christ in the very life of God. What happened in the birth of the Lord Jesus? The sinless and divine life of Christ was placed within the sinful and quite human body of the virgin Mary. For a time it appeared that the divine life had been swallowed up, but the life was there and in time revealed itself through the birth of the infant Jesus. In the same way God has announced to us that we shall experience his very own life coming to reside within our hearts. If we reply, as Mary did, "How will this be ... since I am a virgin?" the answer is that "the Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. So the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God" (Luke 1:34-35). For those of us who believe, all that is good in us is the result of this planting of the divine nature. We are sons of God solely because of our identification with God's Son.

3. We are identified with Christ in his circumcision, for we read: "For in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form, and you have been given fullness in Christ, who is the head over every power and authority. In him you were also circumcised, in the putting off of the sinful nature, not with a circumcision done by the hands of men but with the circumcision done by Christ" (Col. 2:9-11). Circumcision signifies a separation from the sins of the flesh. Christ was totally separated from such sins. Therefore, we must learn that it is the desire of the Holy Spirit, who has identified us with Christ, to make us like Christ in this separation.

4. We are also identified with Christ in his death, for Romans 6:3 declares: "Or don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death?" There are two senses in which this is true. First, when Jesus Christ died on the cross I died with him so far as my sin is concerned. God the Father put God the Son to death, and since I was united to him by means of the Holy Spirit from before the foundation of the world, I too was put to death. My sin was punished, and I may now stand boldly in God's presence cleansed forevermore. On the basis of this death I may correctly sing:

My sin—oh, the bliss of this glorious thought!— My sin, not in part, but the whole,

Is nailed to the cross and I bear it no more,
Praise the Lord, praise the Lord, O my soul!

Second, there is also a sense in which my identity with Christ in his death refers to my life here and now. In fact, this is the purpose for which the truth is mentioned in Romans 6. The theme is the believer's growth in holiness. The life of sin is in the past. The future is holiness. Consequently, the believer is to count himself dead unto sin but alive unto God through the life of the Lord Jesus (v. 11). We might say that through our identification with Christ in his death, the power of sin over us is broken and we are set free to obey God.

5. Finally, we are also identified with Christ in his resurrection (Rom. 6:5). It is true, of course, that one day even our bodies shall be raised in the likeness of his resurrection, but that is certainly not the present or the primary meaning of our identification with Christ in his resurrection as that doctrine is taught in Scripture. The point is that our identification with Christ in his resurrection gives us the possibility of living out the life of Christ now. Thus we should cry out with Paul, "I want to know Christ and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death" (Phil. 3:10-11). That is a present experience. The power of his resurrection is the power of the true Christian life.

All this—our identification with Christ in his birth, circumcision, death, and resurrection—is now ours because of our identification with Jesus Christ through the baptism of the Holy Spirit. In a former generation it was the custom often to carve on tombstones the inscription: "Here lies John Smith, who entered into eternal life on the 6th of June, 1854." Do not ever have an inscription like that put on your tombstone. If you have any inscription, let your inscription be to the effect that you were chosen in Christ from before the foundation of the world and that you enjoyed his life within you here as a present possession.

Chapter 23.
Christian Baptism

John 1:29-34

At Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where I serve as the pastor, two steps are usually followed by those who wish to unite with the congregation. First, a person desiring to become a member must meet with the session and give a testimony regarding his own personal faith in Jesus Christ. At this time his name is added to the rolls. Second, he is welcomed publicly before the rest of the congregation on the following Sunday morning. Both steps are normal, but we always tell a new member that his membership does not depend upon the public recognition. On the contrary, he is a member in good standing from the moment of his appearance before the session. He enjoys from that moment all the rights and privileges possessed by any other member of the congregation.

In some ways this is an illustration of the difference between the baptism of the Holy Spirit, which we discussed in our last study, and water baptism, to which study we now come. Both are normal in the natural course of things. But they are two distinct acts, and the second is never essential to enjoying the benefits of being joined to Christ, which is true Christianity.

Rites and Ceremonies

This is the first principle we need to establish in regard to water baptism: No rite or ceremony ever enters into the essence of Christianity. In Paul's day, as also in all other ages of the Christian church, there were some who denied this. These persons thought that the blessings of salvation could be enjoyed only by those who adhered to circumcision, that is, who entered into Christianity by the initiatory rite of Judaism. In opposition to their views Paul taught that salvation came purely by grace and was not secured by any act performed by the individual.

In discussing this subject it was normal for Paul to take Abraham as his example, for Abraham was the clearest example in the Old Testament of a man justified before God entirely apart from any ceremonies or from the keeping of the law. Here is his argument in one of its most concise forms: "We have been saying that Abraham's faith was credited to him as righteousness. Under what circumstances was it credited? Was it after he was circumcised, or before? It was not after, but before! And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness that he had by faith while he was still uncircumcised. So then, he is the father of all who believe but have not been circumcised, in order that righteousness might be credited to them. And he is also the father of the circumcised who not only are circumcised but who also walk in the footsteps of the faith that our father Abraham had before he was circumcised" (Rom. 4:9-12).

We learn from this statement, first, that all who believe are saved, whether or not they are circumcised. We learn, second, that God gave Abraham the rite of circumcision, not before his justification by faith but after it, in order to make clear that the rite was not the means by which Abraham entered into salvation. Therefore, we say again that no rite or ceremony ever enters into the essence of Christianity.

It does not follow from this, however, that all rites and ceremonies are therefore to be cast aside or disregarded by Christ's followers, as some groups have done, who have no sacraments at all. Some rites or ceremonies have value. This is the second principle.

According to Paul, this was even true in regard to circumcision. "What value is there in circumcision?" he asks in Romans 3:1. He answered, "Much in every way." Thus, in Romans 4:9-12, the passage we have just read, he points out that circumcision had value to Abraham in being a sign and a seal of God's prior act of justification.

Benjamin B. Warfield, who was one of the greatest Reformed theologians America has produced, writes in his discussion of this subject, "According to this passage circumcision had no function whatever in the procuring or reception of salvation, whether as a means of securing it, or as a condition of its gift, or as a channel of its bestowment. It did not precede salvation as, in one way or another, obtaining it or facilitating its reception; it followed upon it, as presupposing its existence already." However, God in his grace gave Abraham circumcision as a sign and a seal of his righteousness. "The value of circumcision consisted, therefore, just in this: that it marked Abraham out, by a visible sign, as one who had received this righteousness from God and was henceforth to be the Lord's, and it sealed that righteousness to him under a covenant promise."

We may, therefore, make it a third principle that the rites or ceremonies that do have value have it because they have been established by God as signs of his grace and seals of his covenant promises.

A Sign

I know there are some who will think that for a message purporting to be about water baptism, I have spent an excessive amount of time discussing circumcision. But I believe the discussion is essential, not only because of the close associations between the two—both are acts initiating a person into the body of God's people—but also because the most detailed New Testament discussion of the place of a rite or ceremony involves circumcision. Clearly this was because circumcision was a problem for the early Christian evangelists and needed discussion, while baptism, in spite of its obvious similarities to circumcision, was not. What is more, the discussion of circumcision has been useful, for it has given us the two terms—"sign" and "seal"—that are most useful in understanding Christian baptism.

The first of these two terms, then, is a "sign." What is a sign? Quite simply, a sign is a visible object designed to point to a reality different from itself and greater. In the case of the sacraments the sign is outward and visible, and the reality to which it points is inward and spiritual. Baptism with water points to our identification with Jesus Christ by means of the Holy Spirit.

Baptism identifies us as being the Lord's. It does not make us the Lord's, but it is the sign that identifies us as belonging to him. Several years ago when I was traveling across the western part of the United States with my family I began to come across signs advising the traveler that he was approaching "Joe's Wigwam." It was a desolate area. The signs were large. So probably for most persons traveling through that area of the country, the signs became the number one source of entertainment for many miles. The first sign read, "50 miles to Joe's Wigwam"; the next sign: "40 miles to Joe's Wigwam." There was a sign for 30 miles, then 20, 15, 10, 5, 3, and 1. The next sign was an attention getter: "Get Ready! It's Coming!" And then another: "Only 500 Feet." Suddenly, there it was—a large gift shop with a motel and a gas station—and over it the largest sign of all: "Joe's Wigwam." I can almost guarantee that no one who passes through that section of the country ever goes into the gift shop, motel, or gas station and asks, "By the way, who owns this place?" Joe owns it, of course! The signs are there to point to it and indicate this fact.

It is in this sense that Christian baptism is a sign. It does not make a person a Christian any more than Joe's sign gives him tide to the gift shop, motel, and gas station. Baptism simply indicates that he is now a Christian.

Moreover, this is not just true in reference to the unbelieving world. Baptism does have a reference to that. It is our way of telling the world that we are not our own, that we have been bought with a price, that we have been identified with Jesus. That is true. But it is also true that it speaks to ourselves. It has been reported of Martin Luther that he had hours when he seemed to be confused about everything, no doubt because of the strain and mental fatigue of being for twenty-eight years in the forefront of the Protestant Reformation in Germany. He questioned the value of the Reformation; he questioned his faith; he even questioned the work of the Lord Jesus Christ himself. But during those hours, we are told, he would write in chalk on his table the two words: Baptizatus sum! I have been baptized! Thus he would reassure himself that he really was Christ's and that he had been identified with him in his death and resurrection.

I must interject a word here lest anyone think that because I have referred to Luther in this way, I am assigning some magical property to baptism. That is not the case. Baptism is a sign, not a transaction. In fact, it was actually the failure to see this, coupled with the desire to give the sacrament status as a means of grace entirely on its own that led to the abuse of baptism first in the early Roman Catholic church and then also in the sixteenth century in the various church groupings that resulted from the Protestant Reformation.

The Roman church led the way by ascribing a value to the sacraments in themselves and then elevating them to a position over against preaching and the receiving of biblical knowledge. When this happened, it was the sacrament rather than belief that became necessary for salvation. In the case of baptism there arose the peculiar custom of delaying baptism until the last possible moment before death in order that the greatest number of sins might be washed away by it. In certain sectors of the Protestant church, the same views are expressed through the existence of a sacerdotal priesthood, the elevation of the communion table conceived as an altar, and occasionally even by the language used at either the Lord's Supper or the administration of baptism.

All these practices are inconsistent with the biblical teaching regarding baptism and the Lord's Supper. Thus we lay them aside in order to adhere to the view that sees the sacraments as a sign and a seal of God's covenant.

God's Seal

That brings us to the second point. Baptism is a sign, but it is also a seal. So we ask ourselves, "In what sense is baptism a seal? What is meant by a seal anyway?"

In our day the use of official seals is diminishing, but we still have enough examples to remind us of a seal's significance. If you have ever gone abroad, you will have gone through the experience of procuring a passport, which bears the seal of the United States of America. It is stamped into the paper in such a way that it is impossible to remove or change it, and it validates the passport. Furthermore, if you have ever had to swear to the truth of some statement before a notary public, you would have seen him affix his seal to the document, thereby confirming the oath that you made before him.

In ancient times seals were in much greater use. Since most men, even the very rich or important, could not write, a seal was the equivalent of one's signature. Men carried their seals with them, and they affixed them to letters or documents as a pledge of their work and as a recognition of their responsibility. If we put the two ideas together—the idea of an official seal and a signature—we get some idea of the meaning of a seal in regard to baptism. By receiving baptism we indicate that we are the Lord Jesus Christ's. His name has been affixed to us; his seal on us is evidence that he stands behind his promises.

Once again let me quote from Warfield. "There is nothing in the whole history of the people of God which they value more highly, on which they more deeply felicitate themselves, on which they more securely depend, than that they are called by the name of the Lord. It was to this fact that they appealed when in their affliction they turned to the Hope of Israel, the Savior thereof in time of trouble: 'Thou, O Jehovah, art in the midst of us, and we are called by thy name; leave us not' (Jer. 14:9). It was in this that their jubilation reached its height: 'I am called by thy name, O Jehovah, God of hosts' (Jer. 15:16)."

Thus, says Warfield, "When our Lord commanded his disciples to baptize those whom in their world-wide mission they should draw to Christ 'into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,' precisely what he bade them do was to call them by the name of the Triune God, that they might be marked out as his and sealed to him as an eternal possession."

If you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, this is what God has done with you. You have been called to Christ. His name has been affixed to you, and you are now sealed to him as a valued and eternal possession.

Sealed with the Spirit

There is one final point. It is the fact that in the New Testament the word "seal" is actually always applied to the Holy Spirit rather than to the administration of water baptism. This does not mean that water baptism does not have the characteristics of a seal as we have discussed them, but it does mean that the work of the Holy Spirit is so great and so real that the term is reserved quite naturally almost exclusively for his baptism. Thus we are told that when we believed in Christ we "were marked in him with a seal, the promised Holy Spirit" (Eph. 1:13) and that we were "sealed for the day of redemption" (Eph. 4:30).

This is our true security as God's people. In the Book of Ezekiel there is a prophecy that concerns God's dealings with Israel at the end of history. Six men enter Jerusalem to pronounce judgment upon the inhabitants, but before they go in, one man clothed in linen and carrying a writing kit enters to "put a mark on the foreheads of those who grieve and lament over all the detestable things that are done" in Israel (Ezek. 9:4). Afterward the others are told, "Slaughter old men, young men and maidens, women and children, but do not touch anyone who has the mark" (v. 6).

In the same way, you and I and all who believe in the Lord Jesus are identified by the Holy Spirit of God as Christ's men, as Christians. We are made secure in that identification. The Bible says, "God's solid foundation stands firm, sealed with this inscription: "The Lord knows those who are his" And it adds, "Everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness" (2 Tim. 2:19).

Chapter 24.
You Shall See Angels

John 1:51

I wonder if you have ever had a particularly delightful experience and then discovered to your added delight that there was much more of the same to be enjoyed? I remember one experience like that that I had at a very early age. Someone had given me a book that contained one of the adventures of the Hardy boys, two young brothers whose father was a detective, who were always getting mixed up in his adventures. I thought it was one of a kind when I received it, and I loved it. It was a fascinating adventure. But then, imagine my added delight when I discovered that the book I owned was only one of a long series of books with the same characters and that I had only touched the surface of their adventures in my reading.

That kind of experience is one we all have at different periods of our lives. I know you have had it. What I would like to see, however, is that this is also an experience that you can have spiritually. That is, you can learn something particularly wonderful about Jesus, have moments of wonderful fellowship with him, experience his power, and then know that the pleasure can be enjoyed increasingly forever.

What are the words that characterize the Lord Jesus Christ? He is eternal. This means that he is without beginning and without ending. He antedates time. He goes beyond it. He is completely independent of it. Length of days does not exhaust him. Jesus Christ is also immutable, as God is. That means that he does not change and will never change. He is omniscient. There is nothing known or to be known that he does not already know, and all our knowledge is simply our thinking his thoughts after him. Because he is omniscient there will also be no end to our own growth in knowledge as his children. He is perfect and inexhaustible in his love. Nothing will mar our experience of his love; nothing will diminish it. His mercy and righteousness and holiness will be a never-ending pleasure for those whom he has redeemed. What can exhaust the inexhaustible? What finite mind can plumb the infinite? It is impossible. Certainly, at his right hand there will be "eternal pleasures" (Ps. 16:11).

The Problem

In a general way this is quite clearly the point of the very last verse of John 1. The first chapter of John reveals Jesus in a variety of contexts and under an unusual variety of names. He is the Word, the Light, the Lamb, the Son of God, Rabbi, the Messiah, the King of Israel. These titles culminate in the confession of Nathanael who, after some initial skepticism, declares, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (v. 49). At this point, however, Jesus answers that all the insight and experience that these confessions embody, wonderful as they are, are only a prelude to an infinite series of such experiences that lie ahead. That is, there is more to come. He therefore declares, "I tell you the truth, you shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (v. 51).

In a general way the idea of additional delightful experiences for those who have believed on Jesus lies at the heart of this verse. But when we try to go beyond this, when we hunt for a more precise reference, we run into problems. The verse is a promise, but a promise of what? To be even more explicit, when is heaven opened and when are angels to be seen? Exactly what is this verse talking about?

This is not just a problem for us in our age, of course. It has been a problem for many interpreters down through the years of church history. Why? The difficulty lies not so much in finding an explanation for the verse or a reference for it—many have done that—but in finding an explanation or reference that deals with each of the parts of the puzzle.

There is a puzzle that I am sure many people have seen, made of several pieces of cardboard of various shapes that are to be combined into a square. If you have ever attempted to do this puzzle, you know that it is not difficult to make a square. In fact, you can make several squares of different sizes. The difficulty is that there always seem to be one or more pieces left over. The puzzle is solved only when a square is made in which all the pieces are utilized. It is the same in our handling of John 1:51. This is a puzzle with four pieces, the four major parts of the verse: (1) the reference to the future you shall see; (2) the fact that the heavens will open; (3) the reference to angels ascending and descending upon Jesus; and (4) the title given by Jesus to himself, "the Son of Man." Any good explanation of the verse should explain each of these four parts.

There are a number of explanations that refer to just one. Probably the most popular explanation in contemporary books is the one that links the verse to the vision of Jacob in which he saw angels ascending and descending upon a ladder from heaven (Gen. 28:12). The difficulty with this view is in finding a reason why Jesus should allude to Jacob in this context. It is true that Jacob was a type of Christ in one sense. He is the man who left home to find a bride in a foreign country, just as Christ left heaven to redeem his bride, the church. But this is a bit farfetched. And it does not help us much to imagine that Nathanael might have been reading about the Jacob story when Philip called him.

Some explanations refer to a ministry of angels to Jesus during Jesus' lifetime. But the difficulty with this view is that this happened only twice during the lifetime of Jesus, once at the close of his temptation by Satan in the wilderness and once in Gethsemane, and neither Nathanael, Andrew, or Philip was present on these occasions.

In Luther's exposition of these chapters, the father of the Reformation calls attention to the heavens being opened and notes that this also happened twice. It happened at Jesus' baptism (when the dove descended, but not angels), and it happened at his transfiguration. However, as Luther notes, only three of the apostles saw heaven opened at the transfiguration. None saw it at the baptism. Therefore, says Luther, "This story must be interpreted spiritually." Luther refers the story to the church and to the access that all believers have through Christ to heaven.

Is this the explanation? Does this explain the four pieces of the puzzle? I do not think so. On the other hand, I think there is an explanation that does. According to this explanation, when Jesus said, "You shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man," he was not talking about anything that took place during the lifetime of Nathanael. Nor was he talking about anything that took place either in the lifetime of Philip or Andrew or any of the other disciples or even of you and me. He was talking about something that is still future, that is still to come. In other words, although no one has seen the fulfillment of this verse yet, all will one day see it when Jesus Christ returns.

When you take the verse in this sense, all the elements of the verse fall into place. "You shall see" becomes genuinely future, and not just for Nathanael. The heavens are to be opened literally. Angels will accompany Jesus. And the phrase "the Son of Man" receives its true reference as that defined for us in the seventh chapter of the Book of Daniel. "In my vision at night I looked, and there before me was one like a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven. He was given authority, glory and sovereign power; all peoples, nations and men of every language worshiped him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed" (vv. 13-14). This explanation even makes sense of several other verses in the Gospels in which Jesus declared that "the Son of Man is going to come in his Father's glory with his angels, and then he will reward each person according to what he has done" (Matt. 16:27), and again, "In the future you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Matt. 26:64).

Clouds of Glory

If we are to understand this great event, we need to understand first of all that it is a moment of great joy and rejoicing for Christ's followers. Unfortunately, for many Christians today the return of Jesus Christ does not seem to be an event of great joy. They are far from him in fellowship and will be ashamed at his coming.

Revelation 19 portrays this event most graphically, and here all is triumphant. Heaven is astir, and in heaven a great host of persons are shouting hallelujahs. Hallelujah means "praise to Jehovah." First, a great many people shout, "Hallelujah! Salvation and glory and power belong to our God." After this a great multitude shouts again, "Hallelujah." The twenty-four elders and the four cherubim fall down and worship God, crying, "Amen, Hallelujah." Finally a great multitude exclaim, "Hallelujah! For our Lord God Almighty reigns." The picture is one of great joy, for everything is prepared for the Lord's appearing. The Lamb's wife, the glorified church, is ready, clothed in fine linen, clean and white.

Then the chapter proceeds, "I saw heaven opened, and behold, a white horse! He who sat upon it is called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he judges and makes war. His eyes are like a flame of fire, and on his head are many diadems; and he has a name inscribed which no one knows, but himself. He is clad in a robe dipped in blood, and the name by which he is called is The Word of God. And the armies of heaven, arrayed in fine linen, white and pure, followed him on white horses. From his mouth issues a sharp sword with which to smite the nations, and he will rule them with a rod of iron; he will tread the wine press of the fury of the wrath of God the Almighty. On his robe and on his thigh he has a name inscribed, King of kings, and Lord of lords" (Rev. 19:11-16 RSV).

This scene is the fulfillment of the promise Jesus made to Nathanael, and it is one in which you and I shall participate. We shall praise him. We shall glory in his triumphs.

Thou art coming, O my Savior,
Thou art coming, O my King,
In thy beauty all resplendent;

In thy glory all transcendent;
Well may we rejoice and sing:
Coming! in the opening east
Herald brightness slowly swells;
Coming! O my glorious Priest,
Hear we not thy golden bells?
Thou art coming, thou art coming;
We shall meet thee on thy way,

We shall see thee, we shall know thee, We shall bless thee, we shall show thee
All our hearts could never say:
What an anthem that will be,
Ringing out our love to thee,
Pouring out our rapture sweet
At thine own all-glorious feet.
O the joy to see thee reigning,
Thee, my own beloved Lord!
Ev'ry tongue thy Name confessing,
Worship, honor, glory, blessing
Brought to thee with glad accord;
Thee, my Master and my Friend,
Vindicated and enthroned,
Unto earth's remotest end
Glorified, adored and owned.

Does that mean anything to you? It should mean a great deal. In this world you and I often find ourselves as a very small minority as Christians, and we are often discouraged. We wonder how we are ever going to get through this year, this week, this day. How will we ever bear a witness? We would find much of our thinking along these lines transformed if we would only learn to see ourselves as servants of this great Jesus, this King of kings and Lord of lords, who is returning one day on the clouds of heaven with his holy angels.

Day of Judgment

We need to see one thing more. It is true that the scene we have been looking at is a scene of glory, but it is also true that it is a scene of judgment for those who have not responded to the preaching of God's grace through the gospel. This is seen in the imagery of the passage. Revelation 19 describes the garments worn by Jesus as having been dipped in blood, and we are told that he has been treading out "the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God Almighty" (v. 15).

Are you prepared to meet this Christ when he returns? The prophet Daniel was one of the Hebrews who was carried into Babylon when Jerusalem was conquered in the sixth century B.C., and he rose to prominence in Babylon, serving as a minister of state under three successive kings. The second of these kings was Belshazzar. One evening Belshazzar threw a party and invited one thousand of his nobles. It was to be a splendid evening. Picture one thousand nobles dressed in the most regal robes, with gold crowns on their heads, lords of a powerful and farflung empire, heroes of battlefields. Imagine the banquet, the wine, the boastful talk, the abundance of sensual pleasure! Suddenly, in the midst of the revelry, the laughter begins to die away, for a hand has appeared writing on the wall of the palace above the king's table. The words written are, "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." No one can interpret them. The queen suggests that they find Daniel, who can interpret visions. When Daniel arrives at the banquet hall and sees the writing, he cries, "God has numbered the days of your reign and brought it to an end. ...You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting. ...Your kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." The revelers listen in stunned silence. Some perhaps are skeptical. But that night the city is entered, and Darius the Mede reigns on Belshazzar's former throne.

So it is in our own chaotic century. The world is engaged in its banquet. The laughter grows louder, the food is more and more lavish. Revelers indulge in their sensual pleasure. But the banquet is almost over. The last course is about to be served. Soon the hand will appear, and the words of judgment will be pronounced. Where are you in that picture? Are you in the banquet hall? Or are you among those who wait for the coming of the Lord of lords in glory and yearn for the marriage supper of the Lamb?

Chapter 25.
What's in a Name?

John 1:1-51

In the title song of the very successful and at times quite beautiful rock opera Jesus Christ Superstar, the chorus asks movingly:

Jesus Christ, Jesus Christ,
Who are you? What have you sacrificed?
Jesus Christ Superstar,
Do you think you're what they say you are?

In one form or another this question has been asked by many thousands of persons down through history, and many different answers have been given. In the last century alone approximately 60,000 books have sought to explain Jesus. Those writing them have differed widely. So, for many who do not know the biblical replies, the question about who Jesus is goes unanswered.

Fortunately, the Bible does answer the question, and nowhere is it answered in more detail and in a shorter space than in the first chapter of John's Gospel.

Commentators have often noticed the number and variety of names or titles given to Jesus in the fifty-one verses of John 1. What has not been noticed is that the titles have been arranged by John to show in chronological sequence who Jesus is, what he has done, and what he is yet to do. Thus they begin with Jesus as the Word, as he was with God from the beginning. They trace him through the years of his incarnation as the Light, the Lamb of God, the Son of God, and Rabbi. And they deal with things yet to come under the names: Messiah, King of Israel, and Son of Man, the last of which refers to Jesus' role in the final judgment. I believe that it is possible to trace the significance of the past, present, and future ministry of Christ in sequence by means of these titles.

Biblical Names

For us names generally do not mean very much. In the East and in the Bible it is otherwise.

Every careful reader of the Bible must often have been struck with the significance of the divine names revealed to various men in the Scriptures. Abraham, the father of our faith, received a progressive revelation of the character of God by means of God's names. Early in his life Abraham had come to know God as, Jehovah, which means "I am that I am." It was the revelation of God as Jehovah that sent Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees toward what was later to become the land of Israel. After he had done battle with five kings, Abraham learned to know God as El Elyon. This means "the Most High God" and identifies him as the possessor of the heavens and the earth. At the time of the birth of Isaac through a miracle, God was revealed as El Shaddai, "God Almighty." Finally, on the mountain God disclosed that he was also Jehovah Jireh, which means "the Lord will provide."

Similar revelations were given to Jacob, Moses, David, and the prophets, and all are striking. In fact, they are so striking that many scholars have traced the history of God's revelation of himself to Israel by means of them.

In The Revelation of the Father, Anglican Bishop B. F. Westcott has written, "Of God as he is in himself, in his absolute and unapproachable majesty, we can as yet know nothing. But the names by which we are allowed to address him gather up what is shown to us ... of his working and of his will. The divine names receive and reflect scattered rays of heavenly truth as men can bear their effulgence; and when they have been set in our spiritual firmament they burn for ever. Thus each name authoritatively given to God is, so to speak, a fresh and lasting revelation of his nature. Now in one title and now in another we catch glimpses of his ineffable glory."

We also catch glimpses of the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ by means of such titles. And we may study them, particularly those included by John the evangelist, in order to see the entire sweep of the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ from the beginning to the end. That this can be done is itself interesting, for it is John's way of saying that Jesus is truly the alpha and the omega, the beginning and the end. It is the purpose of John's Gospel to reveal him.

The Word

The first title is "Word." It occurs three times in verse 1 and is repeated once more in verse 14.
We read, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. ...The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us."

We have already seen that this title refers to Jesus as the Creator and as the One who, by being God, reveals God. When a thoughtful man of Jewish background would read these verses, he would undoubtedly think of the first chapter of Genesis, in which God speaks and all things come into being. Clearly John is associating Jesus with God the Father in this creative activity. A Greek would read the title and think of his ancient philosophy. To him the logos or "word" would refer first of all to the controlling principle of this world. To each of these men, Jew and Greek, John declares that the God who created the world and who previously could only be most imperfectly known is fully revealed in Jesus.

Jesus is not only the first and most complete Word of God, he is also the last Word. No one will find God apart from him.

The Light

The second name for the Lord Jesus Christ is "Light. "John says, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men. The light shines in the darkness, but the darkness has not understood it" (vv. 4-5). Later he tells us that John the Baptist came to bear witness to the Light, and he adds, "The true light that gives light to every man was coming into the world" (v. 9).

It is obvious that in one sense "Light" simply reinforces one of the ideas already suggested by referring to Jesus as the "Word." Light is a universal image for the illumination of the understanding through revelation. We express the idea when we say, "Well, the light finally came on," or "he finally saw the light," referring to someone who has just understood something. In this sense, the idea of light reinforces the idea of God's revelation of himself through Jesus.

Yet there is an additional idea in the thought of Jesus' being the Light that makes this title distinct from the former one. It is the contrast of light with darkness. The point is that Jesus is the Light, while men are in darkness because of sin and disobedience. They move out of the darkness only when they come to Jesus.

Many great thinkers have found this. Emile Cailliet, former professor of philosophy at Princeton Theological Seminary, is an example. Dr. Cailliet was highly educated in France in the period before and after the First World War, but his education was naturalistic to the core. He never even saw a Bible until the war was over and he was nearing the end of his studies. These were his years of darkness; his life was described then, as he says, by the title of Eugene O'Neill's play, Long Day's Journey into Night. Now, however, his life is a journey into light, and he describes it as a discovery of his own sin and Christ's righteousness through finding Jesus himself through the Bible.

He has written of this discovery in his book Journey into Light: "A decisive insight flashed through my whole being the following morning as I probed the opening chapters of the Gospel according to John. The very clue to the secret of human life was disclosed right there, not stated in the foreboding language of philosophy, but in the common, everyday language of human circumstances. And, far from moving on their own accord, these circumstances seemed to yield themselves without striving, obedient unto One who inexorably stood out from the gospel narrative—indeed a Person of far more than human nature and stature."

No doubt John was trying to encourage such confessions as he sought to describe the One who leads us all out of darkness into his marvelous light.

The Lamb of God

The most important title is the one that comes next in this chapter, for it is the title that refers to Jesus' work of redemption. It is "the Lamb of God." It occurs in the Baptist's declaration, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (vv. 29, 36). All the wealth of the Old Testament symbolism in the sacrifices of the patriarchs and of the Mosaic law throws weight on this title, for it shows Jesus to be the sin-bearer, the Passover, the innocent substitute dying in our place. This great truth of substitution—the bearing of the sinner's guilt and penalty by another— is carried over from the Old Testament to the New Testament by means of this metaphor and made an integral part of the gospel message.

This is what Jesus Christ came to do. He came to remove our sin by dying in our place as our substitute. Has he done that for you? Are your sins upon him? Has he borne your reproach? Has he suffered for your iniquity? The Bible says that he will be the Lamb of God for you, if you will confess your sin and trust him to remove it forever.

Son of God

In verse 34 John the Baptist concludes his formal testimony by giving Jesus a fourth title: the "Son of God" (cf. v. 49). There are some critics today, although not as many as there were in the last century, who have sought to lessen this title by denying that Jesus was the Son of God in any unique sense. According to such teachers, Jesus was a son only in the sense that all men are supposed to be "sons" by creation. Actually, this is untenable, and any honest evaluation of the biblical evidences must recognize that Jesus is declared to be God's Son in a way that makes him entirely unique and divine.

At his birth the angel declared, "He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High" (Luke 1:32); he "will be called the Son of God" (v. 35). God the Father bore witness to him on several occasions declaring, "You are my Son, whom I love; with you I am well pleased" (Mark 1:11; 9:7). The titles "Son of God" and "Son of the Most High God" were used by demons in recognition of his unique authority and divinity (Matt. 4:3, 6; Mark 3:11; 5:7; Luke 4:41). Peter said, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). It is as God's Son that Christ reigns and exercises authority in the lives of those who have come to him.

Rabbi

Jesus is next called "Rabbi," which means "teacher" (John 1:38). Is he your teacher? The greatest mistake you could ever make is to think that he can be your teacher before he has become your Savior.

That was the mistake made by Nicodemus, whose story is told just two chapters later in this Gospel. Nicodemus came to Jesus, saying, "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him" (John 3:2). In other words, Nicodemus was very impressed with Jesus and wanted to be instructed by him. But this will not work spiritually. A man must first see Jesus as the Lamb of God and the Son of God before he can have him as Rabbi. Consequently, Jesus replied to Nicodemus, "I tell you the truth, no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit" (v. 3). If you want the Lord Jesus Christ as your teacher, he will be your teacher. He will show you great and wondrous things out of his Word, so that your heart will burn within you (Luke 24:32). But first, he must be your Savior.

Messiah, King, Son of Man

The last three titles refer to Christ's future actions and may be taken together. They occur toward the end of the chapter. When Andrew calls Simon to Jesus, Andrew declares, "We have found the Messiah" which, John tells us, means "the Christ" (John 1:41). After Nathanael comes to Jesus and recognizes that Philip's claims regarding him are true, Nathanael exclaims, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (v. 49). Finally, Jesus replies, "I tell you the truth, you shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (v. 51). These three titles—Messiah, King of Israel, and Son of man—refer to two aspects of Jesus' ministry.

The first two titles have to do with his ministry to Judaism. Jesus is Israel's Messiah. He is Israel's king. For this reason I believe that the time will yet come when Jesus will reign over Israel from Jerusalem as the prophets foretold (Isa. 24:23; Zech. 14:9, 16).

The final title is clearly also messianic, but it refers to judgment upon the Gentiles. It is derived from the seventh chapter of Daniel. "In my vision at night I looked, and there before me was one like a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven. He approached the Ancient of Days and was led into his presence. He was given authority, glory and sovereign power; all peoples, nations and men of every language worshiped him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed" (Dan. 7:13-14; cf. Matt. 13:41-43; 24:27, 30; 25:31-46). The scene is one of judgment and of everlasting rule.

Fortunately, the scene of Christ's judgment is still future; and you, if you do not yet know him as the Lamb who takes away your sin, have time to prepare for it. Quite a few years ago, after World War II, an official government study, called the Pearl Harbor Report, demonstrated that no one was prepared for the disaster that struck on the morning of December 7, 1941. The admirals and generals were unprepared; the authorities were unprepared; the nation was unprepared. There was a total lack of preparation, in spite of the ample evidence that existed indicating that a devastating attack would be coming.

Thus will Christ's future judgment as the Son of man appear to the world. We are told it is coming. Men are warned to flee from the wrath of God. Yet the judgment will fall suddenly and unexpectedly upon the many who are sunk in a lethargy of affluence and self-satisfaction. Some will meet the Lord Jesus as their judge. How much better to meet him as the Lamb of God who has taken away sin, as teacher, Savior, and Lord.

Chapter 26.

The First Miracle

John 2:1-11

In the fourteenth chapter of the Book of Romans there is a verse that says: "For the kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (v. 17). In our day many Christians have gotten the part about righteousness right. Many even have peace. But as I look about at contemporary Christianity, it seems to me that many are sadly lacking in joy. They have the doctrine right and are even secure in salvation. But there is none of the supernatural joy and exuberance that is to be one of the outward marks of the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ in a Christian.

This is unfortunate, of course, and it is not right. The Bible tells us that one fruit of the Spirit is 'joy" (Gal. 5:22). Psalm 32:11 declares: "Rejoice in the Lord and be glad, you righteous; sing, all you who are upright in heart!" In Psalm 16 we read: "You have made known to me the path of life; you will fill me with joy in your presence, with eternal pleasures at your right hand" (v. 11). Jesus declared, "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (John 15:11).

According to these verses, the life of the Christian is to be characterized by joy, not by that superficial, raucous joy of which the world is capable, of course, but by that divine and desirable joy that characterized the life of the Lord Jesus Christ. Where do we learn of that joy? I believe that one place is in the verses to which we come now in our study of John's Gospel.

Jesus Was Welcome

These verses tell us a story. "On the third day a wedding took place at Cana in Galilee. Jesus' mother was there, and Jesus and his disciples had also been invited to the wedding" (John 2:1-2). According to the chronology that John gives us for these opening chapters, this was the last of the seven original and eventful days of Christ's ministry. The first was the day on which John the Baptist confronted the Jewish delegation from Jerusalem. The second was the day on which John identified Jesus for the first time as "the Lamb of God." On the third day Andrew and an unnamed disciple (probably John the evangelist) followed Jesus. The fourth day contained the events connected with Andrew's call of his brother Peter. On the fifth day Jesus called Nathanael. The sixth day was spent in traveling. On the seventh day Jesus arrived in Cana and was invited with his disciples to the wedding.

This is also the day on which the public ministry of Jesus began officially. Consequently, the opening verses of chapter 2 are really an introduction to the second main section of the Gospel (chaps. 2-11), which some scholars have called "the book of Christ's signs."

It is an interesting sidelight on these verses that under Jewish law the normal day for a wedding was Wednesday, the day of the week prescribed for the wedding of a virgin. If that is the case here, then we are able to work backward to find that it was the Sabbath when Andrew and the other disciple followed Jesus and spent the day with him. Thus, we have an explanation for their inactivity.

But we must return to this story. Why was Jesus invited to this wedding? We do not know for certain. It is possible that he had been invited to it in advance and had been on his way to it when he called Philip and Nathanael. It may be that the invitation came through Nathanael, for we are told later that Cana of Galilee was Nathanael's hometown (John 21:2). It may be that Jesus was invited because of his mother Mary, who seems to have had a prominent place at the feast. Whatever the case, the point seems to be that Jesus was welcome. And, as I read the story, I seem to sense that the invitation came to him at once as soon as the men and women of Cana learned that he had returned to Galilee from the area of the lower Jordan, where John was baptizing.

I think this point is important, for this is the first of many stories suggesting that Jesus was always welcome among those who were having a good time. Have you ever thought how wonderful it is that Jesus was at home in such company? I am afraid that if some Christians I know were the pattern, there would be very little to expect of true joy and happiness or good times in the Christian life. Some Christians go around with grim looks and long faces. If they ever find themselves in the company of someone else who is having a good time, they immediately suspect that the cause of the fun is either illegal, immoral, or fattening. Jesus was not like that. He did not condemn those who were enjoying themselves, and he was not jealous of them. As a result, he was welcome at their gatherings, and those who had invited him listened to his teachings.

Are you like that? If you are, you may find that people are not only pleased with your company; they may also be willing to listen to your testimony.

Let me tell you a true incident that illustrates this aspect of John's story. A friend of mine, who is now a professor at the University of Pennsylvania, was asked to speak at a banquet that would be attended by the young adult group of a certain church. He had never heard of the church before, or the young adult group, but he went to the banquet and spoke about the call of Christ to the unsaved and about discipleship. After the dinner and his address my friend was ready to go home, but he discovered that this was only the prelude to the evening. The dinner was followed by a wild party at which, as he told me, the noise was so loud that it was almost impossible to talk to anyone. He concluded—and he was right, as it later turned out—that the group was composed mostly of those who were Christian in name only. But what should he do? Should he go home, declaring that Christians do not go to wild parties and that this was a most unfortunate sequel to his talk? Or should he stay, enjoying the good time of the others as much as possible?

My friend decided to stay with the group. During the first few minutes he was there, a girl came up to talk to him. She had been impressed by what he had said at the dinner, but she did not understand it. She asked him to explain again what it means to be a Christian. My friend said that at this point the noise was so loud the two of them had to shout to each other even though their mouths were only inches from each other's ears. But the shouting was worthwhile, for the girl believed and became a Christian. The sequel to the story is that the girl was apparently the key to the whole group. She became a dynamic witness to her friends. Through her witness most of the group believed. She later died of a brain hemorrhage, suddenly, at the age of 25; but at that time others believed. One young man, who believed, then went on to influence hundreds.

I believe, of course, that there may be environments from which most Christians should stand free. Yet we often apply that thought adversely and forget to be cheerful. Charles Spurgeon once wrote to his students: "Sepulchral tones may fit a man to be an undertaker, but Lazarus is not called out of his grave by hollow moans. ...I commend cheerfulness to all who would win souls."

They Have No Wine

I do not want anyone to misunderstand me at this point, thinking that I am commending the good times of this world as something superior to the joy of true Christianity. I am not. On the contrary, I believe that, although the Christian should not hold aloof from any genuinely good experiences, it should be the superior joy of the Christian that most commends the Lord Jesus Christ to unbelievers.

But this, too, is involved in the story. As the story goes on it is seen that the wine required for the feast is exhausted. This may not mean much to us in a day when practically any lack may be made up by a quick trip to the corner market. But it was a serious thing in those days when a lack could not be easily remedied and when the shortage (if discovered) would certainly prove a great embarrassment to the host. What is more, as we read the various things that the Bible has to say about wine, we soon discover that wine was a symbol of joy. The rabbis said, "Without wine there is no joy." So, to run out of wine would almost have been the equivalent of admitting that neither the guests nor the bride and groom were happy.

We see the symbolism of the wine in Psalm 104:15, which praises the Lord for giving "wine that gladdens the heart of man." In Judges we are told that Jotham recited a parable about the trees of the forest to the men of Shechem in which the vine declined to rule in the forest because, it said, "Should I give up my wine, which cheers both gods and men, to hold sway over the trees?" (Judg. 9:13). In Isaiah we are invited to "Come, buy wine and milk without money and without cost" (Isa. 55:1).

Certainly, John, who always sees the spiritual meaning in the most ordinary events, is suggesting that apart from Jesus the joy of which men are capable is limited and that good times that are nothing more than good times will run out. One young man who had tasted most of what the world has to offer once said to a Christian worker, "My God, is this all there is to life?" It was the worker's privilege to lead him to the source of all life and joy, Jesus.

At this point Mary came to Jesus with the veiled request that he do something. She said, "They have no wine. "Jesus, who understood the tone of her statement, replied, "Dear woman, why do you involve me? My time has not yet come" (John 2:4). These words sound harsh to our ears, but they did not have a harsh sound in the original language. "Woman" was a title of respect, much like our word "lady." We remember that Jesus used it again when he was addressing his mother from the cross as he committed her into John's safekeeping. The point of Jesus' reply was that he was not ready to do anything openly because the "hour" of his crucifixion was still years away.

I sense in the story the fact that Mary, who certainly knew her son well, must have detected a change in Jesus' life since his departure from Nazareth; and she could not have failed to notice that he had returned with at least five disciples. Perhaps she was thinking, "Now is the time. Now he should declare himself openly." After all, Mary was only a Jewish mother, and she must have had a mother's ambition for her exceptional son, the rabbi.

Jesus, of course, knew that his times were in the hands of his Father in heaven. He would not be manipulated. And yet—this is a wonderful part of the story—he had no desire to allow the lack of joy or embarrassment either. So he moved quietly. There were six great water jars of stone standing by, containing water used for Jewish purifications. He commanded the servants to fill them with water, which they did—to the brim! When they had done so, he then told them to draw from the pots and carry the water (now made wine) to the master of the banquet, whom we would call the best man or the master of ceremonies. They did so; when the master of the banquet had tasted the wine he said to the bridegroom, "Everyone brings out the choice wine first and then the cheaper wine after the guests have had too much to drink; but you have saved the best till now" (v. 10).

That too is significant. It was good wine! It was the best! No wonder the Bible tells us that "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). Jesus himself said, "If you, then, though you are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give good gifts to those who ask him!" (Matt. 7:11.)

Moreover, have you ever reflected on the quantity of wine Jesus produced? John tells us, probably as an eyewitness, that there were six stone water jars, each containing two or three firkins apiece. That makes twelve to eighteen firkins. Each firkin was the equivalent of nine or ten gallons. Consequently, Jesus must have produced between a hundred eight and a hundred eighty gallons of the very best wine. In his excellent commentary The Gospel of John, William Barclay, that impeccable Englishman, is so startled by the amount of wine that he thinks it should not be taken with "crude literalness." He says, "No wedding party on earth could drink one hundred and eighty gallons of wine." But I think the amount is literal and, what is more, that Jesus intentionally produced the wine in abundance.

Do not think, if you come to Jesus, accepting him as your Savior, that the day will come when you will find yourself empty of joy, or disappointed. If that ever happens, it will be because you have drawn away from him, not because he has failed you. Certainly the Christ who produced the abundance of wine, who oversupplied with the loaves and fishes, who said, "He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" (John 6:35)— certainly such a Christ is able to supply all your need "according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

Christ or Religion

There is one last point that must also be seen in this story. When John concludes his telling of it, he adds, "This, the first of his miraculous signs, Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. He thus revealed his glory, and his disciples put their faith in him" (v. 11). Actually, the word that is translated as "miracles" in this verse is the word "signs," and in John a sign is always something that points to a reality greater than itself. Or, to use another word, we could say that the miracles are also, in addition to being literal events, symbolic.

We ask then: Is there something symbolized here that we have not yet covered? I believe there is. We remember, first of all, that throughout the Gospel, John is very sensitive to the fact that Jesus brought to completion and therefore in a sense displaced the religion of the Jews. We notice too that he calls attention to the use of the water jars in the Jewish household; they were for the Jewish purifications. We remember that he has spoken of the blindness of the Jewish people, particularly the leaders, just one chapter before this. In this context, and given John's interests, the empty water jars and the lack of wine speak of the emptiness of religion at Christ's coming. Arthur W. Pink, one of the most complete expositors of this Gospel, has written accurately on this point in his Gospel of John: "Judaism still existed as a religious system [there were purifications], but it ministered no comfort to the heart. It had degenerated into a cold, mechanical routine, utterly destitute of joy in God. Israel had lost the joy of their espousals."

What Pink has written of one religion is true, however, of all religion, if Jesus Christ does not stand at its core. Apart from him who is the source of life, who is himself the life, religion is a cold and lifeless thing. Apart from the joy he brings, religion is joyless and hardens personalities. Do you have religion? It will profit you nothing! Or do you have Christ? He alone can quench the hunger and thirst of your heart. He alone can put a song in your mouth that not even the angels can sing. He alone can give you true and everlasting joy.

Chapter 27.
Was Jesus Christ a Revolutionary?

John 2:12-17

A person does not need to be an expert in current events to know that we live in an age of impending revolution. The call to revolution has been raised by communism. Radical groups forecast revolution for America. In the student world—whether it be in Los Angeles, New York, Moscow, Paris, Tokyo, Havana, or Djakarta, wherever students gather—there are millions who debate the nature of the revolutionary days in which we live and there are thousands who urge revolution. "We are going to change the world" is the claim of many persons—and, indeed, they may just do it!

But the secular world does not have a monopoly on sounding the call to revolution. It has also echoed from the sanctuaries of the churches. In many of the major denominations, radical clerics have sought to align the prestige of their denominations behind particular sociological and political objectives, some of which, according to their advocates, are to be obtained by destroying the present systems of social order and government. This segment of Christendom often points to actions and teachings of Jesus that are thought to support their objectives.

Was Jesus Christ a revolutionary? That question is of crucial importance for Christians who wish guidance for their actions in our time. Was he a revolutionary? The answer to that question, as I hope to show, is "No, he was not." He was not a revolutionary in the way most people understand that word. On the other hand, he was not a defender of the establishment either, and it is correct to say that he actually called men and women to a revolution (although a peaceful one) that was far more radical and long-term than anything that people then would in themselves have dreamed possible.

Pros and Cons

One of the most valuable of the recent books on this subject is a highly condensed monograph by Oscar Cullmann, recently of the universities of Basel and Paris, entitled Jesus and the Revolutionaries. In it he points out the complexity of the issues.

On the one hand, notes Cullmann, there are certainly elements in Christ's sayings that allow some radicals to see him as their ally. In Christ's day in Israel there were men known as Zealots (from the Greek word zevos, meaning "zeal"). The Zealots were fanatical in their concern for Jewish law and in their expectation of the imminent dawning of the kingdom of God. Many carried swords or daggers that were frequently used in political killings. Hence they were also called Sicarii, which is a Latin term meaning "cutthroats" or "assassins." In time the Zealots produced a politico-religious revolt that led to the Jewish war against the Romans beginning in a.d. 66. As a result of this war Jerusalem was destroyed by the Roman general Titus in a.d. 70. After the fall of Jerusalem one Zealot group continued the resistance until a.d. 74 in the mountain stronghold of Masada, which is a shrine today.

Against this background there are certain elements that have led some scholars to see Christ in this coloring. Jesus, as well as the Zealots, proclaimed that the kingdom of God was at hand. Jesus was critical of Herod, whom he called "that fox" (Luke 13:32). He was executed officially for his alleged Zealot activities (Matt. 27:37). He had among his disciples at least one, Simon the Zealot, who had been a member of a Zealot group before he became Christ's follower. Some of the disciples carried swords (Luke 22:38; John 18:10). And, most striking of all, in the passage that is the basis of our study, we are told that he cleansed the temple in Jerusalem in the midst of the very volatile days of the Passover. Many in his day, as well as in ours, would have considered this the act of an agitator.

On the other hand, as Cullmann also points out, there are elements that reveal Jesus to be the opponent of every act of political resistance and all acts of violence. To begin with, there are the sayings on behalf of nonviolence (Matt. 5:39; 26:52). There are the exhortations to love our enemies (Matt. 5:44). Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they [not the Zealots] will be called sons of God" (Matt. 5:9). On several occasions Jesus repudiated any political elements in his divine mission, principally when he was tempted by the devil (Matt. 4:8-10) and when he was tried before Pilate (John 18:36). Moreover, if some still cite the presence of a Zealot among his disciples, it must be pointed out that this is an argument that cuts both ways. For Jesus also had Matthew, a tax collector, and it is hard to find a greater representative of the establishment than that.

When we put all these texts (not just some) into the picture, we find a Jesus who goes beyond either of these two categories. And we are led to ask: What are his distinctive teachings? And, if it is true in one sense that he does call us to a revolutionary commitment, to what kind of a revolution does he call us?

No Utopias

The first point we need to see then is that whatever the cleansing of the temple may or may not have been about, it was definitely not an attempt to set up an earthly kingdom viewed as a Utopia. That was the goal of the revolutionaries, but it was not Christ's goal. In fact, if it was, it was most unsuccessful. A revolt did not come from it; and, what is more, the effects were even of short duration, for the other Gospels tell us that Jesus found it necessary to repeat the same cleansing again three years later near the end of his ministry (Matt. 21:12, 13; Mark 11:15-17; Luke 19:45, 46). Actually, if we are to take his saying about the destruction of the temple with all seriousness (Mark 13:2), it would be most accurate to say that Jesus did not attribute eternal worth to any existing institutions, even the temple and the temple worship. For in his view all belonged to the old order that would one day come under judgment and pass away.

This truth has several important conclusions that flow from it, and we should not miss them. First, it is obviously wrong for us to deify anything human. This applies to democratic institutions as well as to those of socialism or communism. Consequently, we must not make the mistake some Americans make of identifying the American way of life or the American form of government with Christianity. The American way of life may have its good aspects (as well as its bad), some of them derived from Christianity, but America is not in itself God's kingdom.

Second, the followers of Christ are also not to take it into their hands to pronounce judgment upon their rulers. Judgment will be executed, but God alone is capable of such justice.
Consequently, in speaking of the turmoil that would take place at the end times, Jesus warned his disciples to flee from Jerusalem rather than to join in insurrections (Matt. 24:15-26). For us this means that Christians are not to take part in movements that are attempting to destroy the system.

The third conclusion is that, in the time prior to the final judgment, the state even in the hands of corrupt rulers will have a proper role. Jesus illustrated this most clearly in the story of the tribute money. One of the political parties of the day, the Herodians, had come to Jesus with a question meant to trap him into a fatal admission. They asked, "Is it right to pay taxes to Caesar or not?" (Matt. 22:17). In other words, should a loyal Jew pay taxes? If Jesus said yes, he would be despised by a large section of the people, particularly the Zealots, for whom this was a point of patriotic zeal and religious honor. He would cease to be a leader. On the other hand, if he said no, then he could be denounced to the Roman authorities as an insurrectionist. What did he do? Jesus took a coin, and after pointing out that Caesar's image was on one side, he replied, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's" (v. 21).

There were some, no doubt, who took this reply as a compromise. There were some who accused him because of it, for it was brought up against him at his trial before Pilate: "We have found this man subverting our nation. He opposes payment of taxes to Caesar and claims to be Christ, a king" (Luke 23:2). Nevertheless, this was not Christ's teaching, Jesus acknowledged the absolute authority of God. He taught that all human institutions would one day be brought under judgment and pass away. Nevertheless, there was still a proper role for the state and a proper duty toward it. One of these duties was to pay taxes.

We may apply this point by saying that withholding taxes on the grounds that much of the tax money goes for the military is not a justifiably Christian form of social protest.

No Complacency

But we need to stop here to be sure that no one is taking this as an endorsement of the present world order or, which is also wrong, an endorsement of all the acts of our government. It is true that Jesus had no room for Utopias—except, of course, for the one that he himself was going to bring. But neither did he have room for complacency. On the contrary, he constantly called men to the most radical involvement with himself and in spiritual terms to the most revolutionary outlook possible.

In the spring in which Jesus Christ was crucified, the Roman authorities in Jerusalem had arrested a Zealot for his revolutionary activities. His name was Barabbas. The Bible tells us that the charge was for insurrection and murder, which means that Barabbas had been among the bands who were seeking to drive the Romans from Palestine by means of guerrilla tactics and political assassinations. He would have argued that life under Rome was oppressive. He was fighting the racism, the injustices, the militarism of the oppressors. Perhaps he was even a heroic, noble figure as men measure heroes. But he was arrested, and they locked him up.

Then there was Jesus, another man also charged with being a revolutionary. The Bible never suggests that they met. But if they had met, I imagine that Jesus would have agreed with much of what Barabbas was saying. He would have said, "Barabbas, your diagnosis of the system is right. The Romans boast of their justice; they are all for law and order. Herod was elected on that platform. But the administration of the law is corrupt, and they will prove it in a few hours by executing me. Moreover, you are also right about the Pharisees. They too are far more interested in preserving their own necks than they are about justice. Caiaphas himself said, 'You know nothing at all. ...It is better for you that one man die for the people than that the whole nation perish.' You are right. There is oppression. There is racism.

"Nevertheless, you are making one big mistake. Your diagnosis is correct, but your treatment is faulty. You are being revolutionary in your attitude to the Roman and Jewish authorities. But you are not being at all revolutionary with yourself. In fact, you are being complacent. What makes you think that the system you will set up will be any less corrupt than the system you are involved in overthrowing? What makes you think that you are any more moral than the Romans or that you would act with any less self-interest than Caiaphas? I am here to tell you that you are all corrupt. The Jew is as corrupt as the Roman. The poor man is as corrupt as the rich man. The black man is as corrupt as the white man. The slave is as corrupt as his master. Consequently, you can only change things by changing people.

"Barabbas, I have come to change people. And when I change people, these people are going to revolutionize society. They will not overthrow society, but wherever they can they will attempt to set the systems of this world right."

This, of course, is where the cleansing of the temple comes in. John tells us, "When it was almost time for the Jewish Passover, Jesus went up to Jerusalem. In the temple courts he found men selling cattle, sheep and doves, and others sitting at tables exchanging money. So he made a whip out of cords, and drove all from the temple area, both sheep and cattle; he scattered the coins of the money changers and overturned their tables. To those who sold doves he said, 'Get these out of here! How dare you turn my Father's house into a market!' His disciples remembered that it is written: 'Zeal for your house will consume me'" (John 2:13-17). Jesus did not seek to eliminate temple worship. He sought to reform it. In other words, within the sphere of his influence he worked to transform what was into what it always should have been.

Such people are dangerous. They will either be loved or hated. In Christ's day most of the world turned from this all-demanding, revolutionary type of commitment. Pilate addressed them and asked, "Whom should I release to you? Jesus or Barabbas?" They answered, "Barabbas." Why should they have asked for Barabbas—Barabbas, the man who was going to burn their houses down and destroy the system? Tom Skinner, who tells this story in his book Words of Revolution, says: "It's very simple. If you let Barabbas go, and he starts another disturbance or another riot, you can always call out the National Guard, the Federal troops or the Marines to put his thing down. All you have to do is push a few tanks into his neighborhood and you can squash whatever he's up to. You can find out where he's keeping his guns and raid his apartment. You can always stop Barabbas. But the question is: how do you stop Jesus? How do you stop a Man who has no guns, no tanks, no ammunition, but still is shaking the whole Roman empire? How do you stop a Man, who—without firing a shot—is getting revolutionary results? They figured there's only one answer—get rid of Him....

"Barabbas would never really ask to run your life. Barabbas would exploit you, but he wouldn't ask to run your life. Jesus would ask to run your life. Jesus would ask for the right to rule over you! And that's the problem. Men would rather be enslaved to tyranny than let Jesus rule their lives. They would rather be exploited than let Christ determine their lives. So they said, 'Give us Barabbas.'"

The Call

It is the same today. Is Jesus Christ a revolutionary? No, he is not. He was executed wrongly on that count. And yet, like all revolutionary leaders, he demands the utmost of involvement, love, and self-sacrifice from his followers. Jesus did not offer a life of ease. Like Churchill, he offered men blood, tears, toil, and sweat. He told his disciples, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me" (Matt. 16:24). He demanded their all! There were few to follow him.

Will you dare to follow him? It is worth reflecting on who it was who first responded to his teaching. There were establishment figures as well as Zealots—that did not seem to matter—but there were few of the soft, well-heeled figures of southern Palestine. There were not many priests, not many rulers. The ones who followed him were the vigorous, rough-speaking fishermen types from Galilee. For they had the courage, and they were not afraid to be despised for being different. Have you that courage? Jesus will not ask you either to defend the status quo or to overthrow it. But he will give a new perspective. He will make you a new man or woman, capable of radical obedience within the bounds of true Christianity.

Chapter 28.
He Gave Them a Sign

John 2:18-22

Someone once asked a well-known Bible teacher what he considered to be his greatest spiritual need. The teacher replied that he was conscious of very many lacks in his life, but he believed that his greatest lack was knowing more of the Word of God so that he might know God better. When the person responded that he found this surprising, since the Bible teacher quite obviously spent most of his time studying the Bible, he was told in reply, "I know enough of the Bible to know how much more there is to know. And I know that all knowledge of God depends upon such knowledge. Sometimes I feel like a man who has been running for a long distance—chest heaving, lungs pulling for more oxygen."

This reply was perceptive, of course, for it was an acknowledgment of one of the great underlying principles of Christianity. It is the principle that no one ever understands spiritual truths apart from the Bible and that, as a result, no one can come to know God by any other means.

Some persons think they can know God by means of their own human reason. But reason is a blind alley spiritually. It has always been the great minds exercising their powers apart from the Word of God who have produced the great heresies. Some think they can discover God by listening to a so-called "inner voice," but the voice is often nothing more than an expression of their own inner desires, as psychologists repeatedly point out. Quite a few think that spiritual truths can be verified by supernatural events or miracles. But the Bible everywhere teaches that even miracles will not lead men and women to understand and receive God's truth unless they themselves are illuminated by the Bible. Thus, Jesus said, "If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead" (Luke 16:31). I believe that we can state categorically that there is no knowledge of God apart from Jesus Christ and that there is no knowledge of Jesus Christ apart from a knowledge of the Bible.

Natural Wisdom

This truth is illustrated for us in the story to which we now come in our verse-by-verse study. Jesus had just performed a great sign by driving out of the temple in Jerusalem all those who were selling and bartering in the outer court of the Gentiles. This was a fulfillment of Psalm 69:9: "For zeal for your house consumes me." Nevertheless, in spite of the text and its fulfillment, those who were threatened by Christ's action were not thinking scripturally and consequently did not see the hand of God in Christ's action. They had already had one very dramatic sign. There was also a variety of unspecified miracles to be considered (John 2:23). But they rejected these things and instead demanded something more. The Bible says the Jews demanded: "What miraculous sign can you show us to prove your authority to do all this?" (v. 18).

What further sign could Christ give? There was only one, even though (because of their willingness to evaluate his ministry in the light of the Scriptures) they would eventually reject it also. Jesus therefore referred to his death and the resurrection that was to follow it, saying, "Destroy this temple and I will raise it again in three days" (v. 19). At this time no one understood Christ's saying. The rulers never understood it, and the disciples only began to understand it after the event and in the light of biblical revelation.

The reaction of the leaders of the Jews on this occasion is a great example of the attempts of men to understand spiritual things when they have not had their minds illuminated by Scripture. And the point is that such an attempt will always result in our seeing things only on the physical level.

Let me illustrate by this comparison. Several months ago on a trip that I was taking to the West Coast with my family I passed through one of the gambling towns in Nevada. If you have ever been to one of these towns yourself, you know that the most common sights in the gambling cities (with the exception of the neon lights) are the slot machines. They seem to be everywhere. The person playing the machine puts in his money, a quarter or a dollar coin—whatever it might be—and then pulls down a lever that is attached to the side. When he does this the wheels begin to spin with a whirring sound, and then they begin to stop one after the other and show various pictures. There is a standard and easily recognizable sound, first the whirring and then three clunks as the wheels stop turning. If certain combinations of pictures come up, the person playing the machine gets some money back. Most of the time nothing happens. Then, if the person is a gambler and a fool, he puts in more money. After the same sounds—whirr, clunk, clunk, clunk—nothing happens again.

This is exactly what took place when Jesus spoke words of spiritual truth. Take the third chapter of John. Nicodemus was a ruler of the Jews, and he came to Jesus by night. He said, "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God." Jesus answered, "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again." That was a coin of spiritual truth being dropped into Nicodemus's slot. We take a breath, and we can almost hear the wheels begin to whirr as Nicodemus digests Christ's teaching. He answers, "How can a man be born when he is old? Surely he cannot enter a second time into his mother's womb to be born!" In other words, Jesus was speaking about the new life that a person receives by faith; and Nicodemus was saying to himself, "Human birth? Human birth? That means a father and a mother, conception, wombs, nine months of growth, babies, mother's milk." He came up with a blank.

We find the same thing repeated just one chapter later. In John 4 there is the account of Christ's meeting with the woman of Samaria. The two of them met at a well, so Jesus referred to wells and water in order to explain that he was offering to satisfy her spiritual thirst. The woman was unable to think on these terms. So the wheels went round, and she began to think, "Water? Water? Wells? The well is deep, water is heavy, it's a long way up the hill, this is a hot country, buckets, water jars—wouldn't it be nice if I didn't have to do this every day?" So she said out loud, "Sir, give me this water so that I won't get thirsty and have to keep coming here to draw water." As in the case of Nicodemus, there was a great whirring, but nothing clicked.

We must not think that this is the case only with the unchurched either, for at the end of the story in the same chapter we find that the same thing happened in a conversation between Christ and his disciples. During the time that Jesus had been talking to the woman, the disciples had been in the city buying food to eat. When they had returned and had urged him to take some of it, saying, "Rabbi, eat, "Jesus referred to his previous conversation with its blessing in the life of the woman, answering, "I have food to eat that you know nothing about." What did the disciples do? They pulled down the lever and then asked one another, "Who brought him lunch?"

That is what happens when men and women confront spiritual truths with their own human ability. And it is exactly what happened in our story. Jesus referred to his resurrection, saying, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," and they did not have the wisdom to ask, "What are you referring to?" Instead, they assumed his remark to be an idiotic reference to the temple of Herod, and they therefore asked, "It has taken forty-six years to build this temple, and you are going to raise it in three days?" (v. 20).

Roots of Unbelief

The first point I have made, then, is that no one understood what Jesus was saying when he first said it, because no one tried to understand it on the basis of biblical revelation. The second point is that the Jewish rulers (in spite of further miracles and signs) never did understand it. Why was this so? The answer to this question takes us a bit deeper into their attitude and into the reasons for disbelief generally.

We have already seen that the rulers had not been listening to the Bible, and because they had not been listening to the Bible they were not ready to listen to Jesus Christ either. In the Bible God speaks to men. But because they did not hear him there, neither did they hear him when he spoke to them face-to-face. The rulers were not really asking Jesus Christ for a sign. I know they asked, "What sign do you show us that you do these things?" But what they were really expressing was their anger at Christ's actions. They wanted to know what possible justification Jesus could give for having driven the money changers out of their temple, particularly when they had said that the money changers had a right to be there.

Men and women are like that with God today, even in our own world and in our churches. God speaks, but many do not really listen. One reason why they do not listen is that they are so wrapped up in their own outlook and their own way of doing things that they are privately angry with God for not conforming to their plans. Is that your attitude? If it is, then you must learn to forget your anger and instead learn to see things from God's point of view. God's point of view— the only valid one—is revealed to us in Scripture.

Another reason why the rulers did not believe in Christ and did not approach things scripturally was that they did not want to hear what Jesus had to say. Why did Jesus refer to the temple being destroyed? Well, on one level he did so to provide a fresh illustration of his death and resurrection. But that is only one level. Isn't it also true that this illustration was meant to suggest the passing of the temple and the worship that was conducted there and to suggest that it would be replaced with a spiritual worship after his death and resurrection? Whatever the case, this is certainly what happened. The temple had been begun by Herod in about 20 B.C. It was now about a.d. 26, which meant that the temple had been in construction for forty-six years. It would be another thirty-seven years before the entire construction was finished—that is, about the year a.d. 63—and then seven years later the whole magnificent edifice would be destroyed by the Romans. The history of the temple is a great lesson in the futility of identifying buildings with true worship, and Christ's reference to it was a warning of the passing of traditional Judaism.

If there was anything these rulers did not want to hear, it was that. And since they were not ready to hear what Christ first had to say to them, they were not ready to listen to anything. Perhaps this is true of you also. When we listen to God he always begins by pointing out our need of himself. He shows us our sin and allows us to see a bit of our own rebellious heart. Perhaps you sense that he is doing that, or will do it; so you refuse to listen. You will not read the Bible or study it. If that is the case in your life, then you must learn that all good cures begin with an accurate diagnosis. And you must allow God to lead you from a recognition of your need to that which will satisfy it completely.

Do not think that this is something that only certain persons must experience. It is true for all, even theologians. One theologian, Professor John Baillie of the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, has written of his own experience with God: "What I now realize very clearly, and am ready to confess, is that much of the trouble in the days when I could not hear God's voice was that I was not really listening. I was partly listening perhaps—giving, as it were, one ear to His commandments; but no promise is made in the Bible to those who partly listen, but only to those who hearken diligently. And why did I not thus hearken? It was that there were certain things I did not want to hear. We sometimes speak of people being 'conveniently deaf' to human communications, but there is such a thing also as being conveniently deaf towards God. ...There are certain things we just do not want to be told. They would be too inconvenient, too upsetting, too exacting. The readjustment they would involve would be too painful."

Finally, people will not believe in Christ because their minds are filled with the wrong ideas that we have all received from this world. Nearly all the ideas of this world are antithetical to those revealed in the Bible. So if we have our minds filled with the ideas of the world, as the Jewish rulers in this story did, we will not hear Jesus, and spiritual truths will seem foolish or incomprehensible to us. Instead of this we must allow God to transform us to "demolish arguments and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5).

The Disciples

Let me suggest a final contrast before we end this study. Most of the story revolves around the rulers who did not want to hear and who did not approach the things of God scripturally. But they are not the only ones in the story. There are also the disciples. They were just a small group, mostly fishermen, men who were unlearned by the standards of that day. They had no reputation in the eyes of the world. They had no fame in Jerusalem. But they knew the Scriptures a little bit, and they had begun to interpret the things that were happening to them in the light of it.

Did you ever notice that this passage begins and ends with a reference to the Scriptures? The verses are 17 and 22, and they tell us that one of the acts of Christ they understood then as a result of knowing the Scripture and that another of Christ's acts they understood later as a result of knowing the Scripture. It was all through the Scripture. We are told that after Jesus had cleansed the temple, his disciples thought about the Scriptures and "remembered that it was written, 'Zeal for your house has consumed me'" (v. 17). In other words, they were remembering Psalm 69:9 and were saying to themselves. "Yes, Jesus really is the Messiah, and he is fulfilling this Scripture." Later Jesus talked about destroying the temple and raising it up in three days. None of them understood it then; but we are told that as they learned to live in the Scriptures, as Jesus did, the time came when they looked back on the resurrection and understood it in terms of the Old Testament prophecies.

How does it stand with you? Do you approach things scripturally as God wants you to? Or are you still trying to puzzle out God's truth with your own weak faculties of reasoning? The Bible tells us that we will only advance spiritually and that we will only hear God's voice as we approach him through the pages of his book.

Chapter 29.
Christ and the Heart of Man

John 2:23-25

There is an old law of physics called Newton's Law that says that every action produces a reaction. It is always true in the physical realm and perhaps most always true in all of life. A person does something, and others react. A person says something, and something else happens.

This was true in the time of the Lord Jesus Christ. For instance, in the second chapter of John's Gospel there are three sets of actions by Jesus, each of which produced a distinct reaction. At the beginning of the chapter Jesus had turned water into wine at the marriage feast at Cana. Not many knew of this miracle, but we are told that the disciples who did know of it believed on him. This was the first reaction. A few days later Jesus drove the money changers from the temple in Jerusalem. This was a sign too. Nevertheless, the rulers of the people reacted to him in anger, demanding, "What miraculous sign can you show us to prove your authority to do all this?" Finally, we are told that when he was at the feast he did further miracles with the result that many more "believed in his name."

Here were three levels of response to Jesus and his actions, ranging from the total disbelief of the leaders to the partially informed faith of the first disciples. We would say, "Well, some of the reactions were bad; some were better; some were quite good. Let's emulate the apostles." It is therefore somewhat of a shock to come to the end of the chapter and find, in spite of the obvious differences between these various groups of people that seem so significant to us, that the Lord Jesus Christ did not trust anyone. The text tells us, "But Jesus would not entrust himself to them, for he knew all men. He did not need man's testimony about man, for he knew what was in a man" (vv. 24-25). The Greek tells us quite literally that although many trusted in him, he did not trust in them; and the reason why he did not trust in them was that he knew what was in them.

The Heart of Man

What does God see when he looks into the heart of man? If we are to answer this question accurately, we must recognize first that only God can see into our hearts. Consequently, the picture he paints will naturally be different from what we might expect to find there.

We should not be surprised at our own inability to see into man's true nature, for this is demonstrated for us almost every day. Not so long ago I read about a man who had suddenly fled from this country with a large amount of money that was not his. It was from company funds. Up to that point he had been a trusted member of the firm. He had gained a certain amount of recognition for his work. He was well thought of by most of his coworkers and friends. He had a respected family. Yet he was a thief, and none of his family, friends, coworkers, or acquaintances had really known him.

The story could be repeated many times over, probably at least once or twice from your own experience. People cannot see into the minds of other people. Only God can do that. He "searches our hearts" (Rom. 8:27) and "knows the heart" (Acts 15:8). Consequently, we must not be surprised if his view of the hearts and minds of men differs from our own.

One of our great American short stories tells in a humorous way about a student taking a biology course in his first year at a university. The course was all right, but the student had a serious problem with the laboratory part of it. As part of his laboratory work he was supposed to draw the bacteria he saw through a microscope. Unfortunately, he was never able to see anything through his microscope. All he could ever see, the story tells us, was a white blur that looked like milk. In the same way, when we look into the human heart, apart from the magnification of the heart provided by the Word of God, all we see is the milk of human kindness, with perhaps a few small smudges of what the Bible calls sin. God has the heart of man in focus, with the result that he is never fooled by human goodness.

What, then, does God see when he looks into the heart of man? The answer is shocking to those who are not steeped in Scripture. The Bible tells us that according to God the heart is filled with madness, mischief, and evil. It is impenitent, darkened, gross, hard, proud, blind, filled with lust. It is far from God. God says, "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure. Who can understand it?" (Jer. 17:9). It is a grim picture, but it is only as we begin to see the heart as God sees it that we can begin to appreciate the greatness of God's love.

The Heart in History

At this point, however, we need to stop to look at the matter historically. Let me ask this question: What is the first great event in the Bible put there to reveal the heart of man to us? The answer is: the fall of Adam and Eve. What does it show? The answer is: It shows man in his state of rebellion against God, a rebellion in which he refuses to go God's way even if his own way kills him.

It is popular in our day to blame the fall of the race on the woman, just as Adam did when God came to him in the Garden. Adam said, "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it" (Gen. 3:12). We blame the woman, but this is not the way in which the Bible talks about it. The Bible tells us that Eve was deceived by the devil and so fell through error. But it also declares that when Adam sinned he did so, not through deceit or weakness but in willful rebellion against God. First Timothy 2:14 teaches this beyond any doubt, for it says "Adam was not the one deceived; it was the woman who was deceived and became a sinner."

Let me explain that a bit further. Suppose for a moment that Adam had sinned first and then the woman. And suppose that God had come to the couple in the Garden, saying, "What have you done?" If that had been the case, the women could have answered, "I have just been doing what you told me to do. You gave me the man to be the head of our home. So when he ate of the tree, I obeyed him and did it also." That is what the woman could have said if Adam had sinned first, and the fall of the race would have been incomplete. However, Adam did not sin first. The woman sinned first, and so, "the woman ... became a sinner."

But now, if the woman was deceived, this was obviously not so with the man. Adam knew what he was doing. Consequently, his guilt was greater. God had placed Adam in the Garden as lord under himself of all creation. There were trees in the Garden; and God had said to Adam, "I want you to feel free to eat of all the trees north of here, south of here, east of here, and west of here. But as a symbol of your dependence upon me I am marking this one tree—the tree of the knowledge of good and evil—as a tree from which you shall not eat. Moreover, so you will know that I mean business, I am warning you that in the day in which you eat of it you will surely die." Adam looked at the tree and then said, in effect, "I do not care if you have given me all the trees north of here, south of here, east of here, and west of here. So long as that tree remains in the Garden as a symbol of my dependence upon you I will hate it." So he ate of the tree and died—first, spiritually and then, later, in soul and body also.

The fall of man is what would be called in theology a de novo act, an act that was entirely new, that had no connection with anything that had gone before it. It was essentially a rebellion. Man had said, "I am the captain of my soul; I am the master of my fate; I hate anything that opposes me, even God." So man sinned, and his rebellion passed upon the race.

We are like Adam, and our children are also. Suppose your child is sitting at the table in a bad mood and you say to him, "Come on now, Johnny, sit up and eat your dinner." Instead, Johnny folds his arms and sort of spits to show his feelings about what you are trying to get him to do. You say it a second time, "Come on, Johnny, you have to eat if you're going to grow up to be a big, strong boy." He reaches his hand toward his dish, grabs a spoon, and then begins to wave the spoon around. Finally he knocks his milk over. In other words, he does anything but what you want him to do and thereby illustrates how Adam's rebellion has passed through us to our children.

Spiritual wisdom comes at the point at which we will accept God's description of our nature and ask him to lead us into ways that can please him.

Sinai

Let me take you to another biblical event that reveals the hearts of men as God sees them. Much later, after God had begun to establish a race through whom he was going to send the Redeemer, God delivered the race from Egypt, bringing them into the desert to the foot of Mount Sinai. God had delivered Israel through what is probably the greatest collection of miracles in all history. He had brought them to Sinai in order that he might give them the law. The Bible says that God descended upon the mountain in the midst of a cloud of smoke and fire. So awe-inspiring was the sight that even Moses said, "I am trembling with fear" (Heb. 12:21).

As the hours turned to days and the days to weeks, however, the people who were left in the valley gradually overcame their fear of the mountain and began to forget the power of God and the miracles. They grew cynical and impatient. They said, "Where is Moses, who brought us up out of Egypt? We don't know what has become of him." Before long they began to remember the worship of Apis the bull and Hathor the cow that they had known in Egypt, and they approached Moses' brother Aaron to ask him to make an image of Apis or Hathor for them. Aaron should have refused immediately and indignantly. But Aaron was weak, like many Christians. He reminded himself that politics is the art of the possible. So he took their gold, melted it in the fire, and when he was done he had enough of the metal to make a little calf. That satisfied the people. So they began to sing and dance and worship the calf, saying, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (Exod. 32:4).

Meanwhile, up on the mountain God was still speaking to Moses, giving him the law. How ironic it was, the contrast between the law and the behavior of the people! God was saying, "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:2-6). But while God was saying this the people turned their backs on the One who had delivered them from Egypt.

Look to the Cross

Pass over the centuries to the time of Jesus Christ and then try to find an excuse for man's behavior. Someone might argue that the doctrine of man's sinfulness is abstract and that we only understand the concrete. He might say, "If only we had an example of what true goodness and obedience are, then we would all acknowledge the right and follow it." But would we? Not at all! Jesus came. He was the perfect example. He said to his enemies on one occasion, "Which of you convicts me of sin?" There was absolute silence. No one had anything with which to charge him. Yet it was these same men who mocked him, taunted him, and finally delivered him over to the Romans to be crucified.

That is the heart of man. That is what Jesus saw. It is how God sees you and me today. And yet—this is the wonderful thing—God loves you in spite of your sin and has proved it by letting Christ die for you.

It is not hard to love someone who is lovely. We all do that. It is often possible to love someone who is unlovely. Some do that occasionally. But to love someone who is rebellious, proud, arrogant, corrupt, ruthlessly independent, and who will crucify the very one who most loves him—that is real love! Of that sort of love only God is capable.

If you really desire to know the extent of God's love, look to the cross. You see Christ hanging there. You watch the hours of darkness descend on the land, the hours in which Christ was made sin for you and bore your punishment. You hear his cry, wrung from him in the moments in which he was separated from God as your sin-bearer: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" That is how much God loves you. "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

We live in a miserable, vascillating age. It is almost impossible for me to relate how many people I have heard say to me in one form or another: "Nobody loves me." It is often true. It may be true for you. It may be true that no one really understands you, that you are unloved by your parents, your children, your acquaintances. Yet there is One who does understand you—Jesus Christ. He knows everything about you. He sees your heart, and he loves you anyway.

Chapter 30.
The Man Who Came by Night

John 3:1

Quite a few years ago Governor Neff, of the state of Texas, received an invitation to speak at one of the penitentiaries in that state. He spoke to the assembled prisoners, and afterward said that he would be around for a while to listen to anything any of the convicts might wish to tell him. He would take as much time as they wanted, and anything they would tell him would be kept in confidence. The convicts began to come, one at a time. One after another told him a story of how they had been unjustly sentenced, were innocent, and wished to get out. Finally one man came through who said to him, "Governor Neff, I don't want to take much of your time. I only want to say that I really did what they convicted me for. But I have been here a number of years. I believe I have paid my debt to society and that, if I were to be released, I would be able to live an upright life and show myself worthy of your mercy." This was the man whom Governor Neff pardoned.

I know, of course, that there are imperfections in that illustration. For one thing, some of the men who claimed to be innocent might actually have been innocent. For another, the man who was pardoned might have been deceiving the governor and might have led a much more disreputable life after his release. Still, the point of the story stands: the first step in the rehabilitation of any man lies in his admission of guilt. To benefit from a doctor, the patient must admit that he is sick.

Just as this is true in medicine, business, and criminal rehabilitation, so is it true spiritually. Therefore, much of the Word of God is given over to revealing man's need so that a person might acknowledge his need and turn to God for pardon.

A Representative Man

This pattern of the biblical revelation is found in John's Gospel. Our studies of the Gospel thus far have taken us through the first two chapters of the book, with the result that we come now to the record of the two-thousand-year-old conversation between Nicodemus and Jesus, contained in chapter 3. This chapter stresses the need for the new birth and for faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, but before it does this it first of all stresses man's need for these. Therefore, we must first see Nicodemus as a representative of all men standing as sinners before God.

The first two chapters of the Gospel have been concerned with the person of Jesus primarily, but it is also true that they have been concerned with man. In the first chapter, John pointed out that when the true Light shone in the world, men as a whole did not respond to him (vv. 10-11). In chapter 2, John tells us that although many seemed to believe in Jesus as a result of his miracles, nevertheless "Jesus would not entrust himself to them, for he knew all men" (v. 24). The failure of men in spiritual things is now John's theme, and Nicodemus is to be seen as his first concrete example.

This is much more apparent in the Greek text of the Gospel than it is in the English. Still, it can also be seen in the English so long as we remember that the chapter and verse divisions of our Bibles were not in the original text. With these eliminated we can easily see that when John begins to say in 3:1, "Now there was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus, a member of the Jewish ruling council." He is deliberately repeating the word "man" which occurs in the previous chapter. There we are told that Jesus knew what was in man and therefore did not commit himself to man. Nicodemus is a man. Consequently, we must begin with the recognition that he is introduced above all as a representative of the human race.

A Pharisee

He is a good representative too, at least from a human point of view. For if we had lived in Christ's day and had been forced for some reason to choose a man to represent us, a man who would embody the best of our culture, education, ethics, and piety, Nicodemus would have been a good choice. We would not have chosen the emperor or many of the rulers of Rome, for these men were demonstrably corrupt. We would not have chosen the philosophers of Greece, for they had little knowledge of religion. We would not have chosen a common, ignorant person. But we would have chosen Nicodemus. Nicodemus had everything. And yet—this is the point of John's account—he was a failure spiritually because he had never found God.

Notice his achievements. First of all, Nicodemus was a Pharisee. In our day we have a bad picture of the Pharisees, primarily because of the harsh words Jesus spoke about them. In our minds the word "Pharisee" is almost a synonym for hypocrite. It suggests ritualistic religion. In Jesus' time the religion of Judaism was largely an ethical cult, and the Pharisees were the chief exponents of the ethical way of life. All this is true. Yet in other ways the Pharisees were probably the best people in the whole country. To begin with, there were never really very many of them. William Barclay notes that there were never more than six thousand Pharisees, and that because of their limited number they actually formed a kind of select brotherhood. Moreover, they were serious about the law. The Pharisees were the theological conservatives of their day. They believed that the Old Testament was the revealed Word of God and that the first five books of the Old Testament, the Pentateuch, contained an inspired code of ethics to be believed and practiced literally. In some ways the greatest glory of the Pharisaic religion lay in the fact that it applied the law literally. It was the goal of the scribes to work out the exact meaning of the law; it was the determined purpose of the Pharisees to keep it.

As a Pharisee, Nicodemus represented those of his day and ours who seek the meaning of life in religion but do not find it. He belonged to the church, but he knew nothing of that personal, lifetransforming relationship to Jesus Christ upon whom the true church is founded.

Second, Nicodemus was a scholar. This is perfectly evident from the fact that he was a Pharisee, for the Pharisees were great students of the law. Yet it is evident in another way also.

Have you ever noticed the fact that although Nicodemus was a Jew he nevertheless had a Greek name? Nicodemus is Greek for "one who conquers the people." This might not mean much in America where we have a great mixture of races and cultures, where a man might as well be called Karl, James, Joseph, or Pierre and have it mean little concerning him. But in Palestine, in the first Christian century, it was significant. For the most part those who lived in Judea had Hebrew or Aramaic names. However, those in the upper classes, who were exposed to Greek as well as Jewish culture, often gave their children two names, a Greek name as well as a Hebrew one. Evidently this had been true of Nicodemus, which indicates that he had a Greek education. Moreover, since he apparently preferred to be known by his Greek rather than his Hebrew name, Nicodemus probably had a preference for Greek over Hebrew culture and may actually have been a Hellenist, that is, one who read the Old Testament in Greek and who looked at it in the light of the categories of Greek philosophy. It was therefore a highly educated man as well as a highly moral and ethical man who came to Jesus in the warmth of that Judean night.

Isn't it true that he is a representative of many highly educated people in our day? We have been told by many in our century that education is the means to solve the world's problems. As a result we have the most highly educated mass of people in our country and in the world that this race has ever seen. It seems that a man needs a high school education just to wash dishes. Still the problems are not solved, and the unrest that characterizes our day is as evident on the campuses as in the ghettos. If the example of Nicodemus is to teach anything, it is to teach that education is not the answer to man's spiritual unrest and longing.

Third, Nicodemus was a politician. John says in writing about him that he was "a member of the Jewish ruling council." That means that he was a member of the Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin was the highest legislative body in Judaism, combining in itself all the powers that we generally divide up among the legislative, administrative, and judicial branches of our governments. Naturally, under Roman rule the powers of the Sanhedrin were more restricted than they had once been. There were times when the members of the Sanhedrin were unable to inflict the death penalty, as for instance, at the trial of Jesus. Still the Sanhedrin was the chief authority in Israel. It conducted trials, investigated heresies, wrote laws, and carried on most of the official dealings between the people of Judea and the Roman authorities. Nicodemus was a member of this exclusive, governing body.

It is part of the same picture that Nicodemus may also have been among one of the most distinguished families in Judea, even when measured by the standards of this elite body of politicians. The basis for this supposition lies in the fact that Josephus, in his Antiquities, twice mentions a high-ranking Jewish family in which the name Nicodemus is prominent. He tells us that nearly one hundred years before the conversation recorded here, when Aristobulus, the Jewish ruler, needed an ambassador to the court of Pompey, the Roman emperor, he chose a man named Nicodemus to bear his message. He also writes that after this time, during the Jewish war of a.d. 66-70, a man named Gorion was given the responsibility of negotiating the surrender of the garrison at Jerusalem and that he was the son of a certain Nicodemus (or Nicomedus) who would therefore have lived in Christ's generation. If these facts are significant, it may mean not only that Nicodemus was an extremely pious person, not only highly educated, not only a politician, but also that he came from one of the most distinguished and best-known families in the entire nation.

He would have been even more important than a Rockefeller, Astor, Stevenson, Einstein, or Eisenhower. For in one sense he was all these things in one.

Isn't this the kind of man you would choose to represent you? Or the kind of man you might like to be? Of course, he is. Yet the point of his story, the reason why John records Nicodemus's conversation with Jesus, is that in spite of his achievements, in spite of his prominence in education, politics, culture, and religion, Nicodemus had a great need. He needed to know God. Because he did not know God he was psychologically ill at ease, unhappy, lost, and spiritually blind.

Rebirth

A person might ask quite rightly how these things can be so. How can a man who has achieved everything from a human point of view still be unhappy? How can the achievers of this world be lost? The answer comes out in the story. For the first point that Jesus made in speaking with Nicodemus is that all men need a new birth. Jesus said, "Of course you don't have the solutions to life, Nicodemus; for the solutions to life are spiritual and no man can see them unless he has come to life spiritually." His actual words were: "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again" (v. 3).

According to Jesus, the starting point in the Christian life is rebirth. Before his new birth a man is a child of wrath. He is alienated from God, as Nicodemus was, and he has no real understanding of spiritual things. God comes to him to plant saving faith within his heart, for we are told that even faith does not come from ourselves; it is the gift of God (Eph. 2:8). Then God brings the words of Scripture to our attention. Finally, the Holy Spirit takes the words of Scripture and plants them within the womb of our heart with the result that life is conceived. Hereafter the man can declare, "If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17 RSV). It is true that the man still retains much of his old nature, but now he begins to see things differently and the life within begins to grow.

The full meaning of the new birth will become more evident as the chapter goes on, but this study should not end without providing an example of the kind of change the new birth can produce. Nicodemus will not do for an example, for we are never told how he responded to this teaching by Jesus. So far as we know he never understood it and never believed. Still there is another excellent example of a man who did.

This man was a rabbi, just like Nicodemus. He came from a good family and was versed in Greek as well as Hebrew culture, just like Nicodemus. This man had studied with the best men of his day. He was a Pharisee, like Nicodemus. He was even (in one sense) a politician, for he was associated with the Sanhedrin. He put down sectarian groups that threatened his brand of Judaism. Still there came a time, as this learned rabbi was on the way to Damascus with an assignment to ferret out and imprison the Christians of that city, when he met Jesus Christ and received new life from him.

Afterward he wrote about it, saying that all his achievements, like those of Nicodemus, had really proved worthless. In fact, they were worse than worthless—they were actually harmful— for they had kept him from true saving faith in God's Son. He wrote: "If anyone thinks to base his claims on externals, I could make a stronger case for myself: circumcised on my eighth day, Israelite by race, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew born and bred; in my attitude to the law, a Pharisee; in pious zeal, a persecutor of the church; in legal rectitude, faultless. But all such assets I have written off because of Christ. I would say more: I count everything sheer loss, because all is far outweighed by the gain of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whose sake I did in fact lose everything" (Phil. 3:4-8 NEB).

This was the experience of the apostle Paul. It is recorded in the Book of Philippians. Is this your experience? Is this your life? Or are you still trying to discover a life of contentment and blessing through your own limited achievements and human understanding? It will not come through your own efforts. It will only come through the new birth found and expressed by faith in the Lord Jesus.

Chapter 31.
Intellectuals or New Men?

John 3:2

The longer I live the more convinced I become that the natural man will do almost anything to dodge the full implications of the gospel. The gospel declares that Jesus Christ died to save men, but when this is proclaimed the non-Christian immediately begins to think of all the other meanings Christ's death might have, and so avoid the right one. The gospel states that Jesus Christ is the sole way to God. The one who has not yet come to Christ begins to advance other ways of salvation and to argue in defense of the many non-Christian religions. In the same way, whenever the Bible speaks of man's total inability to please God, many will immediately reject that and seek for exceptions.

This aspect of human nature is known to God, of course. Thus, much of the Bible is given over to declaring the full scope of man's need. In fact, this is one of the two greatest themes of the Bible. The first is the utter inability of man to save himself. The second is the way of salvation provided by God through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

In an indirect way, the extent of man's need is seen in the conversation between Nicodemus and Jesus that is recorded in John 3. The first verse has shown man's need in reference to the many external accomplishments of which a talented man is capable. Nicodemus was a well-educated, earnest, even a pious politician, but none of these achievements could save him. He was lost and lonely. He needed to be born again. It is possible, however, that some might read the account and agree—up to this point. "And yet," they might say, "what about the extent of man's knowledge? Man's greatest strength is in his mind. Can't a man find true happiness and peace with God through his intellect?" It is in answer to this type of argument that the story now goes on to show that even man's intellect is inadequate when applied to spiritual things.

The Fall

To understand why man's mind is an inadequate tool for coming to know God, we need to go back to the story of the fall of man as recorded in the Book of Genesis.

To begin with, the Bible says that when God created man he created him in his own image. This means many things, but among them is the fact that since God is a trinity, man became a trinity also. God exists in three persons: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Man also became a trinity when God created him with a body, soul, and spirit. Everyone knows what the body is: that part of man that we can see. Man shares with the plant world the fact that he has a body. In addition to a body, man also possesses a soul. A soul is that part of man that gives him his identity. It is with the soul that man thinks, feels, reacts, and aspires. A man is linked to the animal world by his soul, for the animals also have a sense of identity. That is why Jesus said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests." That is, they know who they are, and they return to that which is theirs.

In addition to a body and a soul, however, a man also possesses a spirit, or (as we should probably say for all men since the fall) he possesses the capacity for one. It is this capacity that sets man apart from the animal world. The spirit is that part of man that has consciousness of God. Consequently, man worships, while the animals do not.

This was the man that God placed in the Garden, a man with a body, soul, and spirit. God said to him, "The whole earth is for your enjoyment. You can eat of all the trees in the garden, but as a symbol of your dependence upon me I am marking out one tree, the fruit of which you shall not eat. This is the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and the day that you eat of this tree you will die." Adam looked at the tree. Then, after a suitable pause, he ate of it, thereby saying to God, "I do not care for all the trees north of here, east of here, south of here, or west of here. As long as this tree stands in the middle of the Garden it reminds me of my dependence upon you, and I hate it. I will therefore eat of it and die."

What happened when Adam ate of the forbidden fruit? He died, of course. But how did he die? Well, he did not die physically at first. That came later. First, his spirit died. That was the part of his being that had communion with God. Consequently, the communion was broken, and man proved that it was broken by running away from God when God came to him in the Garden.

Second, man began to die in his soul. Since the soul is the seat of man's intellect, feelings, and identity, man therefore began to lose his identity, give vent to bad feelings, and suffer the decay of his intellect. This is the type of intellectual and spiritual decay portrayed in the first chapter of Romans where we are told that having given up the worship of the true God, people's "thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (Rom. 1:21-23).

We must not take this to mean that man lost his ability to reason. That is not true. It simply means that man lost his ability to reason his way to God. An illustration may help us here. There is a condition in the human body, known to doctors as myasthenia gravis, in which the muscles of the body cannot respond to the signals being sent from the brain. In the human body the brain normally originates the signal for a muscle to expand or contract. The signal is sent to the muscle through a nerve and is received in the muscle by an apparatus known as the motor-end-plate. In the condition I mentioned, the motor-end-plates are missing. Consequently, the signal is sent to the muscle through the nerves, but it is never received by the muscle. Because it is not received, the muscle does not respond, and because the muscle does not respond it eventually withers away and dies.

That is exactly what happened in man when his spirit died through the fall. In the human system the spirit was meant to play the part of the motor-end-plate. It was meant to receive God's signals. When Adam and Eve sinned, the motor-end-plate died. Thus, although the signals are still there, although God is speaking, people do not hear him and their spiritual life withers. Eventually, of course, even the human body dies. So it is written, "Dust you are and to dust you will return" (Gen. 3:19).

It is possible to describe salvation completely in reference to these three parts of man's being. Man sinned, and man died—body, soul, and spirit. So when God begins to save a man he begins to work with his body, soul, and spirit, only in reverse order. The salvation of the spirit comes first. This is justification; by it man receives a new spirit. The salvation of the soul is second. This is sanctification; in sanctification man receives a new soul (for God does not merely patch up the old one). The salvation of the body comes last. This is the resurrection in which man receives a new body.

Running from God

In our studies we are going to deal with this great plan of salvation. But first we need to see two major results of what I have been saying.

The first result is that man no longer seeks God. In fact, man runs from God. He does this in religious ways as well as in secular ones. God is good. Man is sinful. If man's intellect were functioning properly, the intellect should tell him that all truth, joy, growth, and happiness is to be found in fellowship with his Creator. But when man fell his mind began to be warped in regard to spiritual things so that now he thinks happiness is to be found in independence. God comes with the offer of salvation and renewed fellowship, and man says, "No, not that. Anything but that." And he runs away.

I know that someone will ask, "What do you mean when you say that man runs away from God? I sought God. In fact, I am still seeking him. I sought God in the Presbyterian church, and when I couldn't find God in the Presbyterian church I left it and became a Baptist. When I couldn't find God in the Baptist church I left that church and became a Methodist. Now I am a Pentecostal, and if I don't find God in the Pentecostal church I am going to leave the church and become a Mormon." You have not been seeking God; you have been running away from him! When God got close to you in the Presbyterian church and said, "My child, this is the truth about your condition and your need for a Savior," you turned from him, saying, "I don't like that way of talking about religion; I'm going to go elsewhere." You went to the Baptist church. But when God got close to you in the Baptist church you became a Methodist. Now you are a Pentecostal. The truth is that you are not seeking God; you are running away from him.

Some time ago a minister told me a story that illustrates this truth. He had come in the early days of his ministry to a very liberal church. His prayer in those days—because he knew that many would be offended with the true gospel—was, "Lord, just let them leave quietly." And, of course, many did—before the church began to grow to its present size. The day came when one woman, who had been his greatest supporter at the beginning, walked out very much offended. As she did, she stopped to tell him, "Sir, I am leaving this church and I will not be back. No man is going to call me a miserable sinner!" Such is the heart of our fallen race.

The second result of the fall, as it affects man's reason, is that he now needs revelation if he is to know anything at all about God. In other words, not only does he not come to God by reason; it is also true that he is incapable of coming. Thus, we find Paul writing: "No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love him—but God has revealed it to us by his Spirit" (1 Cor. 2:9-10). This means that a person will never understand spiritual truth unless God first takes the initiative in saving him.

Nicodemus

All that goes before is really a theological introduction to the second verse of John 3. So I now want to illustrate it by John's story.

Nicodemus came to Jesus by night and said, "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him" (v. 2). Apart from the word "Rabbi," which was his direct form of address, the first words that Nicodemus uttered were his claim to considerable intellectual knowledge. He said, "We know." He then began to rehearse three things that he knew: (1) that Jesus was continuing to do many miracles; (2) that the miracles were intended to authenticate him as a teacher sent from God; and, therefore, (3) that Jesus was a teacher sent from God to whom Nicodemus should listen. Unfortunately for Nicodemus, the point of the story is that Nicodemus's whole conception of Jesus Christ was wrong in spite of his knowledge. His intellect had deceived him. That is why Jesus rebuked him by saying, "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again" (v. 3). There had been hundreds of teachers sent from God during the long course of Jewish history. Many of them had been authenticated by miracles. But Jesus was not one of these teachers. They were men. Jesus Christ was God. They had come to teach about God. He was God come to teach, die, and reveal himself to men.

The second way in which Nicodemus illustrates the results of the fall on the human intellect is that he reacted to Christ's words in purely natural terms. We referred to this when considering John 2:18-22. Jesus replied to Nicodemus's words by saying that a man must be born again before he can understand things spiritually. This was simple spiritual teaching, but it was a mystery to Nicodemus. Jesus was speaking of the need for new, spiritual life. But all Nicodemus could think of was obstetrics. Jesus had said, "You must be born again." Nicodemus began to think of all the concepts that could possibly be associated with the only kind of birth he knew— physical birth. Then when that didn't make sense he asked, "How can a man be born when he is old? Surely he cannot enter a second time into his mother's womb to be born!" (v. 4).

Jesus answered, in effect. "No, Nicodemus, I don't mean obstetrics. I am speaking of the kind of birth that takes place by means of God's Spirit."

A Comprehensive Cure

That brings us to the cure that God has for man's intellect. The cure begins with man's spirit, for it is there that the communion with God was broken. The new birth means that God has restored communication. Before the new birth the motor-end-plates were missing. Now they are restored, and man begins to receive and understand what God is saying.

We must not think, however, that the salvation of man stops there. For since the fall affected man's mind, so does salvation affect it. Only salvation affects it positively. Think how many verses speak of the transformation that God wills for man's mind after his conversion. In some ways Romans 12:1-2 is the touchstone: "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and per-feet will." Isaiah speaks of the mind also, for he writes: "You will keep in perfect peace him whose mind is steadfast" (Isa. 26:3). Peter wrote: "Prepare your minds for action" (1 Peter 1:13). Finally, perhaps the greatest verse in the New Testament about the task of reordering our minds is the place where Paul writes, "We demolish arguments and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and we take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5).

This is the task that is set before you in this life, if you are a Christian. This is why you must study the Bible and expose yourself to sound teaching. It must always stand as a great biblical principle that God does not save men by means of the human intellect. He wants new men. But let it also be said that he wishes to train the thoughts and order the intellect of the new men.

Chapter 32.
Becoming New Men

John 3:3-5

A young Arab was proceeding down the road on a donkey when he came upon a small bird, a sparrow, lying upon his back in the road. There he was, a small scrawny object with two thin legs pointed skyward. At first the Arab thought the sparrow was dead. When he found that the bird was alive, however, the Arab got down from his donkey and went forward to speak to him. "Are you all right?" he asked.

"Yes," the sparrow answered.

"Then what are you doing lying on your back with your legs pointed up at the sky?"

"Haven't you heard the rumor?" the sparrow asked in return. "They say that heaven is going to fall."

"If it does," said the Arab, "surely you don't think you're going to hold it up with those two scrawny legs?"

The bird looked at him with a solemn face for a moment and then retorted, "One does the best one can."

We laugh at the story, of course, but the folly of the sparrow is only an illustration of the folly of human beings who think they can hold off the wrath of divine judgment by the scrawny legs of human achievements. According to the Bible, this cannot be done. Thus, the first few verses of John 3 have been showing that no man can please God either by his own achievements or by his intellect. Instead a man must be born again. At this point, however, Nicodemus asks the question that anyone might quite properly ask, "All right, you say that a man must be born again. How, then, is it possible? How can a man be born again?" To this question—perhaps the most important question that anyone can ask—the third chapter of John gives two answers.

Birth from Above

The first answer to Nicodemus's question is the answer Jesus gave even before he asked it. Jesus said, "No one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again" (v. 3). Later he said the same thing by repeating, "You must be born again" (v. 7). The answer involved in this statement lies in the meaning of the Greek word translated "again." It is one of two Greek words that are often translated "again" in our Bibles. One is palin, which refers quite simply to the repetition of an act. The other word, the one used here, is anothen, which also refers to the repetition of an act but which implies more.

In the first place, anothen can also be translated "from above." This is the meaning of the word in John 3:31 that says, "The one who comes from above is above all; the one who is from the earth belongs to the earth, and speaks as one from the earth. The one who comes from heaven is above all." "Above" points to heaven. So when the Bible uses anothen instead of palin in the first part of the chapter, it is suggesting that the new birth is supernatural and has its origin in God.

Then, too, there is an even finer distinction that also bears this out. Palin, as I have said, refers to the repetition of an act. Anothen also refers to the repetition of an act, but it involves one additional detail, the fact that the repetition of the act has the same source as the first act. Suppose that the pianist Van Cliburn and I are in a room and that Van Cliburn has just completed playing the piano parts of Tchaikovsky's great piano concerto. People want to hear it again. Now if they were Greek and should say, "Play it again (palin)," that would mean that I could sit down at the piano and try and do it. It would only mean that they wanted to hear the music repeated. However, if they should say, "Play it again (anothen)," it would mean that the repetition of the music would have to have the same source as the first playing. In other words, Van Cliburn would have to play the concerto. Thus, when Jesus said, "Unless he is born again," he was suggesting that the new birth would have to have the same source as the original birth. That is, Nicodemus would have to be brought to life spiritually by God.

This distinction takes us back to the early chapters of Genesis, before the fall, where we are told that "The LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life" (Gen. 2:7). When Adam sinned he lost God's life, first spiritually and then physically. Thus, Jesus told Nicodemus that he needed to be born again as Adam was born. God was the source. Therefore, Nicodemus needed to have a fresh impartation of spiritual life; there had to be a new creation.

Water and Wind

The second answer to Nicodemus's question—"How can a man be born again?"—is the answer given in verse 5. Jesus answered, "Truly, truly, I say to you, unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God" (RSV). This verse carries Jesus' explanation of the new birth a bit further, for having explained it in reference to its source he now begins to explain in a more technical way how the new birth takes place. It takes place literally by "water" and "breath" or, as most translations say, "of water and of the Spirit." In other words, Jesus first spoke of the source of the new birth. He now speaks of the means by which it occurs.

At this point we must acknowledge that several interpretations of the phrase "of water and of the Spirit" have been given. One of these interpretations takes the word "water" as referring to physical birth. I heard this explanation first during my years in college. It is based on the fact that physical birth is accompanied by the release of the embryonic fluid from the womb of the mother. If this were the proper explanation, Jesus would be saying that in order for a person to be saved he must first be born physically and then his physical birth must be followed by a spiritual birth.

True as this may be, it does not seem to be the proper interpretation of the statement. For one thing, the word "water" is never used in this way elsewhere in Scripture. For another, a reference to the necessity of physical birth is so self-evident that the question arises whether Jesus would waste words in this fashion. The third and decisive problem with this view is that since Jesus was probably claiming that a person is born again by water as well as by the Spirit, if water refers to physical birth, this is simply not true. Physical birth is not part of the answer.

The second interpretation of the phrase is that which sees water as referring to water baptism. Unfortunately, this is not substantiated either by the text or by biblical theology. The text says nothing at all about baptism, and the Bible elsewhere teaches that no one is saved by any external rite of religion (1 Sam. 16:7; Rom. 2:28-29; Gal. 2:15, 16; 5:1-6). Baptism is a sign of what has already taken place, but it is not the agent by which it takes place.

Some years ago a young woman came to me wanting to be married to a young man whom I had not yet met. I arranged for us to get together and in the course of the resulting conversation discovered that neither the young woman nor the young man were Christians. The man was quite open about it and regarded the church service as merely a public ceremony. The young woman thought she was a Christian, largely because she had come from a family of churchgoers and had been baptized in her infancy by a bishop. When I pointed out that baptism never made anyone a Christian this woman was greatly offended. She was even more offended when later I declined to perform the ceremony.

Someone will object to this on the grounds that John the Baptist supposedly baptized people for new life, but this is wrong teaching. John called for repentance, and when men or women repented he baptized them as a sign to others that this had happened. The proof of this is seen in the fact that John actually refused to baptize certain of the Pharisees and Sadducees because they did not show evidence of any genuine change in their lives.

The third interpretation of the phrase "of water and of the Spirit" is one that takes both parts of the phrase symbolically. "Water," the argument goes, refers to cleansing; "Spirit" refers to power. Therefore, one must be both cleansed and filled with power. William Barclay is one who holds this view. It is true, of course, that the sinner must be cleansed from his sin and that it is the Christian's privilege to be endued with power from on high, but it is questionable whether this is the primary meaning of this passage. Strictly speaking, both cleansing and power accompany the new birth, while these verses are dealing with the way in which the new birth itself comes about. Moreover, neither of the ideas is related at all to the birth metaphor as the context seems to require.

One of the great students of the Greek New Testament, Kenneth S. Wuest, proposed a fourth explanation. It is based upon the use of the word "water" as a metaphor in other New Testament texts. Wuest points out that "water" often is used in Scripture to refer to the Holy Spirit. He thinks that this is the case in John 4, for instance, where Jesus tells the woman of Samaria that he will give her "a spring of water welling up to eternal life" (John 4:14). Another case is John 7:3738, where almost the identical language is used. After this statement John himself adds, as if in parentheses, "By this he meant the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were later to receive" (v. 39). Wuest also refers to Isaiah 44:3 and 55:1, both of which should have been known to Nicodemus. If this is the correct interpretation of the phrase "of water and of the Spirit," then we have a repetition of ideas, and the word "and" should be taken in its emphatic sense. We would normally indicate this by translating the word as "even." Thus, Jesus would be saying, "I tell you the truth, no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water, even the Spirit."

The explanation given by Wuest is a good explanation. Nevertheless, it seems to me that another must be preferred. Wuest begins by pointing out that the word "water" is often a metaphor for the Holy Spirit. This is true, but it is not the only spiritual reality that is suggested by that metaphor.

Water is also a metaphor for the written Word of God, the Bible. Thus, Ephesians 5:26 says that Christ gave himself for the church "to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word." In 1 John the same author who composed the fourth Gospel distinguishes between the witnesses to Christ on earth of "the Spirit, the water and the blood" (1 John 5:8). Since he then goes on to speak of God's written witness to the fact that salvation is in Christ, in this context the Spirit must refer to God's witness within the individual, the blood to the historical witness of Christ's death, and the water to the Scriptures. Psalm 119:9 declares, "How can a young man keep his way pure? By living according to your word. "Jesus said, "You are already clean because of the word I have spoken to you" (John 15:3).

A related text is James 1:18, which actually cites the Scriptures as the channel through which the new birth takes place, although without using water as the metaphor. "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created."

When we see Christ's words in this light, we see that God is here pictured as the Divine Begetter, the Father of his spiritual children, and we learn that the written Word of God together with the working of his Holy Spirit is the means by which the new birth is accomplished. That is why the Bible tells us that it pleased God to save people by the foolishness of preaching, for people are reborn through the efforts of others who proclaim God's Word (Rom. 10:14-15; 1 Cor. 1:21).

Spiritual Conception

One more verse makes this even clearer: 1 Peter 1:23. It says, "For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God."

There are many symbols for the Word of God in the Bible. We are told that the Bible is "a lamp" to our feet and "a light" to our path (Ps. 119:105). The Word is like "a fire ... and like a hammer that breaks a rock in pieces" (Jer. 23:29). It is "milk" to the spiritual infant and "strong meat" to those of a more mature age (1 Peter 2:2; Heb. 5:11-14). It is a sword (Heb. 4:12; Eph. 6:17), a "mirror" (1 Cor. 13:12; 2 Cor. 3:18; James 1:23), a "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ" (Gal. 3:24). It is a branch grafted into our bodies (James 1:21). These are great images, but none is so bold as the one used by Peter in this passage.

In the first chapter of 1 Peter, Peter has been talking about the means by which a person enters the family of God. First, he has discussed his theme objectively in terms of Christ's death, writing that "it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed ... but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (vv. 18, 19). Second, he has discussed the basis of the new birth subjectively, pointing out that it occurs through faith: "Through him you believe in God, who raised him from the dead and glorified him, and so your faith and hope are in God" (v. 21). Finally, having mentioned these truths, Peter goes on to discuss the new birth in terms of God's sovereign grace in election. This time, however, he emphasizes that God is the Father of his children and that we are born again spiritually by means of the Word of God, which Peter likens to the male life germ. The Latin Vulgate makes this image of Peter's even clearer than our English versions, for the word used there is semen.

When we take these passages together and then add to them all that the Bible has to say about faith and about the work of the Holy Spirit in salvation, we find that we are able to grasp the essential nature of the new birth in terms of human conception. What happens when a man or a woman is born again? The answer is that God first of all plants within the heart of the person what we might call the ovum of saving faith, for we are told that even faith is not of ourselves, it is the gift of God (Eph. 2:8). Second, God sends forth the seed of his Word so that the seed of the Word, which contains the divine life within it, pierces the ovum of faith that God has already placed within our hearts. The result is conception. By this means, a new spiritual life comes into being, a life that has its origin in God and that therefore has no connection whatever with the sinful life that surrounds it.

God did not use anything of Abram when he made Abraham. He did not use anything of Simon when he created the new Peter. He did not use anything of Saul when he made Paul. He does not use anything of your old sinful and Adamic nature when he produces the new life of Christ within you. That is why we can now say, "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come" (2 Cor. 5:17). Thus did Jesus speak to Nicodemus.

Thus does Jesus speak to you, whoever you may be. If you are one who has never believed on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior, you must realize that you will never be able to enter God's family by any achievements of your own. The work is God's alone, and it was accomplished objectively through the death and resurrection of Christ. If you are a believer, you should find encouragement in the fact that all the people of God, from Abel on down to the last believer who will ever live, are born again by the same process and are therefore in the family of God through God's activity. This should be your confidence, if you are a Christian. "For God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (Rom. 11:29). Moreover, we know that what God has promised "[he has] power to do" (Rom. 4:21).

Chapter 33.

Flesh and Spirit

John 3:6

The first great principle of the new birth is that God does not avail himself of anything found in the natural man when he begets a Christian. Man is fallen and totally depraved from God's point of view. He is fallen in body, soul, and spirit, and God does not begin to patch these up when he saves him. Instead of the old spirit, now dead, God implants a new spirit, having its source in himself. Instead of the old soul, God begins to construct a new soul so that the man comes to desire new things. Instead of the old body, which will one day die and decompose, God will eventually give a new body patterned after the resurrection body of the Lord Jesus Christ. Thus, the Christian becomes a fresh beginning by God and can be called "a new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17).

The verse to which we come now, John 3:6, gives us a reason why this state of affairs is as God declares it to be. Moreover, it carries us beyond the mere facts of the new birth to the principles by which the new life is to be lived out in the Christian. The verse says, "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit."

The reason this verse gives for the way in which God operates should be especially understandable to us who know something about genetics. Likes produce likes. A male dog and a female dog produce puppies rather than kittens. Cats produce cats. Horses produce horses. Plants produce plants. People produce people. In the same way, God tells us, that which comes out of the natural man can produce only that which is natural to man and which is sinful as a result. Man can produce nothing spiritual. On the other hand, that which comes forth from God produces only that which is characteristic of God and which is therefore sinless and eternal.

The Natural Man

If we are to understand this statement by the Lord Jesus Christ, we need to understand the terms involved. This is true of any verse of the Bible, of course, but it is particularly true of this verse due to the fact that the most important term in it is used in different ways in the Bible and in current speech.

The term that is turned about in today's speech is the term "flesh." What is flesh? In current English usage the word "flesh" refers almost entirely to the fleshly parts of the body, at times being almost synonymous with the word "skin." Yet this is not at all what the term means biblically. In the Bible the word "flesh" refers to the entire individual—body, soul, and spirit. Since the fall of man it refers to the individual as he is motivated by his sinful nature.

For instance, at the beginning of Genesis we are told that when God brought the first woman to the first man in Eden, Adam said, "This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called 'woman,' for she was taken out of man. For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh" (Gen. 2:23-24). When Adam said, "They will become one flesh," he was not talking about a sexual or bodily union alone, although that was part of it. He was saying that the man and woman were to be united body, soul, and spirit, and that they were thereafter to become what you and I might call one organism. Consequently, at the very beginning of the Bible the word "flesh" is used to denote the whole of man's being.

After the fall of man the word "flesh" conveys a slightly different meaning, still involving all of man's being but also denoting man as he is moved by his depraved human nature. The term now points to man as he is motivated by that nature rather than as moved by the Spirit.

We can be helped in our understanding by the following illustration. All of us have seen a tug-ofwar in which two individuals or two groups struggle to pull a marker on a piece of rope across a line. So long as the struggle is even the marker more or less stays in the middle. When one person weakens or falls down, the marker moves over to the other side, and the stronger team wins. In some ways this is what human nature was like before the fall. The center of the human person, the soul, was like the marker. On one side was a person's body with its appetites. On the other was the spirit with its consciousness of God. God made people so that the spirit would dominate. The spirit was to determine the course of human beings' path and development. However, when Adam and Eve sinned, the human spirit died. Thereafter, people were led about by the appetites of the body or flesh with the result that even the proper functions of the body were debased and true human nature was distorted.

We could illustrate the same point by comparing the human spirit to the motor in an airplane cruising at 35,000 feet. The human body is the fuselage. The soul is the pilot. When the motor is running, the body of the plane is an asset, for the wings keep the plane up and the other parts assist in flying it. However, when the motor stops, the fuselage is a distinct liability, for it is too heavy and the plane will crash. That is what it means to be "fleshly." It means to be dominated by the body without the ongoing thrust of the spirit.

At this point we must stop to consider several terms that are synonymous with the word "flesh," for much of what is said about the flesh in the Bible is said by means of these other terms. Sometimes the reference is to our "old man" or our "old nature." At times it is the "heart." We are said to be "carnal," "fleshly," "soulish." The flesh is sometimes called "the natural man." Whatever the term used, however, the teaching is that the fleshly or natural man cannot please, obey, or even understand God.

This is the plain teaching of many passages of Scripture. For instance, David says, "Surely I was sinful at birth, sinful from the time my mother conceived me" (Ps. 51:5). Paul exhorts: "Put off your old self, which is being corrupted by its deceitful desires" (Eph. 4:22). Jeremiah tells us that "the heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9). Jesus said, "For from within, out of men's hearts, come evil thoughts, sexual immorality, theft, murder, adultery, greed, malice, deceit, lewdness, envy, slander, arrogance and folly. All these evils come from inside and make a man 'unclean'" (Mark 7:21-23). Paul wrote: "Those controlled by the sinful nature cannot please God" (Rom. 8:8). First Corinthians 2:14 declares: "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned."

Whatever you do, therefore, do not make the mistake of thinking when you come to these verses that they describe people other than yourself, the criminals, derelicts, hypocrites, thieves, or perverts of our society. This is not the way God intends them. These words describe every man as he is since the fall apart from a miraculous intervention of God to save him. They describe you. Thus, according to the teaching of the Bible it is correct to say that neither you nor I are able to please God. The Bible says: "All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one" (Rom. 3:12).

Painting the Pump

With this background in the biblical terminology, we now need to get back to our text. For the text teaches that the reason why God does not save people on the basis of anything in them is simply that a sinful human nature will never be able to produce anything other than sinful human nature. It is possible to polish it up a bit and put it in a good light so that it does not look quite so bad as it is, but it will still be sinful.

The natural man does not like this, of course, for most people spend much of their lives trying to improve the old nature. This may make life a little more bearable for other people, even for the individual himself, but from God's point of view it is a bit like painting a pump that is over a well of bad water. It is true that a painted pump looks better than an old rusty pump. It is true that the pump can be elevated. It can be given a gold handle. A person can write poems about it, even construct a monument to it. But nothing that is done to the pump will change the fact that it is over bad water. No embellishment will change the fact that bad water comes from it.

Kenneth S. Wuest has written, "The teaching here is that man in his totally depraved condition cannot be improved. Reformation will not change him into a fit subject for the kingdom of God. The flesh is incurably wicked, and cannot by any process be changed so as to produce a righteous life. What that person needs, Jesus says, is a new nature, a spiritual nature which will produce a life pleasing to God, and which will be a life fit for the kingdom of God. This is what Jesus teaches in the following words: 'And that which has been born of the Spirit is as a result spirit, and is spiritual in nature, and stays spirit.' That is, the new birth is a permanent thing, produces a permanent change in the life of the individual, and makes him a fit subject for the kingdom of God."

Let me ask you Christ's question: Are you born again? Do you have the life of God within you? Is there a new spring of water within or are you still painting the pump over the spring of your old human nature? You must face this question honestly, for the Bible teaches that there is no good in you that can satisfy God's righteousness. In order to please God, you must have the life of God inside.

Life in the Spirit

If you have been following the progression of Jesus' conversation with Nicodemus as we have unfolded it, you will have noticed that our exposition of John 3:6 has already brought us to the heart of Christ's argument. A man cannot be saved by any human effort because human efforts can only produce human results. Human results are sinful. Therefore, a person must be born again. At this point, however, I want to take you one step beyond the argument of Christ with Nicodemus to that teaching about the Christian life that is developed later in Christ's discourses and in the rest of the New Testament.

Let us start with this important question. What happens to the old or fleshly nature when a person is born again? The person receives a new nature, of course. He has a new spirit. The new spirit is the offspring of the Holy Spirit, the offspring of God. But what happens to his old nature? What happens to the flesh?

There are some who teach that the flesh is "eradicated" or, if you prefer this terminology, that the flesh is "transformed" so that it is no longer sinful. But this is not true, and our text refutes it. That which is born of the flesh remains flesh. Paul had a new nature, but he was the first to declare that he also had an old nature that was entirely bad. He wrote: "I know that nothing good lives in me, that is, in my sinful nature. For I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out" (Rom. 7:18). Paul's old nature struggled against his new nature causing him to cry out for that victory that only the Lord Jesus Christ can provide. The apostle John knew that he retained his old nature also (as is the case with all Christians) for he wrote to Christians saying, "If we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us" (1 John 1:8).

The real answer to the question I asked is therefore that the flesh remains with us and, what is more, that it struggles against the new nature. The new nature can do nothing bad. The old nature can do nothing good. So there will always be a conflict, a struggle, a warfare.

When you become a Christian you may think that all your struggles are over, and you may be disappointed and even discouraged to learn that in one sense the struggle is only beginning. Before, you were unhappy but not schizophrenic. Now you are struggling. If this has been your experience, you must not despair. Nor must you think that because the old nature is apparent you are therefore to go on sinning freely every day with the old nature predominating. On the contrary, you have been given a new spirit precisely so that the flesh will not dominate.

How, then, are you to achieve such a victory? There are three ways. First, the Bible says that we are to think of the old nature as dead. In one sense, of course, this is not true, for the old nature is still with us, as I have indicated. Yet in another sense it is true; for God tells us that he has broken its power at the cross of Christ and therefore considers it a dead issue in the life of the Christian. On this basis Paul writes in his letter to the Romans: "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 6:11). He exhorts the Colossians: "Put to death, therefore, whatever belongs to your earthly nature: sexual immorality, impurity, lust, evil desires and greed, which is idolatry. Because of these, the wrath of God is coming" (Col. 3:5-6).

When we are tempted to sin we are to pray, "Lord, I know that my old, fleshly nature has been crucified with Christ so that its power to overcome me is broken. I ask you to keep it broken and give me the victory." God will do this if we ask him.

Second, the Bible tells us that we are to feed the new nature while starving the old. This is what Peter meant when he wrote to the Christians of his day, "Therefore, rid yourselves of all malice and all deceit, hypocrisy, envy, and slander of every kind. Like newborn babies, crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation" (1 Peter 2:1-2). It is as though the old nature were a lion capable of tearing our Christian life in pieces. God says that he has placed the lion within a cage where he is dead so far as any overt activity in the believer's life is concerned. What then are we to do? Are we to feed the old nature with the world's way of thinking and acting so that the lion within grows stronger and can eventually break out of his cage? Of course not! We are to starve the fleshly nature and indulge the spirit. This can be done only through Bible study. It is only through a knowledge of God's truth that the Christian can become strong.

Finally, the Bible tells us that we are to "live by the Spirit," for then we "will not gratify the desires of the sinful nature" (Gal. 5:16). What does it mean to walk in the Spirit? It is primarily a matter of our inmost determination. God tells us that for a Christian, he has restored that will toward spiritual things that was lost in the fall. Then, let us use it. Let us place ourselves in circles where the life of the Spirit may grow. Let us read the Bible. Let us pray. Let us make Christian decisions. When we do this, we will find ourselves increasingly victorious, and the fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, patience, gentleness, goodness, faithfulness, kindness, selfcontrol—will grow in us.

Chapter 34.
The Breath of God

John 3:7-8

We come now to a third reference to the Holy Spirit. There has already been a reference to the him in 3:5, where Jesus told Nicodemus that the new birth takes place "of water and the Spirit." This means that spiritual life is generated whenever the Spirit implants the seed of God's Word within the human heart. Another reference occurred in verse 6: "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit." In discussing this verse we spent most of our time on the meaning of the word "flesh," asking how the Christian's fleshly nature is to be overcome.

The next verses deal almost entirely with the Spirit, so we need to focus exclusively on him in this study. To explain it, we must consider who the Spirit is, what is said about his activity, and finally what this should mean to us personally.

The Meaning of Spirit

In the first place, we need to define the word "spirit." Because of the nature of the English language, we suffer in our day from an unfortunate confusion over the words "ghost" and "spirit," which we constantly use in the phrases "the Holy Ghost" or "the Holy Spirit." The confusion arises from the fact that English, unlike most of the European languages, is a fusion of two language groups, one Germanic in origin and the other Latinate. Before 1066, the year William the Norman conquered England, the language spoken in England was Anglo-Saxon. It existed in a variety of dialects, but all were Germanic in origin. Consequently, although there were various pronunciations of a word, generally speaking the same word was used for any given object. An ox was an ox, a brother was a brother, and so on. After the Norman Conquest a whole new vocabulary entered England because the Normans, who were now the ruling class, spoke French. Now there were two words for most objects. As the languages fused to give us English, in many cases both words were preserved. Thus, we still have the Anglo-Saxon word "ox," but we also have the word "beef," which is based on a French word, boeuf, originally identical to "ox" in meaning. In the same way, "brother" is Germanic in origin—the word is Bruder—but we also have the words "fraternize," "fraternal," and "fraternity," which are based on the equivalent French term frère.

This doubling of words has also taken place for many biblical or theological terms. It is true of the words "saint" and "holy," for example. These words are identical in their root meanings. Thus, if you should go to Germany today and pick up a German Bible, you would find the words Die heilige Schrift on the cover, while within you would find the Gospels of Holy Matthew, Holy Mark, Holy Luke, and Holy John. The French call their Bible La Sainte Bible, and their Gospels are by Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, Saint Luke, and Saint John. We have kept the word "Saint" for the authors but not for the Bible, and the word "Holy" for the Bible but not for the authors. Yet the two words are essentially identical.

It is precisely the same with the words "spirit" and "ghost," in spite of the fact that these two words have taken on distinct colorings of their own as the result of nine hundred years of English usage. Today we use the word "ghost" to refer to the spirit of a dead person supposedly returning to haunt a place or a living human being. Hamlet used the word in this way when he referred to his father's ghost. Nevertheless, this is not the sense in which the word "ghost" is used in the phrase "the Holy Ghost." In this case "ghost" is identical with the word "spirit." Actually, it is because of the tendency in our day to identify the word "ghost" with the spirits of the dead that many ministers, including myself, abandon the phrase "the Holy Ghost" entirely and instead use the phrase "the Holy Spirit," except when singing the doxology or reciting the Apostles' Creed.

God's Breath

If the words "spirit" and "ghost" are identical, and if they do not refer to the returning spirits of the dead, then what do the words mean? This question leads us to consider the root meaning of the word "spirit."

What is the Spirit? Quite obviously, the basic reference is to the Third Person of the Trinity, to God, and on the human level to that part of man that has God-consciousness. Beyond this, however, we find that the word has some fascinating and stimulating overtones. In the Latin language from which we get our word "spirit," the word is spiritus, which means "breath." We recognize this truth every time we use one of the English words derived from it. For instance, in English the word spiritus has given us the words "aspire," "conspire," "inspire," "perspire," and "expire." They all refer to different ways of using one's breath. When men aspire, they take a deep breath and try harder. When men conspire, they put their heads together and breathe in and out with one another. A man is inspired when another man (or God) blows some of his breath into him. A person perspires by breathing out through the skin. When we expire, we breathe out for the last time; we die.

At this point we can see why Jesus referred to the wind in trying to teach Nicodemus about the Holy Spirit, for the wind is quite evidently an excellent symbol of God's breath. Jesus referred to it to teach that God allows his breath to go where he wishes and to produce effects of his choosing.

In the Greek language, the language in which the New Testament is written, the corresponding word is pneuma. It too refers to breath. This word is harder for English-speaking people to pronounce than the Latin word spiritus because of the initial two consonants, pn. So we do not have so many words based on it. Yet, we still have the words "pneumatic" and "pneumonia." The first word refers to any tool that is air operated, as a pneumatic drill. The second word refers to a disease of the breath box or lungs.

Finally, just as the Latin and Greek words for "spirit" all refer to breath, wind, or air, so also does the Hebrew word. This word is ruach, which you cannot even say properly without exhaling. Ruach! It is the sound of a breath. When we understand this we have some sense of the poetry of the opening verses of the Bible in which the creative Spirit of God blows over the water like a troubling wind. No one English version can capture both ideas—wind and spirit—but the New English Bible at least suggests the idea of the wind, with a reference to God's Spirit preserved in a footnote. The New English Bible declares: "In the beginning of creation, when God made heaven and earth, the earth was without form and void, with darkness over the face of the abyss, and a mighty wind that swept over the surface of the waters" (Gen. 1:1-2).

Our Gracious God

What happens when we take this basic sense of the word "spirit" and apply it to our text? Quite simply it means that a person can be born again only as the result of God's breathing new life into him. What is more, it is teaching us that this never happens merely at man's volition but solely according to the good pleasure of God.

So it has been throughout all history. Take the case of Abraham. He was the man through whom God established the Jewish nation and from whose descendants Jesus was born. Was he a follower of God before God called him? Not according to Scripture. Joshua, in a spiritual charge to the people of Israel shortly before his death, wants them to remain true to Jehovah, so he begins by reminding them of their pagan past as that out of which their gracious God has brought them: "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'Long ago your forefathers, including Terah the father of Abraham and Nahor, lived beyond the River and worshiped other gods. But I took your father Abraham from the land beyond the River and led him throughout Canaan and gave him many descendants. I gave him Isaac. ...Now fear the LORD and serve him with all faithfulness. Throw away the gods your forefathers worshiped beyond the River and in Egypt, and serve the LORD" (Josh. 24:2-3, 14). According to these verses, Abraham had been a worshiper of idols like all the people about him. Thus, the movement of God's Spirit in calling him was a movement of pure grace.

We pass over the years to the time of Jesus Christ, and once again the unexpected occurs. A Jewish person who believed in Jesus might have felt that with the coming of the Messiah the culmination of God's blessing had occurred. Here is the fulfillment of Israel's hope! Here he is! But God, who knows all things and orders all things for his own purposes, ordered them in such a way that Jesus would not be received by Israel generally and that instead the doors of salvation would be opened to the Gentiles. Who would have thought that God was going to call to himself millions from the nations of the Gentiles? No one. Yet the Spirit of God moved, and the result was a new revelation of God's grace.

One more example will bring this aspect of the Spirit's moving down to our own time. For years now the impact of the organized churches in America has been declining. Here and there are significant exceptions, particularly in those churches where the gospel is still preached and full authority is given to God's Word. But, by and large, membership is down and attendance is decreasing. Seventy-five percent of all Americans feel that religion is losing its influence in this country, as opposed to 14 percent who held that opinion in 1957, and this is true in spite of large expenditures of money and unprecedented efforts to revive organizational Christianity. However, just as many are beginning to say that the trend is irreversible and some are even calling it beneficial, God breathes upon America and thousands of the so-called "hippies" or "street people" begin to turn to him.

The following case history epitomizes it all. Many will remember the late Episcopal Bishop James Pike, who rose to national fame through his controversial opinions and frequent denials of church doctrines. He began as a lawyer, was ordained a bishop in 1958, then together with the man who was then Stated Clerk of the United Presbyterian Church, Eugene Carson Blake, launched the proposal for a gigantic merger of Protestant denominations (later known as the Consultation on Church Union). Unfortunately, Pike's ecclesiastical rise was accompanied with an increasing decline of his commitment to biblical doctrines, which embarrassed the Episcopal church and led to several charges of heresy, although there were no heresy trials. On the personal level, there were numerous tragedies. He had a drinking problem, which led to his joining Alcoholics Anonymous. He had three marriages, the first being annulled, the second ending in divorce after producing four children. One son committed suicide. After he died, Pike claimed he contacted him through a Philadelphia medium named Arthur Ford. Pike left the church and finally died in the Judean desert in 1969 while researching a book on the historical Jesus, which he had reportedly told friends would be the most sensational of his writings yet.

This is a most tragic story and one that to me at least seems to epitomize all the weaknesses of organizational Christianity. One can read it and think, "If there was ever a place where God could never be expected to work it would be with James Pike and his family." Yet one of the leaders of the Jesus movement in the 70s was Christopher Pike, another of James Pike's sons.

His story is told by Edward E. Plowman in The Jesus Movement in America. In his early youth Christopher Pike was a troubled youngster. When he was fifteen a friend introduced him to marijuana. A year later, in 1967, the year in which his mother and father were divorced and his father began to experiment with psychic phenomena, another friend gave him LSD. He turned to yoga. At times he felt that he was confronting an evil force that wanted his soul.

One day, on a visit to the University of California campus at Berkeley, Christopher Pike heard converted hippie Ted Wise testify to Christ from the steps of Sproul Hall. This set Chris wondering. In 1970, in his rooming house at Berkeley, he began to read the New Testament. Here he found what his father with his critical approach to the Bible had apparently missed. He found a real Jesus. Chris felt drawn toward him. In time he got down on his knees and poured out all the loneliness, frustration, and disappointment that had been packed up inside him for years, and he received Jesus as his Savior.

What was it that changed Abraham from a worshiper of idols with no knowledge at all of the true God and that got him moving out across the desert to a country he had never seen before? Why did he fix his eyes on "the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10)? What was it that captivated the attention of the Gentiles who were the numerical strength of the growing Christian church and that brought new life to them and their communities? What was it that reached Christopher Pike, lifting him out of the despair of his past life and present lifestyle to a fresh, transforming encounter with Jesus Christ? What is it that reaches, stirs, convicts, regenerates and changes men and women today?

It is not the eloquence of human reasoning, though God uses faithful, reasoned presentations of Bible truth? It is not evangelistic techniques or impressive testimonies or miraculous signs and wonders. It is the breath of the living God, the Holy Spirit, who speaks through the Scriptures to create new life in spiritually dead people. It is what has saved you, if you are a follower of Jesus Christ. The Spirit "moves wherever [he] pleases," and God alone must have credit for it all.

Chapter 35.
Christ Speaks to Skeptics

John 3:9-13

Almost everyone knows the difference between a believer and a skeptic, but I am not sure that everyone knows the difference between an honest skeptic and a dishonest skeptic. An honest skeptic is one who may have doubts about certain truths or doctrines but who will face up to them when he is presented with evidence; and he will alter his life as a result. A dishonest skeptic is one who has doubts about truths or doctrines but who will not face up to the evidence. Thus, when he is blasted out of one foxhole of disbelief, he will immediately take refuge in a second. If he is blasted out of that foxhole, he will begin to look around for a third.

Unfortunately, I am afraid that there are aspects to the conversation between Nicodemus and Jesus, recorded in the third chapter of John, to make us suspect that Nicodemus was a dishonest skeptic, like many people today. He had come with real problems. There was much in Christ's teaching that he genuinely could not understand. Yet Jesus seemed to end his conversation with him, not by stressing those things that were beyond the rabbi's knowledge but by faulting him for not believing in those things that were within it. "How can this be?" Nicodemus asked. "You are Israel's teacher," said Jesus, "and do you not understand these things? I tell you the truth, we speak of what we know, and we testify to what we have seen, but still you people do not accept our testimony. I have spoken to you of earthly things and you do not believe; how then will you believe if I speak of heavenly things? No one has ever gone into heaven except the one who came from heaven—the Son of Man" (John 3:9-13).

Apparently Nicodemus had been refusing to accept that which he could know and was rebuked by Christ for that refusal.

A Difficult Text

If we are to understand these verses, we must first make some effort to determine precisely what they are saying. This is true of all Scripture, of course, but it is particularly necessary in this case simply because so few who read these verses have any real awareness of their meaning.

Isn't it true that most people, perhaps yourself included, have always understood these verses to be referring merely to the fact of the new birth? In one sense, of course, they do refer to it (as I shall show later). But most people take them as referring merely to the fact of the new birth itself and therefore see Christ as rebuking Nicodemus for failing to know about the new birth and about the roles of the Holy Spirit and the Scripture in producing it in men. At the same time, I am convinced that most of those who think this way about the passage are also just a bit puzzled about certain elements in it that do not seem to fit this picture.

For instance, it can hardly escape our notice that in verse 11 Jesus stops speaking in the singular voice and begins to speak in the plural. He says, "We speak of what we know, and we testify to what we have seen, but still you people do not accept our testimony." If this is a testimony about the new birth, who are the others with whom Jesus associates himself? Could the "we" be the Trinity? This is not characteristic of Jesus' speech or of the language of the fourth Gospel. Could the "we" be the Old Testament prophets, culminating in John the Baptist? Could it be the disciples? These explanations are possible. Actually, I believe they are correct. But still we must wonder why Jesus would include a reference to the prophets or to the disciples in the context of his own very distinct teaching about regeneration.

Another problem that this passage raises concerns the contrast between "earthly things" and "heavenly things." Nicodemus seems to be chided for his failure to believe in things that pertain to the earth; but if this is a reference to the new birth, it seems highly inappropriate, particularly since Jesus has been stressing that the new birth originates with God in heaven. I must admit that none of these problems is insurmountable; the problems are just great enough to make the careful student of the chapter unhappy with the traditional explanations of Christ's teaching.

Is there a better explanation? I believe that the best explanation, and the true solution, lies in the realization that in these verses Jesus was not speaking about the new birth itself but about the results of the new birth and that he was chastising Nicodemus, not for his failure to understand about the new birth (who can understand it?) but for his failure to believe in it on the basis of its observable effects. In other words, Christ's words refer to the verse immediately preceding—the verse that says, "The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit" (v. 8)—and not to the earlier parts of the discourse. In this case, the "earthly things" refer to those results of the new birth that can be observed by anyone through earthly senses. "Heavenly things" refers to that which can be known only through revelation; for example, the nature of the new birth itself, and the atonement, which is mentioned immediately afterward. The "we" refers to all who have observed these things and are thereby convinced of the power of God to change lives.

If I were to paraphrase this passage, then, I believe I would do it something like this:
"Nicodemus answered Jesus, saying, 'I have never observed the new birth. I can't believe it is possible.' Jesus answered, 'Do you mean to tell me that you have risen to the point of being a teacher in Israel and yet have never observed the transformed life of a person who has been touched by my Spirit? I am telling you the truth when I say that all of us are speaking about things that we know personally and are testifying to things that we have often observed in others. You don't believe us. If I have testified to transformations in others that can be observed and you do not believe, how could you believe if I were to tell you about things that can be known only by revelation?'"

Changed Lives

Quite obviously this is a text that has two applications, one to those like Nicodemus, who are not yet Christians, and the other to those who are. Let us take the application to non-Christians first. Perhaps you are one who has not yet believed. You say there is much in the Christian gospel that you cannot understand. I agree with you; there is much that I also cannot understand. You say that most of what you do understand seems contradictory to everything that you have thought previously. I am not surprised. For God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are his ways our ways (Isa. 55:8). You say that you cannot be sure of the Bible. That may be quite honest, for not all persons have been exposed to the overwhelming evidence of its inspiration and total reliability. These may be partially valid, even adequate excuses. But have you never faced the evidence of the power of the gospel to transform the lives of Christians?

Let me dramatize this question by a story from the life of Harry A. Ironside, a story that he tells in Random Reminiscences. Early in his ministry the great evangelist and Bible teacher was living in the area of San Francisco Bay, working with a group of believers called "Brethren." One Sunday as he was walking through the city, he came upon a group of Salvation Army workers who were holding a meeting on the corner of Market and Grant Avenues. There were probably sixty of them. When they recognized Dr. Ironside, they immediately asked him if he would not like to give his testimony. He did, giving a word about how God had saved him through faith in the bodily death and literal resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ.

As he was speaking Ironside noticed that on the edge of the crowd there was a well-dressed man who had taken a card from his pocket and had written something on it. As Ironside finished his talk this man came forward, lifted his hat, and very politely handed him the card. On one side was his name, which Ironside immediately recognized. The man was one of the early socialists who had made a name for himself lecturing, not only for socialism but also against Christianity. As Ironside turned the card over, he read, "Sir, I challenge you to debate with me the question, 'Agnosticism versus Christianity' in the Academy of Science Hall next Sunday afternoon at four o'clock. I will pay all expenses."

Ironside reread the card aloud and then replied somewhat like this. "I am very much interested in this challenge. Frankly, I am already scheduled for another meeting next Lord's Day afternoon at three o'clock, but I think it will be possible for me to get through with that in time to reach the Academy of Science Hall by four, or if necessary I could arrange to have another speaker substitute for me at the meeting already advertised. Therefore I will be glad to agree to this debate on the following conditions; namely, that in order to prove that Mr._____has something worth fighting for and worth debating about, he will promise to bring with him to the hall next Sunday two people, whose qualifications I will give in a moment, as proof that agnosticism is of real value in changing human lives and building true character.

"First, he must promise to bring with him one man who was for years what we commonly call a 'down-and-outer.' I am not particular as to the exact nature of the sins that had wrecked his life and made him an outcast from society—whether a drunkard, or a criminal of some kind, or a victim of his sensual appetite—but a man who for years was under the power of evil habits from which he could not deliver himself, but who on some occasion entered one of Mr._____'s meetings and heard his glorification of agnosticism and his denunciations of the Bible and Christianity, and whose heart and mind as he listened to such an address were so deeply stirred that he went away from that meeting saying, 'Hence-forth, I too am an agnostic!' and as a result of imbibing that particular philosophy found that a new power had come into his life. The sins he once loved, he now hates, and righteousness and goodness are now the ideals of his life. He is entirely a new man, a credit to himself and an asset to society—all because he is an agnostic.

"Secondly, I would like Mr._____to promise to bring with him one woman—and I think he may have more difficulty in finding the woman than the man—who was once a poor, wrecked, characterless outcast, the slave of evil passions, and the victim of man's corrupt living ... perhaps one who had lived for years in some evil resort, ...utterly lost, ruined, and wretched because of her life of sin. But this woman also entered a hall where Mr. _____was loudly proclaiming his agnosticism and ridiculing the message of the Holy Scriptures. As she listened, hope was born in her heart, and she said, 'This is just what I need to deliver me from the slavery of sin!' She followed the teaching and became an intelligent agnostic or infidel. As a result her whole being revolted against the degradation of the life she had been living. She fled from the den of iniquity where she had been held captive so long; and today, rehabilitated, she has won her way back to an honored position in society and is living a clean, virtuous, happy life—all because she is an agnostic.

"Now," he said addressing the gentleman who had presented him with his card and the challenge,
"if you will promise to bring these two people with you as examples of what agnosticism can do, I will promise to meet you at the Hall at the hour appointed next Sunday, and I will bring with me at the very least 100 men and women who for years lived in just such sinful degradation as I have tried to depict, but who have been gloriously saved through believing the gospel which you ridicule. I will have these men and women with me on the platform as witnesses to the miraculous saving power of Jesus Christ and as present-day proof of the truth of the Bible."

Ironside then turned to the Salvation Army captain, a girl, and said, "Captain, have you any who could go with me to such a meeting?"

She exclaimed with enthusiasm, "We can give you forty at least just from this one corps, and we will give you a brass band to lead the procession!"

"Fine. Now, Mr._____, I will have no difficulty in picking up sixty others from the various missions, gospel halls, and evangelical churches of the city; and if you will promise faithfully to bring two such exhibits as I have described, I will come marching in at the head of such a procession, with the band playing 'Onward, Christian Soldiers,' and I will be ready for the debate."

Apparently the man who had made the challenge must have had some sense of humor, for he smiled wryly and waved his hand in a deprecating kind of way as if to say, "Nothing doing!" and then edged out of the crowd while the bystanders clapped for Dr. Ironside and the others.

Christ changes lives. He has done this down through the centuries; he is continuing to do so in our century, in our time. I can give examples from my own experience. There are examples from my own congregation. If you are not a Christian, can you honestly say that you have never observed any examples of the genuine transformation that can come about in a person as a result of his hearing and responding to the Christian gospel? I doubt it. Therefore, if you are not yet a Christian, I invite you to face the reality of these things and yield your life to the One who is also able to make you a new creature through Christ Jesus.

Are You Changed?

I said earlier that there are two applications of these important verses from John 3. One application is to non-Christians, as I have shown. The second application is to Christians. Are you a Christian? What about your life? Unfortunately it is possible for a Christian to live a life that is so much like the life of the world that he will never be able on the basis of his life to point anyone to the Lord Jesus Christ as the Savior. Does that describe you? Ask yourself, "Has my life been changed? Can I point to anything that will hold up as tangible evidence for myself and others of the power of God through Jesus to transform my thinking and my lifestyle?"

I know that there are different causes for unbelief among the unsaved. It is quite often sin, for sin keeps a person from God. Sometimes it is a false sense of priorities. Still it is often true that persons are kept from Christ by a low standard of living among those who are called by his name. Your life should be different. It should reflect the reality of Christ's life within you.

Chapter 36.
The Serpent in the Wilderness

John 3:14-15

There are many things that separate true Christianity from the other religions of this world, but the most important is that Christianity is not a "works" religion. All the other religions or systems of religion known to us through history or through anthropology have at their base some system of good works by which the follower of the religion earns merit. Christianity insists, on the contrary, that we cannot earn anything, that all that could possibly be done has already been done for us by the Lord Jesus Christ and that salvation is therefore entered, not by doing anything but by receiving God's gift. Even the Christian life grows out of that initial and complete accomplishment by the Lord Jesus.

This truth is taught many places in Scripture. Paul wrote, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9). To Titus he wrote, "He saved us not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (Titus 3:5). It is not surprising, therefore, as we come to the end of Christ's words to Nicodemus about the new birth, to find another clear and forceful statement of this principle. Nicodemus had not understood about the new birth. He had not even been willing to acknowledge its effects in the lives of God's children. Christ had chided him for that. Nevertheless, Jesus apparently seemed unwilling to terminate the conversation without pointing in some fashion to the basis of the salvation he was to bring. He therefore spoke of his death and the necessity for belief in himself by saying, "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up, that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life" (vv. 14-15).

This is the first instance in John's Gospel in which Jesus picked up an incident or practice of the Old Testament as foreshadowing some aspect of his earthly work.

Serpents of Death

If we are to understand what Jesus was saying, we need to go back to the strange story in the Old Testament to which he was referring. The story is told in Numbers 21:4-9.

The people of Israel had been traveling in the desert under the leadership of Moses, and they had recently traveled from the neighborhood of Mount Hor near the Red Sea to the borders of Edom. This is the area of the Near East in which Petra is located; it is some of the most inhospitable territory on earth, as I found out during a visit to Edom in 1961. The Bible tells us that "the people became impatient on the way" (Num. 21:4). As a result of their difficulties the people began to murmur against God and Moses, as they had done many times before, claiming that they had been led into the wilderness to die there and complaining of God's treatment of them. Because of these complaints God sent fiery serpents among them. These bit the people, and many of the people died. The people came to Moses asking him to intercede between them and the Lord. When Moses did this, God commanded him to make a serpent out of bronze and to erect it on a pole in the midst of the Israelite camp. The heart of the story lies in God's promise that everyone who had been bitten by the fiery serpents needed only to look to the brazen serpent on the pole to be cured.

It goes almost without saying that in itself the remedy proposed by God and enacted faithfully by Moses was absurd. In our day especially, with our knowledge of illness and of the cures effected by the various drugs and antibiotics available to us, we are aware that there was not the least bit of therapeutic value in the bronze serpent. At the best it could have been a warning to avoid the serpents. In such a situation we only begin to understand the story when we see it as a way of pointing the people's faith back to God. We only understand it fully when we see it as intended to prefigure the raising up of the Lord Jesus Christ on the cross, by which sacrifice we are saved from sin.

Not of Works

The force of the story lies not merely in the obvious parallel to Christ's death, as I have stated it, but in the implied comparison between what God commanded the people to do and all other methods that might have been imagined by the people to have had some value.

Think what those methods might have been. First, the people might have imagined that they could have made some medicines to offset the poison. Donald Grey Barnhouse, in God's Remedy, has written well on this passage. "The brewing of potions and the making of salves would have given them all something to do and would have satisfied every natural instinct of the heart to work on behalf of its own cure. [But] there was nothing of the kind mentioned. They were to cease from human remedies and turn to a divine remedy. The fact that they were not told to make a human remedy is indicative of the greater fact that there is no human remedy for sin. Men have been bitten by the serpent of sin. How are they going to be cured of its bite? There is nothing but death awaiting them as a result of their wound unless God Himself shall furnish a remedy. Men rush around in the fury of human religions seeking a palliative for sin. They perform all sorts of rites, chastising the flesh, humbling the spirit. They undertake fasts and pilgrimages. Like the man in Israel's camp who refused to look at the brazen serpent, but spent his time brewing concoctions for ameliorating his own conditions, they are carried off to spiritual death through the poison that is in their being. The man who trusts in religion instead of looking to Christ will be eternally lost."

In the second place, the people who had been bitten by the serpents were not encouraged to follow any path of self-reformation. We might imagine them acknowledging to themselves that they had certainly gotten into a bad area of the country and had been exceptionally foolish in giving the serpents an opportunity to bite them. "Henceforth," they might have said, "we shall be more careful. We shall see that this will never happen again." Quite obviously, even if they had been able to do this there would still have been no cure. For the poison was in them, and those who had been bitten, died.

There is a verse in the Book of Ecclesiastes that tells us "God will call the past to account" (Eccl. 3:15). This means that even if you were to turn over a new leaf today and hereafter live in a way that was totally acceptable to God—which is, however, impossible—God would still be forced to require full payment for those violations of his law that you committed before your reformation.

You yourself think that way, you know. Suppose for a minute that you operate a small store. You have a customer who has not been paying his bill for some months and who comes to you saying, "Mr. So-and-So, I realize that I have been making a very grave mistake in the way I have been dealing with you. I have been buying on credit, and I have fallen quite head over heels in debt. I am reforming. Henceforth, I am going to pay cash for everything I buy."

You are very glad to hear that, of course, and you say so. "I am very glad to hear that you are turning over a new leaf. When will you be able to make full payment on your old bill?"

"Oh, you don't understand," your customer answers. "I am going to pay cash from now on.
Certainly you won't hold that old unpaid account against me? I am turning over a new leaf."

If that happened to you, no doubt you would reply and be correct in saying, "I am sorry, but I am unable to do business that way. If you pay your account, I shall be glad to continue doing business with you. But if you do not, there can be no sales. Business requires me to demand that which is past." In the same way, God requires what is past. So no one will ever be cured from the effects of sin's poison by any form of moral reformation.

In the third place, the people who were dying in the desert were not told to band together and fight the deadly serpents. Barnhouse again writes: "If the incident had been met after the fashion of our day, there would have been a rush to incorporate the Society for the Extermination of the Fiery Serpents, popularly known as SEFS; and there would have been badges for the coat lapel, cards for district workers, secretaries for organization branches, pledge cards, and mass rallies. There would have been a publication office and a weekly journal to tell of the progress of the work. There would have been photographs of heaps of serpents that had been killed by the faithful workers. The fact that the serpents had already infected their victims would have been played down, and the membership lists would have been pushed to the utmost.

"Let us accompany one of the zealous workers as he might take a pledge card into the tent of a stricken victim. The man had been bitten and the poison had already affected his limbs. He lies in feverish agony [for the phrase "fiery serpents" refers to the effects produced in the ones bitten, not in the color of the snakes], the glaze of death already coming to his eyes. The zealous member of the Society for the Extermination of Fiery Serpents tells him of all that has been done to combat the serpents, and urges the man to join—as a life member if possible (fee $10,000), a sustaining member (fee $1,000), contributing member (fee $25), or annual member (anything the organizer can get). The dying victim fumbles in his pocketbook for money and then takes a pen in hand. His fingers are held by the worker who helps him form his signature on the pledge and membership card, and the man signs in full —and dies."

There are some who will think this fanciful and even a possible slander on worthwhile social work projects, but I am convinced that this is an accurate picture of much that passes for socalled humanitarian endeavors. I am not against works of social welfare. Today's great social work programs sprang from Christian principles and in many cases were launched by committed believers. Nevertheless, the point of the parallel stands. Sin is not cured by social organization. By all means let us mop the fevered brow. Let us comfort the stricken patient. But let us also recognize that the cure of sin's sting lies only in the death of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the promises of God that accompany it.

Fourth, the people who had been bitten by the deadly serpents were not told to pray to the serpent on the pole. You must not misunderstand me here. Prayer is a good thing, but prayer is for believers only. Man cannot pray for his own salvation. Christ died for sinners. This salvation is to be believed. The Bible says, "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:9-10).

Finally, the people who had been bitten were not commanded to buy some relic of the serpent or possess some fragment of the pole upon which the serpent of bronze had been erected. The notion that salvation can come by relics is perhaps the most absurd and totally pagan idea ever associated with Christianity, and yet today there are millions who believe that they can come closer to heaven by adoring a piece of the cross or the bones of a saint. History should illuminate such folly. During the Middle Ages, those who traveled to the Holy Land were asked to bring back souvenirs of Christianity, just as a visitor to Europe or the Far East might be asked to bring back souvenirs today. The Arabs, who were good businessmen, quickly supplied the demand and did so well that it is said that the Middle Ages possessed enough particles of the true cross to build several cathedrals. Unfortunately the possession of such relics eventually gave way to worship and to the belief that a person could be saved by touching or possessing them.

It is interesting to note that the same thing happened with the bronze serpent erected by Moses until God had Hezekiah step in to destroy it. Someone apparently preserved the serpent, and it remained in Israel for hundreds of years, gaining more and more worshipers. At last, when he became king, Hezekiah "broke into pieces the bronze snake Moses had made, for up to that time the Israelites had been burning incense to it. (It was called Nehushtan.)" (2 Kings 18:4). The last word, as Barnhouse observes, is a sneer; for it might be translated correctly as "merely a piece of brass." Thus does God speak of the supposed virtues of the relics of a ritualistic religion: piece of bone ... dirty linen ... rusty metal ... stinking candles.

Resting on Christ

By this time, of course, you will have understood that the only thing required of the dying Israelites was that they should have believed God's word about the serpent and have looked to it as he commanded them. In the same way, we are to look to Christ's cross. We have been bitten by sin, as they were bitten. We are dying of sin, as they were dying. God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin that we might believe on him and not perish.

What does it mean to believe? Many years ago now, when John G. Paton first went out as a pioneer missionary to the New Hebrides islands, he found that the natives among whom he began to work had no way of writing their language. He began to learn it and in time began to work on a translation of the Bible for them. Soon he discovered that they had no word for "faith." This was serious, of course, for a person can hardly translate the Bible without it. One day he went on a hunt with one of the natives. They shot a large deer in the course of the hunt, and tying its legs together and supporting it on a pole, laboriously trekked back down the mountain path to Paton's home near the seashore. As they reached the veranda both men threw the deer down, and the native immediately flopped into one of the deck chairs that stood on the porch, exclaiming, "My, it is good to stretch yourself out here and rest." Paton immediately jumped to his feet and recorded the phrase. In his final translation of the New Testament this was the word used to convey the idea of trust, faith, and belief.

"Stretch yourself out on the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved" (Acts 16:31). "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whosoever stretches himself out on him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16). "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of man must be lifted up, that everyone who stretches himself out on him may have eternal life" (John 3:14, 15). Have you done that? Will you do it? If you will do it, turning away from any faith in yourself, your own good works, religion, your efforts at self-reformation, your prayers and relics, looking to the cross of Christ on which God dealt with sin and on the basis of which he promises new life to the sinner, then God will heal you. This is the heart of Christianity. God has provided salvation for you in Jesus Christ. Say, "I believe that, Lord. I trust the work of Jesus Christ for my salvation."

Chapter 37.
The Love of God

John 3:16

There are many passages in the Bible that have been chosen by some great person or other as a favorite text. John Wesley often said that his favorite verse was Zechariah 3:2: "Is not this man a burning stick snatched from the fire?" David Livingstone preferred the last words of Matthew 28:20: "Surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age." John Newton said that his favorite verse was Romans 5:20: "But where sin increased, grace increased all the more." Luther had Romans

1:17 as his life text: "The righteous will live by faith." Each of these verses has spoken to some man in his own particular condition and has become for him the greatest text in the Bible. But the verse we come to now is everyone's text. There is hardly a place in the world to which the gospel of Jesus Christ has gone that this verse has not become almost instantly known. It is the first verse that translators put into another language. Millions of people have been taught to recite it. It is inscribed on books and buildings. It is reflected in songs. John 3:16! "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life." This great verse with its emphasis upon God's love and the gift of his love in Jesus Christ is stupendous.

In the early 1960s, the great Swiss theologian Karl Barth was in this country for a series of lectures, speaking in Chicago and in Princeton, New Jersey. There were discussion periods occasionally, connected with these addresses, and at one of the discussion periods an American asked a typically American question: "Dr. Barth, what is the greatest thought that has ever passed through your mind?" Barth paused for quite a long time as he obviously thought about his answer. Then he raised his head and said with grace and childlike simplicity:

Jesus loves me! This I know, For the Bible tells me so.

This is a truth that Christians in all ages have acknowledged, and the more that they have discovered the person of Jesus Christ in the Bible, the more they have realized it.

I want to look at God's love in this study, our first study of John 3:16, and I want to begin by reviewing some of the verses that speak about it.

A Great Love

The first verses are Ephesians 2:4-5. These are verses in which the apostle Paul speaks of God's love, saying, "But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved." These verses tell us that God's love is great.

In preparation for this study I began to think about the term "great" in ways that I had never done before, and I came to the conclusion that we have lessened the force of what God means by the way we use the word. During the week before I wrote this chapter, I had attended a "Current Events Week" at a Christian school. While there I said that some of the points made by the speakers were "great." After the meetings were over I told the president of the school that I felt that the points made would have a "great" effect on the students in the weeks and months ahead. Later in the week I attended a Young Life banquet in Philadelphia, and I said in that context that the evening was "great," that the speakers were "great," that the program of Young Life was "great." I used the term honestly. Yet none of these things even begins to measure up to what the Bible means when it says that the love of God is great. God is the master of the understatement. Consequently, when he tells us that his love is great, he is telling us that it is so great that it goes beyond our own ideas of greatness or our own understanding.

John 3:16 was the verse through which D. L. Moody learned to appreciate the greatness of God's love. Moody had been to Britain in the early days of his ministry and there had met a young English preacher named Henry Moorhouse. One day Moorhouse said to Moody, "I am thinking of going to America."

"Well," said Moody, "if you should ever get to Chicago, come down to my church and I will give you a chance to preach."

Moody did not mean to be hypocritical when he said this, of course. He was merely being polite. Nevertheless, he was saying to himself that he hoped Moorhouse would not come, for Moody had not heard him preach and had no idea of what he would say should he come to Chicago. Sometime later, after Moody had returned home, the evangelist received a telegram that said, "Have just arrived in New York. Will be in Chicago on Sunday. Moorhouse." Moody was perplexed about what he should do, and to complicate matters he was just about to leave for a series of meetings elsewhere. "Oh, my," he thought, "here I am about to be gone on Sunday, Moorhouse is coming, and I have promised to let him preach." Finally he said to his wife and to the leaders of the church, "I think that I should let him preach once. So let him preach once; then if the people enjoy him, put him on again."

Moody was gone for a week. When he returned he said to his wife, "How did the young preacher do?"

"Oh, he is a better preacher than you are," his wife said. "He is telling sinners that God loves them."

"That is not right," said Moody. "God does not love sinners."

"Well," she said, "you go and hear him."

"What?" said Moody. "Do you mean to tell me that he is still preaching?"

"Yes, he has been preaching all week, and he has only had one verse for a text. It is John 3:16."

Moody went to the meeting. Moorhouse got up and began by saying, "I have been hunting for a text all week, and I have not been able to find a better text than John 3:16. So I think we will just talk about it once more." He did. Afterward Moody said it was on that night that he first clearly understood the greatness of God's love.

Infinite Love

The Bible not only says that the love of God is great; it also says that it is infinite. This is what Paul means when he writes in the third chapter of Ephesians that his prayer for Christians is that they "may have power, together with all the saints, to grasp how wide and long and high and deep is the love of Christ, and to know this love that surpasses knowledge—that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God" (Eph. 3:18-19). How can we comprehend the infinite love of God? We can know it, but only in part. We have been touched by his love and bathed in part of it; yet the fullness of such love lies forever beyond us as the vastness of the universe lies beyond the finite, probing eye of man. God's love is boundless and unfathomable.

One of our seldom sung hymns puts this aspect of God's love in memorable language. It was written by Frederick M. Lehman; but the final stanza was added to the song afterward, when it was found written on the wall of a room of an asylum by a man who, before he died, had obviously come to know the immeasurable extent of God's love.

> The love of God is greater far
> Than tongue or pen can ever tell,
> It goes beyond the highest star And reaches to the lowest hell.
> The guilty pair, bowed down with care, God gave His Son to win:
> His erring child He reconciled, And pardoned from his sin.
> Could we with ink the ocean fill
> And were the skies of parchment made;
> Were every stalk on earth a quill
> And every man a scribe by trade,
> To write the love of God above Would drain the ocean dry,
> Nor could the scroll contain the whole Though stretched from sky to sky.
> Chorus
> O love of God, how rich and pure!
> How measureless and strong!
> It shall for evermore endure—
> The saints' and angels' song.

This is our song, if we have come to know in part that great and immeasurable love of God toward us through Christ Jesus.

A Love That Gives

Third, God not only tells us that his love is great and is infinite, he also tells us that his love is a giving love. This is the heart of John 3:16. How much does God love you? God loves you so much "that he gave his one and only Son."

We are going to be considering the gift of God in the next study, but we do not want to miss even here the great lesson there is in that statement. Once in the early days of my ministry, when I was still working in Washington, D.C., I became interested in the subject of God's love and discovered as I studied the Bible that there is hardly a verse in the New Testament, in speaking of God's love, that does not also speak in the immediate context (and sometimes within a space of a few words) of the cross. How do we know that God loves us? Because we are able to love one another a little bit? Because the world is beautiful? Because we value love? Not at all! We know that God loves us because he has given us his only-begotten, his unique, Son. It is in the face of the selfless, self-sacrificing Jesus Christ that we learn of God's character.

God loves you! Do you know that? God loves you! He has demonstrated that love for you in Jesus Christ!

Unchangeable Love

Finally, God not only tells us that his love is great, infinite, and giving; he also tells us that his love is unchangeable. This is perhaps the most wonderful aspect of all. The heart of the matter is that God loves in such a way that nothing you or I have done or will ever do will alter it.

This is a point made by one of the greatest stories in the Bible, the story of Hosea and his unfaithful wife, Gomer. Hosea was a preacher. One day the Lord came to him and said, "Hosea, I want you to marry a woman who is going to prove unfaithful to you. You are going to love her, but she is going to turn from your love. Nevertheless, the more faithless she becomes, the more faithful and loving you will be. I want you to do this because I want to give Israel an illustration of how I love them. Your marriage will be a pageant. You will play God. The woman will play the part of Israel. For I love Israel with an unchangeable love, and she runs from me and takes other gods for lovers."

Hosea did as God had told him to do. So the Book of Hosea tells us, "When the LORD began to speak through Hosea, the LORD said to him, 'Go, take to yourself an adulterous wife and children of unfaithfulness, because the land is guilty of the vilest adultery in departing from the LORD.' So he married Gomer daughter of Diblaim, and she conceived and bore him a son" (Hosea 1:2-3).

At this point of the story God intervened, for he had said that he was going to order each stage of the relationship between Hosea and Gomer. God intervened to give a name to this son. "Call his name Jezreel," God said. Jezreel means "scattered," for God was going to scatter the people of Israel all over the face of the earth. After a time Gomer conceived again and bore a daughter. "Call her Lo-Ruhamah," God said. Lo-Ruhamah means "not pitied." God was saying that the time would come when he would "no longer show love to the house of Israel" (v. 6). Finally, another son was born and Hosea was told to call him Lo-Ammi. Lo-Ammi means "not my people." "For," said God, "you are not my people, and I am not your God."

If the story stopped at this point the ending would be exceedingly dismal, and the pageant would be illustrating the opposite of the unchangeable love of God. But it does not stop here, and God intervenes again to tell how the story will end. "I am going to change the names of those children one day," God promised. "I am going to change Jezreel to Jezreel." It is the same word but with a second meaning, a change from "scattered" to "planted," because in the ancient world the same gesture by which a man would throw something away was that by which he would plant grain. God was promising to plant the people once again in their own land, as he has done in our own generation. "Moreover," said God, "I am going to change Lo-Ruhamah to Ruhamah and LoAmmi to Ammi because the time is coming when I will again have pity upon those who will have again become my children." The Bible says, "Yet the Israelites will be like the sand on the seashore, which cannot be measured or counted. In the place where it was said to them, 'You are not my people,' they will be called 'sons of the living God'" (v. 10).

The time came in the marriage when the events that God had foretold happened. Gomer looked around and caught the eye of a stranger.

Before long she had left with him, and Hosea was alone.

The life of a woman like that goes downhill. For if she had left Hosea for the company of a man who could give her a Cadillac and a fur coat this year, it is equally certain that the year following, when the first lover had grown tired of her, she would be found with a man who could only give her a fur-lined collar and an Oldsmobile. The year after that she would be in fake fur and a Volkswagen, and the year after that she would be pulling something out of the garbage heap. So it was with Hosea's wife. The time came when she was living with a man who did not have the means to take care of her, and she was hungry.

"Now," said God to Hosea, "I want you to go and see that she gets the things she needs, because I take care of the people of Israel even when they are running away from me." Hosea went and bought the groceries. He gave them to the man who was living with his wife, but he said that Gomer did not even know he had bought them. The story tells us, "Their mother has been unfaithful and has conceived them in disgrace. She said, 'I will go after my lovers, who give me my food and my water, my wool and my linen, my oil and my drink.' ...She has not acknowledged that I was the one who gave her the grain, the new wine and oil, who lavished on her the silver and gold" (Hosea. 2:5, 8).

Does God love like that? Yes, he does! Have you ever run away from God? Of course, you have! What happened? God paid your bills! If you have been running away from God, do you realize that it is God who gives you the strength to run? Here is a girl who says, "I don't care if God is calling me into Christian work. I'm going to turn away and marry this young man." God says, "Who gave you the good looks that made the young man interested?" Another person says, "I want to be famous." So he goes to New York and writes a book that later becomes a movie. He makes lots of money. But God says, "Who gave you the talent to write the book in the first place? Did not I, the Lord?" You cannot run away from God's love successfully. You can run, but God pursues you. He steps before you and says, "My child, I am the One who has been providing for you all this time. Won't you stop running and allow me to take you to myself?"

The final act of the drama was approaching. The time came when Gomer sank so low that she was sold as a slave in the city of Jerusalem, and God told Hosea to go and buy her. Slaves were always sold naked. Thus, when a beautiful girl was on sale, the men bid freely and the bidding always went high. Here was Gomer. Her clothes were taken off. The bidding began. One man bid three pieces of silver. Another said five ... ten ... twelve ... thirteen. The low bidders had dropped out when Hosea said, "Fifteen pieces of silver." A voice from the back of the crowd said, "Fifteen pieces of silver and a bushel of barley." "Fifteen pieces of silver and a bushel and a half of barley," said Hosea. The auctioneer looked around for a higher bid. Seeing none he declared, "This slave is sold to Hosea for fifteen pieces of silver and a bushel and a half of barley." So Hosea took his wife (whom he now owned), put her clothes on her, and led her away into the anonymity of the crowd.

You say, "Is that a true picture of God's love?" Yes, it is! That is how God loves you. Listen to what the Bible says about it: "The LORD said to me, 'Go, show your love to your wife again, though she is loved by another and is an adulteress. Love her as the LORD loves the Israelites, though they turn to other gods and love the sacred raisin cakes.' So I bought her for fifteen shekels of silver and about a homer and a lethek of barley. Then I told her, 'You are to live with me many days; you must not be a prostitute or be intimate with any man, and I will live with you'" (Hosea 3:1-3).

Oh, the greatness of the unchangeable love of almighty God! God loves you and me like that! We are the slave sold under the bondage of sin. We are the one placed upon the world's auction block. The bidding of the world goes higher and higher. "What am I bid for this person's soul?" At this point Jesus Christ, the faithful bridegroom, enters the slave market of sin and bids the price of his blood. "Sold to Jesus Christ for the price of his blood," says Almighty God. So he bought you. He clothed you in his righteousness. And he led you away with himself, saying, "You are to live with me many days; you must not be a prostitute or be intimate with any man, and I will live with you."

God's Love, Our Pattern

You say "What does that have to do with me?" It has everything to do with you. Are you one who has never known that love, never realized that Jesus Christ loved you like that, that he still loves you? To be touched with such love is to throw yourself at his feet in adoration and marvel that you could ever have violated such a great and unalterable compassion. The Bible tells us that God "commends" such great love toward us (Rom. 5:8). Won't you allow the hardness of your heart to melt before God's love and allow Jesus Christ to be your great Savior and bridegroom?

Perhaps you are one who has already done that. You have believed in Christ, but the reality of that love has become distant for you and you have never fully realized that the love of Christ is to become the pattern of your love. He is to be your model. You need to ask whether your love has been great, whether it has the character of that love which is infinite, whether it is a giving love, whether it is unchangeable. Ask it now. Does your love change when the person whom you love does not respond quickly? Or does it hold firm? Do you continue to love when your wife, husband, child, or friend does not seem to see things the way you do and contradicts you? Do you love as Christ loves? You are called to show forth that love; for as others see it they will be drawn to the Lord Jesus.

Chapter 38.
God's Greatest Gift

John 3:16

It is commonplace in our day to say that God loves men. But many who say this fail to recognize that we know this is so only because of Jesus Christ. How do we know that God loves us? Not because of creation certainly, for the evidence of creation is ambiguous. There are tidal waves and hurricanes as well as gorgeous sunsets. Not because we tend to value love, for not all of us do. Not because love is "wonderful" or "grand" or because it "makes the world go round." We know that God loves us because he has given his Son to be crucified for us and thereby to bring us back into fellowship with himself. Thus, if the love of God is one of God's greatest attributes (as we saw in our last study), the gift of Christ is most certainly his greatest gift. For it is through Christ that we come to know God's love and love God.

Sometime ago I came across a little card upon which someone had printed John 3:16. The verse was arranged almost word by word down one side of the card, and on the other side of the card across from the words of the verse was a list of descriptive phrases, one for each part. The person looking at the card would read: "God (the greatest Lover) so loved (the greatest degree) the world (the greatest company), that he gave (the greatest act) his only begotten Son (the greatest gift), that whosoever (the greatest opportunity) believeth (the greatest simplicity) in him (the greatest attraction) should not perish (the greatest promise), but (the greatest difference) have (the greatest certainty) everlasting life (the greatest possession)." And then over it all, revealing a spiritual perception that was most accurate, there was the title "Christ—the Greatest Gift."

Have you ever come to appreciate God's greatest gift to you, the gift of the Lord Jesus Christ? We are going to look at some of the reasons why he is a great gift and why you should believe on him.

God So Loved

The first reason why Jesus Christ is the greatest of God's gifts is that Jesus is the best God had to give. God so loved the world that he gave the very best.

This truth is seen in several ways in John 3:16. First, it is obvious from the word "onlybegotten," which is used of Jesus. To our way of thinking, this word (it is one word in Greek) refers mainly to physical generation, but it means more than that in the original language. A great deal of theological controversy in the church was once caused by those who took it as simply physical generation; they argued that since the Bible says Jesus was the "only-begotten" Son, there must have been a time before he came into being. In other words, he did not exist from eternity but rather was the first being God created. This was foolish, of course, because the Bible does not teach this and the word does not have this meaning primarily. Primarily the word means "unique." Jesus is the unique Son of God; there is no one like him, no one who is his equal. Therefore, because Jesus Christ is the very image of God and because there is no one like him, when God gave Jesus, he gave the best gift in the universe.

God also gave the best in another sense. For Jesus Christ is not at all a creature made in the image of God, as man is; he is God incarnate. Consequently, when God gave Jesus he gave himself. To give oneself is the greatest gift anyone can give. Sometime ago I read a story of a minister who was talking to a married couple who were having marital difficulties. There was much hardness and bitterness, coupled with a lack of understanding. At one point the husband spoke up in obvious exasperation. "I've given you everything," he said to the wife. "I've given you a new home. I've given you a new fur coat. I've given you a new car. I've given you..." The list went on. But when he had ended the wife said quietly. "That much is true, John. You have given me everything ... but yourself."

We hear that story and we recognize the truth of the principle: the greatest gift that anyone can give is himself. Then we look at Jesus, who is God incarnate, and we recognize that God gave the very best—himself—for us.

An Eternal Plan

The second reason why Jesus Christ is God's greatest gift is that Jesus was a gift planned from before the foundation of the world. God had always intended to give Jesus. This is why so many of the verses in the Bible speak of God having put Jesus to death. Isaiah 53:10 speaks of the crucifixion eight centuries before it took place, saying, "Yet it was the LORD'S will to crush him and cause him to suffer." Peter knew this truth. On the day of Pentecost he spoke of Jesus who "was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:23). For the same reason the Book of Revelation speaks of Jesus as "the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world" (Rev. 13:8).

We must not think that the entrance of sin into the world through Adam and Eve was an event that somehow caught God by surprise or that it caused God to begin to ponder what he should do to correct it. God knew all from the beginning. Consequently, before he even set the universe in motion, before he created us, he had determined to send Jesus Christ to die for the salvation of our race.

Perhaps the greatest declaration of this principle lies in a poignant story from the life of Abraham, the story of the call of God to Abraham to offer up his son Isaac on Mount Moriah. It is told in the twenty-second chapter of Genesis. I believe that Jesus was referring to this event when he told the Jews of his day, "Your father Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad" (John 8:56), and that through it Abraham learned that God was to give Jesus Christ to be our Savior.

To see the story in its proper perspective we must begin with the fact that Abraham was an old man by our standards when God came to him to ask him to offer up Isaac. He had been eighty six years old when his first son, Ishmael, had been born to Hagar, Sarah's slave girl. He was one hundred years old when Sarah at last gave birth to Isaac. Now Isaac had become a young man, perhaps fifteen years of age or more, and Abraham was more than one hundred fifteen. Moreover, Abraham had loved his son from birth, as any father would, and he now loved him deeply with a love that had grown stronger over the years in which he had seen him grow to young manhood. He loved him doubly, not only because he was the son of his old age, the result of a miracle, but also because he was the son of promise.

At this point God came to Abraham again—as he had many times before—and said to him, "Abraham."

"Yes, Lord."

"I am going to ask you to do something."

"Yes, Lord."

"I want you to take Isaac, the son of promise, the one through whom you are going to have a great posterity and through whom I am going to send the Messiah—I want you to take this Isaac to a mountain that I will show you and there offer him for a burnt offering. I want you to kill him."

I do not know the extent of the trial this must have been to Abraham's faith or how much of the night he wrestled with this great problem. But whatever the struggle was, and however deep, it was all over by the following morning, for the Abraham that emerged in the morning was an Abraham committed to obedience. The story says, "Early the next morning Abraham got up and saddled his donkey. He took with him two of his servants and his son Isaac. When he had cut enough wood for the burnt offering, he set out for the place God had told him about" (Gen. 22:3).

There are many lessons in this story, of course, but there is one in particular that we should see before we go on. On one level at least, the test of Abraham was a test of his devotion to God. Was God going to be everything to Abraham? Or was something else, even God's gift, going to share and cloud that vision? It was Abraham's triumph that he did not put the gifts before the Giver.

Isaac can stand for many things that have become quite precious to you. The Chinese evangelist Watchman Nee once wrote, "He represents many gifts of God's grace. Before God gives them, our hands are empty. Afterwards they are full. Sometimes God reaches out his hands to take ours in fellowship. Then we need an empty hand to put into his. But when we have received his gifts and are nursing them to ourselves, our hands are full, and when God puts out his hand we have no empty hand for him." When that happens we need to let go of the gift and take hold of God himself. Nee adds, "Isaac can be done without, but God is eternal."

God Will Provide

Yes, the testing of Abraham was certainly a test of his devotion to God, but it was something else also. It was a spiritual test or, as we could also say, a test of his spiritual perception.

Think of the things Abraham had learned in the years before Isaac's birth. He had been tempted to think that God would not keep his promises and that a household servant would be his legal heir. God had taught him that the blessing would not come through the household servant. Abraham had once wanted to substitute Ishmael, the son of Hagar, for Isaac—before Isaac was born. But God had told him that the blessing would not come through the son of the Egyptian slave girl. God had shown Abraham through a miracle that the blessing was to come through Isaac, and now God had asked Abraham to kill him.

We must imagine the reasoning that passed through the mind of Abraham in the dark hours of that desert evening. He must have said something like this: "I know that Isaac is the son of God's promise, and God has shown me time and again that he will not send the blessing through another. Yet, this same God tells me to sacrifice him, to put him to death. How can this be? If I put him to death, as God has demanded, how can God fulfill his promise? How can God do it?" The puzzle was real. But then, as Abraham wrestled with this supreme test of God's logic, it must have come to him that the God who performed a miracle in bringing about Isaac's birth was also capable of working a miracle to bring him back from the dead. This was the solution he discovered during the long desert night. Thus, as Abraham started for the mountain in the morning he must have been saying mentally to Isaac, "Come on, boy, we are going to see a miracle. God has asked me to sacrifice you on Mount Moriah. But if God is going to be faithful to his promise, he is going to have to raise you up again from the dead. We are going to see a resurrection."

Someone may think that I have merely made up this part of the story, but this is the way it happened. The proof of it occurs in at least two parts of the Bible. The first is in the story itself. Abraham had come to the foot of the mountain with the boy, and he was ready to go on without the young men who were with him. As he takes the kindling and he and Isaac prepare to climb the mountain, Abraham says to the others: "Stay here with the donkey while I and the boy go over there. We will worship and then we will come back to you" (Gen. 22:5). Think of that: we will come back to you. Who would come? Abraham and Isaac! What does that mean? It means that although Abraham believed that he was going to offer the sacrifice, he also believed that God was going to perform a resurrection and that he would be able to come back down the mountain with his boy.

The second proof is Hebrews 11:17-19, which is the full New Testament commentary on the incident. "By faith Abraham, when God tested him, offered Isaac as a sacrifice. He who had received the promises was about to sacrifice his one and only son, even though God had said to him, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead, and figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death." That means that Abraham looked for a resurrection.

Thus far the story has already been great in itself, but the point I wish to make is the point that is found in the sequel. Abraham did go up the mountain, as God had commanded him, and there bound Isaac to the altar. He raised his hand ready to plunge a knife into his son. He would have killed him. But just as the knife was ready to fall, God intervened. God provided a substitute, a ram caught in the bushes. And he said (in effect), "Abraham, you don't need to sacrifice your son. I never intended that you should go through with it. I only wanted to test your willingness to obey me and to show you in this way what I will do one day for your salvation and for the salvation of all who will believe in my Son, the Messiah." This, I believe, was the moment in which Abraham saw the day of Jesus Christ and, seeing it, was made glad.

God revealed his ways to Abraham. The Bible says, "Surely the Sovereign Lord does nothing without revealing his plan to his servants the prophets" (Amos 3:7). So the time came when the events God had planned from before creation and had revealed to Abraham two thousand years beforehand took place. Abraham was only called upon to offer his son. But when the time came for God to offer his Son, the hand that was poised above Christ fell. God put his Son to death, and God's greatest gift had been given.

The Need of Man

The third reason why Jesus Christ is the greatest of God's gifts to fallen man is that he is perfectly suited to the needs of fallen man. Nothing else is! What are the needs of man? What are your needs?

Your first need is for a sure word from God, for knowledge of God. Jesus is the answer to that need, for it is Jesus alone who brings us the knowledge of who God is, what he is like, and what he desires for mankind. This is why Jesus is called the Word so many times in John's writings. Do you want to know what God is like? If so, do not spend your time reading the books of men. Do not think that you will find out by meditating. Look to Jesus Christ. Where will you find him? You will find him in the pages of the Bible. There you will find the strength, mercy, wisdom, and compassion that are the essence of God's character.

Your second great need is for a Savior. We do not merely have a need for sure knowledge. We have knowledge of many things, but we are unable to live up to our knowledge. We are sinners. Consequently, we not only need a sure word from God, we need a Savior. Jesus is the Savior. He died to save you from sin and from yourself. Do you know him as Savior?

Finally, we have those needs that are part and parcel of living a finite sinful life. What are those needs? One way of looking at them is the way popularized by the American psychiatrist Erich Fromm. Fromm suggests that man is confronted with three existential dilemmas. The first is the dilemma of life versus death. We want to live, but we all die. Jesus is the answer to that problem, for he gives eternal life to all who believe on him. Jesus said, "I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in me will live, even though he dies; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die" (John 11:25, 26). The second of Fromm's dilemmas is the dilemma of the individual and the group. Jesus is the answer to that problem too, for he has come to break down all walls and to make of his followers one new man which is his mystical body (Eph. 2:14-16). The last of Fromm's dilemmas is that arising from the conflict between our aspirations and our actual achievements. We all fall short of what we would like to be and believe ourselves intended to be. Jesus is the answer to that problem also, for he promises to make us all that God created us to be in the first place. We are to be conformed to Christ's image (Rom. 8:29). One of our hymns looks forward to that day when our salvation shall be complete, and declares:

> Then we shall be where we would be,
> Then we shall be what we should be;
> Things that are not now, > nor could be, Soon shall > be our own.

The Lord Jesus Christ is the greatest gift that God has ever offered or could ever offer to the human race. Are you indifferent? Or do you respond to the offer, joining the millions of others who have believed in Christ with all their heart and mind and who now say, "Thanks be to God for his indescribable gift" (2 Cor. 9:15)?

Chapter 39.
To All Who Believe

John 3:16-17

Early in my ministry I talked to a young man about Christianity. He told me that he firmly believed he was a Christian. As we talked further, however, I discovered that although he believed he was a Christian, he did not believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ. For him Jesus was only a man. He did not believe in his atoning death or in the essential or complete reliability of the New Testament documents concerning him. He had not even read most of them. He did not believe in the resurrection of Christ. He did not acknowledge Christ as Lord of his life. I pointed out that all these matters are involved in a person's being a Christian, but he simply answered that in spite of what I said he still firmly believed in his heart he was a Christian. Such faith was merely acute subjectivity.

What is real faith? This question is important, for although in one sense the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ is as wide as humanity—the Bible tells us that "God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son"—on the other hand, it is also as narrow as the company of those who have faith in him, for the same verse goes on to tell us that only those who believe on Christ will be saved. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life"

(John 3:16). Faith is the indispensable channel of God's saving grace, according to these and many other verses. Consequently, our understanding of John 3:16 will be incomplete until we deal with the nature of saving faith and seek to apply the truths of this verse personally.

An attempt to deal with the true nature of faith is made necessary merely by the nature of Christianity, for we are told that "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6) and "by grace you have been saved, through faith" (Eph. 2:8). Besides this, however, the study is made particularly necessary for us simply because of the extraordinary emphasis upon faith in the fourth Gospel.

It is true, of course, that if one looks up the word "faith" in an English concordance he will not find the word listed under any book written by the apostle John, except for a single case in 1 John 5:4. But this is merely because John prefers the verb form of the same Greek word (pisteud rather than pistis), which is generally translated by the word "believe" in our English New Testament. "To believe" in someone and "to have faith" in someone are exactly the same thing. Consequently, it is only when one looks up the word "believe" that he finds out what John says about faith and notices John's particular emphasis. Actually, we have encountered the word "faith" or "believe" eight times in this Gospel already. It occurred three times in the first chapter and three times more in chapter two. In our present chapter it is used no less than seven times, twice already. All together there are ninety-eight uses of the word in the Gospel's twenty-one brief chapters. This compares with a combined usage of the words "faith" and "believe" just eighteen times in Mark and only fifty-five times in Romans.

With an emphasis such as this, we need to see precisely what faith is. Moreover, since the blessings of salvation are said to become ours only through faith, and since John claims that the Gospel was written to lead us to faith (John 20:30-31), we are wise to ask how we can exercise faith personally. How does faith operate to make this wonderful salvation mine?

The Nature of Faith

Unfortunately, there is much confusion about the meaning of faith in our day simply because we apply it to people, and people are untrustworthy. Every so often we read detailed reports of some negotiations between labor and management in which the partners are encouraged to work out their demands in good faith. This means that each side is to bargain honestly, believing that the other party is doing likewise. However, when the agreement is reached the first act is to draw up a detailed written agreement each of the parties must sign. Why? Obviously because, although each side wants to believe in the good faith of the other, each also knows that people are untrustworthy and must therefore be bound by written guarantees. The same recognition lies behind the formalities of the marriage ceremony, penalty clauses in building contracts, and many other things.

With this background to the use of the word, it is no wonder that faith has often taken on overtones of wishful thinking and then has been applied to God and to spiritual things with that meaning. The unsaved world thinks of faith as a "pie-in-the-sky" philosophy and prefers only what it can "see" or "hear" or can be assured of "now."

Similar thinking lies behind any definition of faith that tries to turn it into subjectivity. Actually, this view is probably the most common misunderstanding of faith in our own century due to the impact of existentialism in the church through such thinkers as Rudolph Bultmann, Paul Tillich, Bishop John A. T. Robinson, and others. In such formulations faith becomes merely that which I wish to hold and not something that is related to truth or evidence.

Against these distortions of the meaning of faith, because nothing about men is ever entirely reliable, the Christian must insist that biblical faith is of a different order entirely and that faith in the biblical sense, simply because it is faith in God, is reliable. That is why faith can be "sure of what we hope for and certain of what we do not see" for the Christian (Heb. 11:1). Some have used this verse in support of a "pie-in-the-sky" type of religion but, actually, it teaches the reverse. The word "substance" does not mean "substitute," as though faith were a substitute for evidence. It means "a title deed to a piece of property." That is what faith is. God tells us that although none of us has entered fully into the inheritance that is ours through faith, nevertheless, faith is our title to it. Faith is itself the evidence of things not yet fully seen.

I admit that if this were a human title deed, there would still be some room for doubt. In human terms there would still be the possibility that some office clerk could have mixed up the deeds or that he might have sent them to the wrong person. It would be possible for a deed to be issued when there was still a prior claim on the property or a lien against it. However, in dealing with God such errors are impossible. God is omnipotent and infallible. The infallible God gives the deed. The all-powerful God stands behind it. When God calls upon people to believe what he tells them he calls upon them to do the most sensible thing they will ever do in their lives; that is, believe in the only being in the universe who is entirely reliable. That is what John means in his first epistle when he writes: "We accept man's testimony, but God's testimony is greater" (1 John 5:9).

Faith's Content

What precisely does God call upon us to believe? The answer is that he tells us many things and expects us to believe them all. The Bible is full of them. However, if we want to simplify the matter of salvation to its most basic points we may say that God wants us to believe two things primarily and that he then calls upon us to do a third.

First of all, God asks us to believe that we are less perfect than he is and, therefore, deserve to be separated from his presence forever. Another way of saying the same thing is to say that we are sinners and that God must punish sin. The Bible says that this is precisely why we need a Savior. In fact, John 3:16 says it, for it speaks of the possibility of perishing. If we could somehow get by, if we could somehow rate with God either by being a little less sinful than we are now or by trying harder ("we're still number 2"), then there would be no need for a Savior. But this is not the case. We are sinful. God is perfect. Consequently, since God cannot tolerate sin, we must admit that we deserve to be separated from him.

Sometimes people object to this teaching because they think that it makes them the same as the worst criminals. In one sense, it does. Both equally need a Savior. Yet that confuses the point. The main point is that God is perfection. Thus, no matter how far short of his perfection we come, we still come short and, coming short, we miss it all.

Several years ago in America a bit of deadly botulism poison was found in a particular brand of vichyssoise soup. This is one of the most deadly poisons known to man, and one person at least died and another was paralyzed before the source of the poison was discovered and the contaminated soup destroyed. Let me ask this question: How much botulism poison was needed to make the soup unsuitable for human consumption? A whole canful? Of course not! Several milligrams? No! The smallest amount of poison would ruin the can. In the same way, God asks you to take his word that you are a sinner, whether small or great, and to believe that sin has ruined you.

The second truth that God asks you to believe is that he loves you in spite of your sin and that he has acted in Jesus Christ to remove that sin and to begin to make you perfect once more by conforming you to Christ's image. This is the heart of John 3:16 and 17. We are sinners. We deserve to perish. In fact, we are already under God's condemnation. But John tells us: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him." God loves you. Christ died for you. There may be much about this that you cannot now understand. There is much about it that I do not understand. But God wants you to believe that he did this in order that you might not perish but rather enter into his eternal life.

Do you believe these things? Do you believe that you are a sinner? Do you believe God when he tells you that you deserve to perish ultimately? Do you believe that God sent Jesus to die for you and by his death to bring you salvation? If you do, then he calls upon you to do something. He asks you to bring your faith out of the realm of mere intellectual conviction into the area of action, saying, "Yes, Lord, I do believe these things. Thank you for dying for me. I commit my life to you and promise to go in the way you lead me whatever that may involve." If you will make that commitment, God has already given you eternal life and has begun the transformation that will one day make you like the Lord Jesus Christ forever.

Strong in Faith

I do not want to leave the matter of faith there, important as the point may be. For we have only been talking about the initial moment of saving faith, when faith first seizes upon Jesus Christ as Savior. Faith does not stop there. When the Christian is called to faith in Jesus Christ, he is called to a life of living by faith, a life in which his belief in God is meant to grow stronger as he comes to know God better and to trust him more completely.

Someone is going to say, "But that is what scares me. I know that my faith is not strong, and I am afraid that if I begin to follow Jesus I will faint at some point and want to draw back. My faith is weak." Praise God that you recognize that! What you must learn, however, is that one of God's purposes in saving you is to make your faith strong, and for that he will continue to work with you and lead you in every aspect and moment of your earthly life.

Take the faith of Abraham as an example. Abraham is cited many times in the Bible as an illustration of a man who had great faith, but Abraham's faith did not begin great. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews gives us the progression of this faith as God sees it. Abraham is praised for his faith four times. The first verse on Abraham says, "By faith Abraham, when called to go to a place he would later receive as his inheritance, obeyed and went, even though he did not know where he was going" (v. 8). That was faith, but such faith did not need to be strong. It was only faith in God's ability to lead the Hebrew patriarch out of Mesopotamia and into Palestine.

Actually, the fact that Abraham's faith was weak at this point is dramatized by a very interesting detail from his story. When God came to Abraham in Ur of the Chaldees, Abraham was called upon to leave that place, journey up the Mesopotamian river valley, cross over the northern end of the great Arabian desert, and then travel down through the areas that are now modern-day Syria and Lebanon to what is now Israel. The entire journey measured over a thousand miles. Abraham began in the best of faith. Yet when we come to the end of the first chapter of his story, as told in Genesis (Genesis 11), we find that Abraham had stopped at Haran, a little town in Syria. Haran was a long way from Ur, it is true, but it was also a long way from Palestine. Unfortunately, Abraham stayed in Haran until his father died, and it took another call of God to him to get him moving again, this time when he was seventy-five years old. At this point in the story Abraham's faith was weak, but God's promises to him were not withdrawn because of it.

Abraham's faith was not allowed to rest at this initial level. The next verse of Hebrews 11 goes on to say: "By faith [Abraham] made his home in the promised land like a stranger in a foreign country; he lived in tents, as did Isaac and Jacob, who were heirs with him of the same promise" (v. 9). This level of faith was stronger, for it was faith exercised in the face of many dangers and difficulties. During these years, Abraham's faith grew remarkably.

In verse 11, the author of Hebrews goes on to speak of the faith that both Abraham and Sarah exercised in believing that God would give them a son when both were past the age of being able to have children. Here faith had become strong, for it was a faith based on the assurance that God was able to perform miracles. The fourth and final reference to Abraham's faith refers to that complete trust in God which he had when God asked him to offer up his son. This was a faith that led Abraham to believe that God was going to perform a resurrection. Hebrews says: "By faith Abraham, when God tested him, offered Isaac as a sacrifice. He who had received the promises was about to sacrifice his one and only son, even though God had said to him, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead, and figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death" (vv. 17-19).

I do not know where you are along this pathway of faith. Perhaps you are one who has not even taken the initial step of believing what God has to say about your sinful condition and about his offer of complete salvation through Jesus Christ. If so, this is where you should begin.

God says, "How can you believe in my ability to do miracles in your life, if you cannot even believe the truths that I have to teach about Jesus?"

Perhaps you have begun to walk by faith, but you have found difficulties. That is not strange. God sends storms as well as calm. The difficulties are intended to help you grow strong. Learn to trust him. The God of Abraham is the same today; he can help you as he helped the patriarchs.

Finally, you may be one whom God is asking to believe in miracles. I do not know what the particular miracle may be in your life. It may be a personality trait that God is promising to change. It may be a difficult situation at work or at home. It may involve finances. Whatever it is, you grow strong in faith by learning to trust him. In some of these experiences you may learn something about God's plans and nature that you would learn in no other way. What is your attitude? Doubtful? Rebellious? Do not let it be. Instead, say, "Yes, Lord, I believe all you are saying. Help me to believe and grow strong."

Chapter 40.
Condemned!

John 3:18-21

We come now to verses that are a necessary addition to the great and wonderful truths of John 3:16-17. Those verses tell us that "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him." When this is said, however, the question immediately arises, "Yes, but what of those who do not believe?" The verses to which we now come deal with that question, telling us that those who have not believed are even now under God's condemnation: "Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18).

Crime and Punishment

Most men and women do not like this teaching. Yet it is a fact that sin has consequences and that one of these is alienation from God and God's judgment.

On one level at least we recognize this in purely human affairs. Some years ago I developed an interest in Russian literature and began to read the great Russian novels. Among them were the works of Fyodor Dostoevsky. Most of Dostoevsky's novels are great by almost any standard, but the one that has remained uppermost in my mind over the years is Crime and Punishment. This is the story of a young student in Russia who commits a serious crime. His name is Raskolnikov. Raskolnikov is poor and needs money; therefore he murders an elderly pawnbroker who, he argues to himself, is of use to no one and whose life really doesn't matter. As the result of his crime Raskolnikov is launched upon what he thinks is going to be a prosperous life. Yet in the novel there is a relentless outworking of judgment for Raskolnikov's act. Punishment follows crime. The novel's point is that the young man stood condemned from the moment in which he performed the act.

Most who read the novel recognize the justice of its plot, but the far more serious fact is that the same principles apply spiritually. We must not think, if we are to take the witness of Scripture seriously, that when the gospel is preached to a man or woman the person involved is standing upon what we may call neutral ground. It is not that he can either choose his own way with a corresponding wrath and condemnation from God or that he can go God's way with its corresponding joy and blessing. According to Scripture, man has already made his choice. People have already chosen their own way. Thus, as Isaiah writes, "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:6). Paul declares, "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God" (Rom. 3:10-11; cf. Ps. 14:1-3).

We may not like it, but whether we like it or not, these things are true from God's perspective. We have gone our own way. We have already committed the crime. Therefore, every one of us already stands under God's judgment.

The Case for the Prosecution

At this point, however, we come to a second question. We have already asked, "But what of those who have not believed or will not believe?" We have seen that these are under God's wrath. But now we ask for what reasons. Why is man condemned in his present state? The answer to this question is really the case for the prosecution against man and leads us to the second half of the verse I read earlier and to those that follow it.

The first answer to why people are condemned is that they have "not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18). What is the name? The name is: Jesus. And what does "Jesus" mean? The answer to that question is to be found in the words of the angel to Joseph when the name was originally given to his parents before Jesus' birth. The angel said, "You are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). The first two letters of the name are the first two letters of the great Old Testament name for God, Jehovah. The remaining letters are from the word for "save" or "salvation." Thus, the whole name means "Jehovah saves" or "Jehovah will save." It follows then that when John says men are condemned because they have not believed on the name of the one and only Son of God, he means they are condemned because they will not have the Lord Jesus Christ as their Savior.

This is the hardest thing for people to do. If you have witnessed to other people about the gospel, you know that there is much in the gospel that they do not have trouble accepting. Most people do not have difficulty believing in the existence of God. The Bible recognizes this indirectly when it says that only fools deny it (Ps. 14:1; 53:1). Most people do not have difficulty accepting the fact of God's love or God's power. Many people will believe that the same God of Love, who created them, also has a purpose for their lives. If they are not cynical because of circumstances, many will even listen to you talk about Jesus Christ so long as you talk about him as a man who came to teach a high system of morality and to set an example for us to follow. However, if you talk about the Lord Jesus Christ as the Savior, as the One who died to save sinners, there you will find hostility and vigorous rejection.

I know of one young woman whose life is an illustration of this principle. She was a student at the University of Pennsylvania. While there she attended a series of Bible studies on the life of Christ. She agreed with many of the truths that were brought out. But when it came to the point at which Christ was held up as the Savior of a fallen, sinful race as the only way in which a man or a woman can come to God, this young woman rebelled. She said, "I can accept the rest, but I cannot accept this business about Jesus Christ. I will not admit my need of him to be my Savior."

The second reason given by John for God's condemnation of men who have not believed in Christ occurs in verse 19. He says, "Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil." This means that people are condemned not merely because they have not accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as their Savior—this could be attributed to a lack of understanding—but also because they actually prefer sin. The light has come, but they have turned from it. They have done so because their deeds are evil.

From the account of the reaction of the rulers of the Jewish people to Jesus during his lifetime, we can understand how this works. These men were the acknowledged high-achievers of the people before Christ's coming. The law had been given. They were the ones who supposedly had kept it. But when Jesus Christ came, he was so much better than they were that next to him their goodness looked tarnished, like Christmas tinsel does in February. So they hated him. The result was that they preferred to have him killed, removed from sight, rather than allow him to expose the corruption that was in their own hearts and cure them of it.

The condemnation is not merely that we fall short of God's standards of perfection. The condemnation is there because we do not even aim in the right direction. We do not really want God's goodness.

The following illustration will help to make this clear. Imagine a child who is learning to throw a ball. He is to throw it, and his father is to catch it. The child is given the ball. He throws it. But instead of the ball going directly to the father it goes off about thirty degrees to the right. The father says, "You'll have to do better than that; I can't be running after the ball all afternoon."

The child replies, "But you're too far away. Come in closer." So the father moves in about ten feet. The child throws again, and this time the ball goes off about thirty degrees to the left. "You're still too far away," the child says. The father comes closer, but once more the ball goes off at an angle. Finally, the father is standing right in front of the child; the child throws, but the ball goes in the other direction entirely. What is the trouble? The trouble is not entirely with the distance between the child and the father, although that is part of it. The problem is with the child's aim.

In the same way, the problem with sinners is not merely with the great distance between our own level of conduct and God's standards. The trouble is also that we do not go in the right direction even when we aim at those standards.

Finally, John lists one more reason for God's condemnation of the human race. It is because men hate the light. The light has come and men hate it. Does that describe you? Or are you one who is allowing God to draw you to the light that shines in the face of Jesus Christ?

There is an emphasis upon light in this passage. John mentions light five times. "Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil. Everyone who does evil hates the light, and will not come into the light for fear that his deeds will be exposed. But whoever lives by the truth comes into the light, so that it may be seen plainly that what he has done has been done through God." According to these verses, people do not like the light; instead, they prefer darkness. If you ever come to the point where you do love the light, it must be because God has already begun a new work in you.

Not Condemned

That leads to our final point. Condemned? Yes! But also not condemned. For the gospel is the good news that although you and I and all men are born under the judgment of God, it is never necessary for anyone to remain there. Today there is a way of escape. What has made the difference? Jesus! Jesus has died. He has taken your sin upon himself and borne its punishment. He was condemned in your place. Thus we can read, "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1).

Let me tell you of one young man who learned this. His name is David Hoyt; his story, like that of Christopher Pike (see the chapter on John 3:7-8), is told in Edward E. Plowman's book The Jesus Movement in America. David was a member of a hippie community in California when he met Kent Philpott, a Golden Gate Baptist Seminary student. David was already into one of the eastern religions, but through Kent's ministry he began to attend a series of Bible studies that met in the basement of the Krishna temple during the guru's absence. The studies spoke to him. He began to see himself as he really was. His own testimony is that while, on the one hand, it looked as though he were seeking the light through the mysticism of the eastern religions, actually he was preferring the darkness of his own soul to God's truth. Dissension among members of the temple bothered him. He could not seem to find inner peace. He prayed, asking God to show him the truth.

The next morning while everyone was at certain rites, the universal altar, which contained representations of the world's religions, caught fire in the basement. David and the others rushed down in time to salvage the only article that had escaped the flames—a Bible. David received it as an answer to his prayer. He opened it and stumbled upon the very passage we have been studying. There he saw his own heart. He was one who had been preferring the darkness to the light. He saw God's great love, a love that had sent Jesus Christ to bear his judgment. David said, "I was set free from an evil spirit that had kept me from the truth; I felt clean and whole for the first time in my life."

After that David Hoyt was used of God to reach many young people with the gospel.

Now Is the Time

Does the story of David Hoyt's conversion describe you? Have you believed in Jesus or are you still in the category of those who stand condemned? There are only two roads, two destinies. If you have not already put your trust in Jesus and in what he has done for you, will you do it today? Will you believe on him?

Someone says, "Well, I have been thinking about it." Thinking about it will not do. That great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon once wrote that if you continue to think about it, "you will think yourself into hell." "I am praying about it," says another. The Bible does not ask you to pray about it either. If you are not a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Bible calls upon you to believe on him. That is all. That is the only useful response. Immediate faith is what I, as a minister of the gospel, demand of you in the name of Jesus who died for you and rose again. Today God sends you this message, "The times of your ignorance I have winked at, but now I command all men everywhere to repent." I cannot promise you that if you refuse to believe you will ever have another chance to commit your life to Jesus. "Now is the accepted time," God says, "behold, now is the day of salvation."

During the early days of the ministry of Dwight L. Moody, the great evangelist launched a series of meetings in Chicago, with promise of the largest crowds that he had addressed up to that time. He was speaking on the life of Christ, and on the first Sunday night, October 8, 1871, he took as his topic the trial before Pilate. As he came to the end of his message he turned to Matthew 27:22, "What shall I do, then, with Jesus who is called" Christ?" He concluded, "I wish you would take this text home with you and turn it over in your minds during the week, and next Sabbath we will come to Calvary and the cross, and we will decide what to do with Jesus of Nazareth."

It may have been an artistic device. But speaking of it in later years, Moody called that conclusion to his morning's address the greatest mistake of his life. For even while Mr. Sankey was singing the final hymn—

Today the Savior calls; For refuge fly;
The storm of justice falls, And death is nigh—

the fire engines began to sound on the street on their way to their first contact with the great Chicago fire in which Moody's hall was laid in ashes and in which it is estimated that over a thousand persons lost their lives. Moody never saw that congregation again, and some of those he spoke to that night undoubtedly died in that fire.

Make no mistake. The gospel is not for another time, another age, a more convenient moment.

My business is not with tomorrows. Today is the day of God's grace. Look up and live! The Bible says, "Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18).

Chapter 41.
Last Words of a Humble Man

John 3:22-30

Humility is a virtue all men preach, none practice, and yet everybody is content to hear." So wrote an English jurist named John Selden, about the middle of the seventeenth century. These words are not universally true, of course, as we shall see in a moment, but they are true for many people and they characterize much of human nature. Although people praise humility, most persons think of themselves much as a character in the Gilbert and Sullivan comic opera Ruddigore, who said, "You've no idea what a poor opinion I have of myself ... and how little I deserve it."

We all recognize that humility is important and desirable. It is one of the great Christian virtues, the opposite of pride. But where does it come from if it is so difficult to attain? And does anyone, in fact, possess it? Part of the answer is to be found in the last words of John the Baptist recorded in John's Gospel, for John the Baptist was a very humble man.

John's Last Days

To understand the setting for these words, we must recognize the fact that the Baptist had achieved a great deal of popularity as the result of his preaching. Luke tells us that "multitudes" went out to hear John. Matthew tells us that people came to him from "Jerusalem and all Judea and the whole region of the Jordan" (Matt. 3:5). Apparently the multitudes included all segments of the population—Pharisees, Sadducees, tax collectors, soldiers, the rich, and the poor. John speaks of an official delegation from Jerusalem. We are told that on some occasions, John was praised as a reincarnation of either Elijah or another of the prophets.

In time John's popularity came to the palace of Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee. Herod called for John and listened to him preach. Mark tells us that at the beginning Herod heard John gladly and did many good things as the result of John's preaching (Mark 6:20). Unfortunately, Herod enjoyed John's preaching only so long as John preached in generalities. When he was specific enough to speak out against the fact that Herod was then living with his brother Philip's wife, Herodias, Herod's enthusiasm cooled.

John had said, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife." This so angered Herodias that eventually she succeeded in having John arrested and later killed.

At the time of which the author of the fourth Gospel is writing, however, John's imprisonment had not yet occurred, and John was still in the midst of his ministry. Yet another thing had happened. It turned out that the crowds around Jesus had begun to grow, and many who had been following John now detached themselves from him and began to follow Jesus. It seems that John's disciples were the ones most worried about it, for they did not like to see their teacher taking second place to anyone else.

Finally, in the context of a discussion about the proper procedure for the various Jewish rites of purification, someone expressed his concern. "Rabbi, that man who was with you on the other side of the Jordan—the one you testified about—well, he is baptizing, and everyone is going to him" (John 3:26). This was the same as saying, "John, your star is sinking. What shall we do?" It was an invitation to John to feel injured and neglected. To the disciples, John's witness to Jesus had been a very generous thing, and it was intolerable to think that Jesus should now be detracting from the Baptist's ministry. "Rebuke him," they were asking. "Say something to stop him." Instead John's reply is an immediate justification of Jesus' success. Instead of feeling sorry for himself, John actually rejoiced in the popularity of the newcomer.

God's Sovereignty

What did John say? The exact words are important, for they do not merely reveal the state of John's thinking about himself and Jesus' ministry, they also show us the necessary ingredients for achieving this same level of humility in our own lives.

First, John said, "A man can receive only what is given him from heaven" (v. 27). This was an awareness by John of God's sovereignty in all things. It was the first of several things that kept John humble. If the newcomer was attracting and winning more followers than John himself, this was not because he was stealing them away from John or acting dishonestly in presenting his claims. It was because God was giving them to Christ to be his followers.

I wonder if you have a proper sense of God's sovereignty in such matters? To have it will not mean that you are free to be lazy in your Christian life and then blame your lack of achievement on God. John did not do this, for we read that even after Jesus had begun his ministry John went right on preaching and baptizing (v. 23). He continued doing what God had given him to do. No, believing in the sovereignty of God does not mean that we can be lazy, but it does mean that whatever the results of our efforts, we will see God's hand in them and will not be jealous of another through whom God apparently achieves more.

Moreover, we will not be proud of our imagined spiritual insight or be jealous of another's understanding if we are aware that even this comes only from above. Jesus taught this in response to the unbelief of certain of the cities of his day in which great works were done. He said, "I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and learned, and revealed them to little children" (Matt. 11:25). To Peter he said, "Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, for this was not revealed to you by man, but by my Father in heaven" (Matt. 16:17). It is written of Lydia, a woman to whom Paul preached on his second missionary journey, "One of those listening was a woman named Lydia, a dealer in purple cloth from the city of Thyatira, who was a worshiper of God. The Lord opened her heart to respond to Paul's message" (Acts 16:14). Paul wrote, "For who makes you different from anyone else? What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you did not?" (1 Cor. 4:7).

To recognize that all spiritual insight and advance comes from God is to be freed from jealous efforts at comparison. It is to recognize that all Christ-centered and totally committed service, whatever the results, ranks equally with God. Any task done for God is necessarily a great work.

Self-Awareness

A second factor in John's humility was his own self-awareness. John knew who he was and what it was to which God had called him. He continues "You yourselves can testify that I said, 'I am not the Christ but am sent ahead of him'" (John 3:28).

Do you and I have the same self-awareness? If we do, it will mean that on one level at least we will recognize ourselves to be nothing. This is God's own appraisal of us as conveyed in Christ's famous sentence: "Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5). On the other hand, it will mean that when we do accept that statement we can go on to recognize the importance of what we are given to do by God. If a person will accept God's verdict, he can become something for God. If he rejects that verdict of nothingness, he is, of all men, the most nothing! If a man will believe what God says about him, he will admit to what he really is and will enter by faith into what he should be in Christ.

In the twelfth chapter of Romans the apostle Paul writes this about humility: "For by the grace given me I say to every one of you: Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought, but rather think of yourself with sober judgment, in accordance with the measure of faith God has given you" (v. 3). In this verse, although it is hidden in the English translation, one Greek word, phroneo, occurs four times. This word describes a man who is in his right mind. It is, for instance, the word that would have been used by a man making a will. He would have begun it by saying, "Being sane and in my right mind, I ... do hereby bequeath," and so on. The word is preserved in English in the words phrenetic, phrenitis, and phrenology, all of which have to do with the brain.

With that definition in mind let us now translate the verse, using the idea of sanity. "For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every Christian among you, do not indulge in an insane estimate of yourself, but rather be sane about it so that your estimate of yourself is sound." This John did when he fixed his mind on the fact that God had called him merely to be the forerunner of the Lord Jesus Christ and a witness to him.

Christ above All

The third factor in John's humility was that he had his eyes fixed on Christ. He was the friend of the bridegroom, John said (John 3:29). It was not his wedding. His function was to serve the groom. This too applies to all Christians. If we have our minds on other people, even a little bit, we will always find room for pride; for no matter how bad we are or how poorly we are doing, we will always be able to find someone who does things worse and be proud that we are better. On the other hand, if we have our eyes fixed on Jesus, we will have our attention riveted on one who is so infinitely above us that we will consider ourselves at best only his unprofitable servants.

Arthur W. Pink has expressed it in this way: "Humility is not the product of direct cultivation, rather it is a by-product. The more I try to be humble, the less shall I attain unto humility. But if I am truly occupied with that One who was 'meek and lowly in heart,' if I am constantly beholding His glory in the mirror of God's Word, then shall I be 'changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord' (2 Cor. 3:18)."

I wonder if we do that? Do we live our lives looking unto Jesus, caring what he thinks and not worried about the critical judgments of those of this world? Or are we constantly thrown off balance by the world and its values?

One summer when I was just a boy, I took a trip to California with my family. It was one of the Eternity magazine tours, and there was a great crowd of people along, including Donald Grey Barnhouse. One day a number of us went to Monterey where there was an amusement park. In one building we saw a very large barrel, about seven or eight feet in diameter and about thirty or forty feet long. It lay on its side and revolved, the challenge being to walk through it without being upset.

For some reason this was a particular challenge to Donald Barnhouse, so he started through it. Unfortunately, he was only into the barrel about two or three yards when his feet got higher than his center of gravity and down he went. The first thing everyone knew was that he was rolling around on the bottom. The man who ran the amusement stopped the barrel from turning, and Barnhouse came out. He said, "Start it up. I'm going to do it again."

The man who controlled the barrel said, "Wait a minute. First, you should know that there is a secret for walking through the barrel. Do you see that mirror at the other end?"

Barnhouse said, "Yes."

"What do you see in the mirror?"

"I see you," answered Barnhouse.

"That's right," the man replied. "You see me. Now this time when you walk through the barrel forget about the fact that it is turning. Don't even look at the barrel. Instead look at me in the mirror. That way you will have a true sense of the vertical, and you will be able to adjust the speed of your steps to keep from falling." This time, when the barrel was started, Barnhouse walked through it triumphantly.

The secret of walking through the barrel was to keep one's eyes on the man who runs it. It is the same spiritually. Who is it who runs the affairs of this life with all its ups and downs, all its crises, joys, and disappointments? The answer is: God! Who has it all under control? God! How, then, is the Christian to walk through this life without losing his balance spiritually? The answer is: By keeping his eyes upon God! Moreover, we can extend the illustration to point out that in this life we do not even see God directly but are permitted to see him as he is reflected in the pages of his written Word. The Bible is a mirror that shows us God. "Now we see but a poor reflection as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face" (1 Cor. 13:12).

Joy for Others

Finally, there were two more factors in John's life that kept John humble before God. They are the fourth and fifth reasons for his humility. The fourth is that John found joy in leading others to Jesus. This is implied in the bride and bridegroom imagery, for it was the function of the friend of the bridegroom to conduct the bride to the man she was about to marry. John said, "This is my joy."

Do you know that joy? Some persons think that there is great joy in material possessions, but things in themselves do not satisfy. Others think that there is joy in worldly fame, achievement, or pleasure, but these goals are relatively unrewarding. They satisfy at best for a short time. Real joy comes in being able to say to Jesus Christ, "Here I am, Lord, use me," and then finding that out of his grace he is able to use you to bring others into a saving relationship to himself.

He Must Increase

The final factor in John's humility was his knowledge of the fact that whatever might happen in this world, whatever glory the world might or might not give him, the ultimate outcome would be increase of the glory given to Jesus Christ and the bowing of every human knee before him. "He must become greater; I must become less," said John in conclusion.

Do you know that truth? When William Carey, one of the great pioneer missionaries to India, lay dying he turned to a friend and said, "When I am gone, don't talk about William Carey; talk about William Carey's Savior. I desire that Christ alone might be magnified."

I know as I teach these things that some will be thinking: "Oh, but if I am humble, doesn't that mean that I will never be able to achieve anything in this world? Won't I become a Caspar Milquetoast type of person? Won't I be stepped on constantly?" No! You misunderstand humility if you think that is the result of it. Actually, to humble oneself before God in this way gives one great boldness before men. The Bible tells us that Moses was the meekest man who ever lived (Num. 12:3). Yet the man who had humbled himself before God, who had taken off his shoes before the burning bush, was the same man who was able to march into the court of the most powerful monarch of his day, the ruler of Egypt, and thunder out God's warning: "Thus says the Lord GOD of Israel, Let my people go."

And so can we! The story is told of John Knox, the great Scottish reformer, that one day, as he was approaching the court of Bloody Mary in his office of chaplain to her majesty, he was warned to postpone the visit since she was in one of her angriest moods and might be dangerous. Knox continued on his way, replying, "Why should I be afraid of a queen when I have just spent four hours on my knees before God?" Here was genuine humility. Knox had bowed so low before God that he did not fear to stand high before an earthly monarch.

Chapter 42.
The Bride and the Bridegroom

John 3:29

These words are intended to illuminate John the Baptist's important role in the great drama of salvation. He is the shoshben who, according to Jewish custom, arranged the marriage ceremonies and conducted the bride to her husband. Even more importantly, however, they also teach us about Jesus Christ in the role of the bridegroom and about what believers in Christ have become because of their engagement to him.

In the annals of the Persian kings there is a story about the wife of one of the generals of Cyrus, the king mentioned in Isaiah who ruled several hundred years before the birth of Christ. The wife, the story says, was charged with treason and after a trial was condemned to die. At first her husband did not realize what had taken place, but he was told about it and at once went bursting into the throne room. He threw himself on the floor before the king and cried, "Oh, Lord, take my life instead of hers. Let me die in her place." Cyrus, who by all historical accounts was a humane and fairly sensitive man, was touched by this offer. He said,

"Love like that must not be spoiled by death." Then he gave the husband and wife back to each other and let the wife go free. As they walked away happily the husband said to his wife, "Did you notice how kindly the king looked upon us when he gave you the pardon?" The wife replied, "I had no eyes for the king. I saw only the man who was willing to die in my place."

I believe that if we can enter into the spirit of that story, we can also understand what the Bible means when it shows us that Jesus Christ is the great lover, bridegroom, husband, and provider of his church. He is the One who not only offered himself in our place but who actually died for us in order that he might present us to himself "radiant ... without stain or blemish" (Eph. 5:27). As his bride our eyes, hearts, minds, and souls should be fixed upon him.

Jesus Is God

Before we begin to apply this theme to ourselves, however, we need to see what it teaches about Jesus Christ. This is important, for John was teaching that Jesus is God. This is seen in the fact that when John the Baptist applied the image of the bridegroom to Jesus he was certainly not just making the comparison up. John was applying an Old Testament image to Christ, and the point is that in the Old Testament Jehovah, the God of Israel, is the bridegroom.

The earliest suggestion of the image in the Old Testament, so far as I can tell, is in the Book of Exodus. Here, in the context of the giving of the law, God tells Israel, "Do not worship any other god, for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God. Be careful not to make a treaty with those who live in the land; for when they prostitute themselves to their gods and sacrifice to them, they will invite you and you will eat their sacrifices. And when you choose some of their daughters as wives for your sons and those daughters prostitute themselves to their gods, they will lead your sons to do the same. Do not make cast idols" (Exod. 34:14-17). In these verses the fact that Jehovah is the bridegroom or husband of Israel is not spelled out explicitly, but it is implied in the argument that for Israel to worship other gods is harlotry. These verses are the seed of the later imagery.

By the time we get to the Book of Deuteronomy, the warning against committing spiritual adultery, which is found in Exodus, is changed to a prophecy that this is precisely what will happen. Thus we find God saying to Moses, "You are going to rest with your fathers, and these people will soon prostitute themselves to the foreign gods of the land they are entering. They will forsake me and break the covenant I made with them" (Deut. 31:16).

In the prophetic books we find that Israel has already done this, departing from the Lord. Here the language becomes explicit. Isaiah writes, "For your Maker is your husband—the LORD Almighty is his name" (Isa. 54:5). Several chapters later Isaiah again says, "As a bridegroom rejoices over his bride, so will your God rejoice over you" (Isa. 62:5). From this point on the comparison occurs more frequently, several times in the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, for instance. Finally, the entire personal story of Hosea and the opening chapters of his prophecy are based on this theme. In all of these books God is the faithful lover and husband. Israel is the unfaithful wife and bride.

When we put this imagery into the context of John the Baptist's preaching, we find that John was identifying the Lord Jesus Christ with God. John preached on the basis of Old Testament themes. He knew that Israel was the bride and Jehovah was the bridegroom. Now Jesus appears, and John immediately casts him in God's role. In mathematics, whenever you have two equations like "A equals B" and "B equals C," it is always possible to make a third equation which says that "A equals C." The rule is that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other. In the same way, if Jehovah is the bridegroom and Jesus Christ is the bridegroom, it follows that Jesus is Jehovah.

Is he your God? Is he your bridegroom?

The Church

The second major teaching of the bride and bridegroom imagery is of the high calling of the church. She is the one for whom Christ died. She is married to him. Consequently, she is called to be faithful.

This is the sense in which the imagery is developed several times in Paul's writing. For instance, in the eleventh chapter of 2 Corinthians Paul writes of his concern lest the church he had established in Corinth prove unfaithful to the Lord Jesus. "I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy. I promised you to one husband, to Christ, so that I might present you as a pure virgin to him. But I am afraid that just as Eve was deceived by the serpent's cunning, your minds may somehow be led astray from your sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (vv. 2-3). In the following verse he shows that unfaithfulness occurs whenever the church, which is called by his name, adopts "another Jesus," "another spirit," or "another gospel" as its message.

Do you see what this means? It means that the church of Jesus Christ can be faithful, but she can also be unfaithful. She can commit spiritual adultery. She commits adultery whenever she departs from the Jesus of the Bible, the spirit of Jesus that witnesses to him through Scripture, or the gospel of salvation by faith in Christ alone.

Has the church done this? This is a question that must be asked afresh in each age. Have we another Jesus, another spirit, or another gospel in our churches? I am not speaking of faithful churches when I say this, of course, but I believe that (with the exception of such churches) honesty forces us to admit that this has indeed happened in our age. The quest of another Jesus is called often laudably "The Quest of the Historical Jesus." The trend to another spirit occurs whenever people follow private leadings or visions rather than the clear statements of Scripture. Another gospel emerges whenever works are mixed with faith in salvation. This has occurred, but it is all apostasy. We must counter such trends with the insistence that membership in the church of Jesus Christ involves great ethical and doctrinal responsibility as well as high privileges.

Sex and Marriage

In an appendix on the theme of the bride and the bridegroom in The Church at the End of the Twentieth Century, Francis A. Schaeffer also notes that the bride and bridegroom theme speaks to the issue of sexual morality and the standards for Christian marriage. This is important also, particularly in our day when the old sexual norms are threatened and when faithfulness in marriage seems to be losing its appeal for many persons.

Why is it that promiscuous sexual relations and unfaithfulness in marriage are wrong? There are three major reasons, Schaeffer notes. First, these things are wrong simply because God says so. That which is right is right and that which is wrong is wrong, not because men judge it to be right or wrong, but because good is related to God's character. His character is the morality of the universe. Hence, if he tells us that something is wrong, it is wrong, however we may feel about it personally.

The second reason why promiscuity or unfaithfulness is wrong is that these things are not good for us as God made us. It is true that right is right and wrong is wrong because God says so, but it is equally true that morality is related to the way in which we are made. Thus, we find ourselves entering into a fuller realization of the happiness we are made for as we obey God's laws. And conversely, we find ourselves upon an increasingly destructive path when we flout them.

The final, and best, reason why promiscuous sexual relations and marital unfaithfulness are wrong is that these things break the picture of what God intends marriage to be. Schaeffer states, "Marriage is set forth to be the illustration of the relationship of God and his people, and of Christ and his church. ...The relationship of God with his people rests upon his character, and sexual relationship outside of marriage breaks this parallel which the Bible draws between marriage and the relationship of God with his people." Women are to love as the church loves Christ. Men are to love as Christ loves. "If we break God's illustration by such a relationship, it is a serious thing."

How do we apply this personally? It depends upon who we are and where we are on the graded spectrum of love, marriage, and sex. Some are not yet married but will be thinking about it. If you are in this category, you must determine to hold up the highest possible standards of marriage and then evaluate the one you are thinking of marrying in terms of them. Young woman, you must look at your young man and ask, "Can he be as Jesus Christ to me?" If he cannot be, look elsewhere. Young man, you should ask, "Do I love this young woman enough to give myself for her? Am I willing to cover up her faults and be patient with her, as God instructs me to do? Am I willing to die for her?" If you are not willing to do these things, it is not right for you to marry her.

Others will be beyond thinking about marriage. They are already married, and there are difficulties. If you are in this category, you must not give up because of the difficulties. To do so would be to suggest that God gives up on us, and this is untrue. Instead you must love with a love that overcomes difficulties—first, by changing yourself and then by winning over the other person. If you will yield to Christ and his standards, he will begin by making of you a new creation and then end by making all things new.

The Lord's Return

Finally, there is this great lesson in the image. Not only does the theme of the bride and the bridegroom teach us of the deity of Jesus Christ, not only does it set the highest standards for the conduct of the church and for individual conduct in the areas of sex and marriage—it also teaches us about the return of Jesus Christ. We see this when we apply the image in time, for in a temporal sense we are presently only engaged to Jesus Christ awaiting that final consummation of the engagement at the future marriage supper of the Lamb.

Does an engaged woman look forward to her wedding day? Of course she does! So should we also look forward to our Lord's return and act accordingly.

How do you live as you wait for the Lord's return? Let me illustrate how you should live by these two contrasting stories from the book God's Methods for Holy Living by Donald Grey Barnhouse. At the time of the First World War there was a young aristocrat in England who married and then went off to the trenches on the continent. The young bride wrote that she was preoccupied with war work and was nursing in a certain hospital. She apologized for not writing often, saying that she was spending long hours every day tending the war wounded. Some time later, when her husband was coming home on leave, a friend, who knew what was actually going on, said to him, "If I were you, I would not write in advance that I am coming. I would simply slip over quietly." The husband did so. He went to the hospital where his wife was supposed to be working and found that those working there had never heard of her. She was not at her apartment either. Someone said, "Oh, she will probably be at a tea dance at the Ritz today." The husband went there and found his wife in the company of another man. In time, he found out a good deal more and was granted a divorce by British authorities.

The other story is this. At the beginning of the same war, in the western part of America, there was a young couple who had made plans to be married. Everything was in readiness. They had a small cottage. They had furnished it. The date was set for the marriage. Suddenly war was declared, and the young man, who was in the reserve, was called up to active duty. He was to be sent to the Mexican border to train before being shipped off to France. On the day before he was to be sent off for training, the young woman said to him, "I know that it is not quite the date for our wedding, but you might be ordered overseas immediately; you might be killed, and I would much rather go through life bearing your name than go through life always explaining that the man I loved had been killed in the war. So let's be married now." On the next day they were married; and for their honeymoon the husband went with the troops, and the bride went alone to the little cottage.

She was very lonely, of course, as you can imagine, and she longed for the day when she would again see her lover-husband. Day after day he wrote to her. He sent her gifts—a Navajo rug, some Mexican lace, some Indian pottery. Months passed, and the day came when she was so lonely that she sat down on some pillows in front of the fireplace, spread out the rug, put the other gifts on a piece of furniture, and then began to read through all the accumulated letters while having herself a good cry. Suddenly, as she was reading the letters, there was a step on the porch, the door opened, and there he was! He had sent a telegram, but it was delayed, as telegrams often were in those days. He had arrived before it. When she saw him and realized that he was home, the young bride jumped to her feet, scattered the letters about, and even knocked over the pottery. A few of the letters fell into the fire, but she did not care at all. He had returned to her, and having him she had all.

The one who tells those stories then wrote, "Dear friends, our Lord Jesus is coming back and He is going to find you and ... me in one of those two attitudes. Will you be flirting with the world, or will you be occupied with His love letters, His gifts, His work, thinking of Him?" Jesus is coming. The Bible says that "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (1 John 3:3).

Chapter 43.
The Revealer Has Come

John 3:31-36

In a small but very excellent book written by A. W. Tozer, there is an illuminating paragraph that refers to the inferential character of the average man's faith in God. This means that for most people God is the end result of a chain of reasoning rather than a reality. According to such people there may be much to suggest God's existence. There is the beauty of nature, the immensity of space, the order of matter. "He must be," they say. "Because these things are, he is." Other people argue in the same way from the experience of a parent or friend. "God was real to my mother," they say, "so he must be real. I believe in him because others believe in him." Still others find their belief in God linked to their belief in such things as truth, goodness, beauty, or ethical ideals.

Quite obviously, each of these chains of reasoning is unique. Still, as Tozer notes, those who hold them have one thing in common. "They do not know God in personal experience. The possibility of intimate acquaintance with Him has not entered their minds. While admitting His existence they do not think of Him as knowable in the sense that we know things or people."

Unfortunately, although this is primarily true of non-Christians, there is also a sense in which it is at least partially true of some believers. For although they believe in Christ and trust him in one sense, still for them God is unreal and they go through life attempting to love an ideal or be loyal to an abstract doctrine or principle.

If you are at any point of this wide spectrum of those for whom God is unreal, then the verses to which we come now are for you especially. They are about Jesus Christ, and they speak of him as the great witness to God, the great revealer of him. They say, "The one who comes from above is above all; the one who is from the earth belongs to the earth, and speaks as one from the earth. The one who comes from heaven is above all. He testifies to what he has seen and heard, but no one accepts his testimony. The man who has accepted it has certified that God is truthful. For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for God gives the Spirit without limit. The Father loves the Son and has placed everything in his hands. Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life, but whoever rejects the Son will not see life, for God's wrath remains on him" (John 3:31-36).

The Perfect Witness

What is it that makes a person a good witness? We know something of the answer to this question because of our knowledge of the procedures in courts of law. The first thing that is required if a man is to be a good witness is that he must have firsthand information. He must have seen or heard that about which he is testifying. For this reason, no judge in the land will accept hearsay evidence.

Second, a good witness must be willing to testify. He must be willing to speak up, to get involved.

Third, the witness must be reliable. That is, his witness must be substantial and possess enough self-consistency to be believed. These three requirements make for a perfect witness. By this standard—and this is John's point—Jesus Christ is the perfect witness concerning God. Thus, in verse 31 John stresses the fact that Jesus has firsthand information concerning God because of his origins. In verse 32 he points out that Jesus did bear witness to this knowledge. Finally, in verse 34 he shows that the witness is reliable "for God gives the Spirit without limit."

Firsthand Information

The first point is that Jesus Christ possessed accurate knowledge of God the Father. This is linked to his supremacy over all other teachers and prophets. These may have possessed part of the truth, but even at the best their insights were secondary. They reported only what God had revealed to them. Jesus was God incarnate. His origins were heavenly. Consequently, he has revealed the truth perfectly out of the fullness of his knowledge.

On this point William Barclay writes, "If we want information, we have to go to the person who possesses that information. If we want information about a family, we will only get it at firsthand from a member of that family. If we want information about a town, we will only get it at firsthand from someone who comes from that town. So, then, if we want information about God, we will get it only from the Son of God; and if we want information about heaven and heaven's life, we will only get it from Him who comes from heaven. When Jesus speaks about God and about the heavenly things, says John, it is no carried story, no secondhand tale, no information from a secondary source. He tells us that which he himself has seen and heard. To put it very simply, because Jesus alone knows God, he alone can give us the facts about God, and these facts are the gospel."

In his Gospel, John has a special way of emphasizing the fact that Jesus alone possesses such knowledge. It is not present, or at least is not present in the same degree, in the other Gospels. John stresses the fact that Jesus is the perfect witness because he alone has been sent into the world by God.

Here a few statistics will be helpful. In John's Gospel the phrase "he (or 'the Father') who sent me" is found on the lips of Jesus twenty-three times. The Greek verb in that phrase (apostellein) occurs seventeen times in phrases that speak of God's commissioning of the Son, and there are other phrases that speak from man's perspective of the fact that Jesus Christ has "come." Jesus is the One who "came down from heaven." He "has come into the world." He "came from the Father," or God. In the final discourses, as the time of Jesus' death draws near, the emphasis shifts quite naturally from the fact that Jesus came into the world to the fact that he is now to return to the Father. In John 16:28, the themes of the coming and the return are bound together. "I came from the Father and entered the world; now I am leaving the world and going back to the Father." These phrases have little or no reference to the identification of Jesus as the Messiah as similar phrases do in the other Gospels. Instead, they refer to Jesus' ability both to impart heavenly gifts and to speak the words of God to men. Jesus is the perfect witness because he is able perfectly to reveal God. "No one has ever seen God, but God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known" (John 1:18).

Moreover, according to the Bible and to the Gospel of John particularly, the sending of Jesus Christ into the world involves much more than the sending of a prophet, as in Old Testament times, or the sending of the apostles into the world as evangelists in the New Testament era. These men were messengers. They were sent by God. But Jesus is not a messenger. He is the messenger. It is true that John the Baptist is also said to have been sent by God (1:6, 33; 3:28) and that the disciples later are sent in their turn into the world (17:18; 20:21). But neither the Baptist nor the disciples exert a claim to any independent revelation. They are only sent to bear witness to Jesus Christ. He alone speaks and acts out of the fullness of his knowledge of his Father.

In John 9 there is a story that illustrates all that I have been saying. It is a story of how a blind man came to know God through Jesus. The man has no knowledge of God at the beginning of the story. His physical blindness is a symbol of his spiritual blindness. Jesus heals him. As he does so he says, "While I am in the world, I am the light of the world" (v. 5; cf. 8:12). Through this contact the man begins to understand something of who Jesus is, and he increases in spiritual sight until he eventually comes to argue pointedly for the truth of Christ's heavenly origin. The high point of the story is reached in the contrast between the testimony of the man who had been born blind and the denial of Christ by the Jewish rulers. The Jews argue from the basis of their knowledge of the law and Moses. They say, "We know that God has spoken to Moses, but as for this man, we do not know where he comes from" (v. 29 RSV). The man who had been born blind replies, "Why, this is a marvel! You do not know where he comes from, and yet he opened my eyes. ...If this man were not from God, he could do nothing" (vv. 30, 33 RSV).

The man who was blind had been led by the healing of his eyes to the spiritual perception that Jesus had come from God and therefore spoke and acted out of a true knowledge of God. Thus, while his understanding of Jesus began with the confession that he was merely a "man" (v. 11), it soon progressed to the fact that he was "a prophet" (v. 17) "of God" (v. 33) and then to a worship of him (v. 38). By contrast, the failure of the leaders to recognize the truth of Christ's coming from God actually intensified their spiritual blindness and led to their rejection of Christ's testimony entirely.

Where do you stand in this picture? Are you one for whom God is only an inference? Or have you come to "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6)?

A Willing Witness

There is also, as I have indicated, a second requirement for a perfect witness. Not only must a witness have firsthand information about that which is to be testified; the witness must also be willing to testify. Was Jesus willing? Of course, he was. He got involved. Therefore, John writes, "He testifies to what he has seen and heard" (v. 32).

It is interesting to me that John puts the verb "testify" in the present tense here, as indeed he does with all the other verbs that speak of Christ's witness. We would tend to use the past tense, for we would reason that Jesus came, bore his testimony, and then returned to heaven. This is not what John does. For John, Jesus is still testifying. Well then, we ask, where do we hear his testimony? The answer is: in the Bible. Is the Bible something that is dead, irrelevant, or dated, then? Not for John! And not for any who have come to know Christ and to have experienced the living power of the Bible to speak on his behalf. The Bible is living. Christ is living. Moreover, it is through the Bible that he continues to speak and bear his witness to heavenly things in our days.

Reliable Testimony

Jesus also fulfilled the third requirement for the perfect witness. His witness was consistent. It was complete and therefore totally reliable. John indicates this when he writes, "For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for God gives the Spirit without limit. The Father loves the Son and has placed everything in his hands" (vv. 34-35).

I must admit that because of the way this phrase is written in the Greek, several different interpretations of it are possible. It could mean three things. First, it could mean that Jesus Christ gives the Spirit to believers without measure. The verse has often been taken in that light, but this view is faulty. Certainly Jesus does not withhold the Spirit from his own. But whatever the case, none of us possesses the Spirit in the measure that he is possessed by Jesus; and it is far more true to say of ourselves, as is said elsewhere, that "to each one of us grace has been given as Christ apportioned it" (Eph. 4:7).

The verse could also mean that the Spirit does not give by measure; that is, that the Spirit himself gives liberally. That is true in one sense, but it does not seem to fit the context of these verses and is at best only a barely possible reading of the Greek text.

The third view, the one that is to be preferred, is that the Father has not withheld any measure of the Spirit from the Son. This is John's way of saying that there is perfect communion and communication between the Son and the Father, with the result that the Father guarantees the truth and total reliability of Christ's words. This is not true of any other religious teacher; in fact, no other teacher (except a madman) would claim it. In all the teaching of all the other religious teachers of this world, truth is always mixed with falsehood. Therefore, those who teach, if they are wise, always point beyond themselves to that which is higher. This was never done by Jesus.
Others pointed down the road to a far destination. Jesus claimed that he was that destination.
Others taught that they had aspects of the truth. Jesus said that the truth had come in his person. Others offered to show the way to God. Jesus said that he is the way to God. "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6).

Are these things true? If they are, Jesus is the only truly reliable witness to who God is and to what he requires. Since he requires your life and total allegiance, you ought (as the man who had been born blind) to worship him.

Running Away

At the end of his book, Runaway World, Michael Green, the principal of London Divinity School, deals with the means men and women use to escape an honest investigation of Christ's claims. Sex is one obvious means of escape, according to Green. So are drugs, mysticism, conformity to our culture, the rat race, vice, even (for some persons) social involvement. Perhaps you are involved in one or more of these pursuits as a means of escape from the claims of Jesus.

But what of him? Is he the One he says he is? If he is, none of these means of escape will do. In fact, in order that no one might miss this, John ends his whole presentation of Christ's claims with a forthright statement of the issues, "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life, but whoever rejects the Son will not see life, for God's wrath remains on him" (v. 36).

What will you say when you meet him? What possible excuse can you offer? Green writes: "'I didn't believe you ever existed?' What utter nonsense; what culpable ignorance of the evidence! 'I didn't think your life was attractive enough, noble enough'? What manifest hypocrisy: it was rather that the standards of the man of Nazareth were too high, too costly, was it not? Or shall the excuse be simply 'I did not bother'? How do you think that will look to the Son of God, who became man for you, loved and died for you, rose again in order to take over your life and make a new man of you? No, all excuses will wither and wilt before the truth, the love, the selfsacrifice of Jesus. Final truth about the world, mankind and God has been disclosed by the Other who came into our very midst, the one who declared 'I am the truth.' By our relation to him we shall be judged."

It is my profound prayer, as we close our studies of this great third chapter of John's Gospel, that you will not ignore Christ's witness but instead will enter into eternal life through believing in and committing yourself to him who died for you and rose again.

Chapter 44.
Christ at Sychar's Well

John 4:1-6

During the years that I spent in Europe studying for the Christian ministry, I had opportunities to witness the universality of the gospel call that is generally lacking to one who spends his whole life in America.

I remember particularly a combination of such opportunities that occurred toward the end of my three-year residency in Switzerland. Within a week of having completed my doctoral examinations at the University of Basel, I left Basel for Berlin for the first great World Congress on Evangelism sponsored on that occasion by Billy Graham and the evangelical Protestant magazine Christianity Today. As I boarded one flight after another on the way to Berlin—for the routing required several changes—I noticed that others, obviously also bound for the meetings, began to board the planes. At first there were workers from Switzerland—Germans, Americans, and Swiss. Then there were those from other parts of Europe—Frenchmen, British citizens, Italians. Eventually there were some from the nations of Africa and Asia. By the time we had arrived in Berlin and the other delegates had also assembled, more than 1, 200 had gathered from a total of more than one hundred nations, and the four official languages of the assembly—French, English, German, and Spanish—were supplemented by dozens of others spoken in the corridors of the Kongresshalle, where the meetings were held, and in the hotels. Socially, the delegates spanned the gap from Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia to recent converts from the pagan tribes of Ecuador, Indonesia, and rural Africa.

The day after the Congress closed, I returned to Basel to my duties as pastor of the small church that had grown up there during the years I had spent in Switzerland. I remember that as I stood up to preach the next Sunday, I thought of the correspondingly wide breadth of backgrounds and experiences that were represented even in this one small congregation. It was a world congress in miniature. Here were Swiss, German, American, British, Japanese, and Filipino Christians, and they too represented extremes of intellect, education, wealth, and social position.

In America, where there is not so great an extreme of nationalities and where the churches are often unfortunately socially oriented, the fact that the gospel of Jesus Christ speaks to all men is not always so apparent. Still this is true, and we correctly sing:

> In Christ there is no East or West,
> In him no South or North,
> But one great fellowship of love
> Throughout the whole wide earth.

According to God's Word, there is no child of Adam who may not come freely and boldly to the Lord Jesus Christ and in him find a glorious salvation.

This is the true universalism of the Christian faith, not that all men will be saved but that all men may be saved. It is the teaching of Scripture that no one will ever be barred from Christ because of his sex, intellect, education, race, nationality, wealth, or social position. This simplicity is the glory of God's grace.

A Second Example

Today we come to a dramatization of this principle from the fourth chapter of John's Gospel. If you can remember back to the first of our studies in the third chapter, you will recall that Nicodemus, who appears in that chapter, is the first person introduced by John to show the need of men and women for the gospel of Jesus Christ and to provide a context in which Jesus explains what it is he offers them. At the end of chapter 2, John wrote of the initial response of some men to Jesus: "But Jesus would not entrust himself to them, for he knew all men. He did not need man's testimony about man, for he knew what was in a man" (John 2:24-25). The next verse, 3:1, then begins "Now there was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus..." Quite obviously Nicodemus is brought forward as John's first great example of the human race.

We must not think, however, that Nicodemus was the only one who needed the gospel. There were others; in fact, all men and women need it. Thus, to learn this truth we are brought to the second of John's examples, the unnamed woman whom Jesus met in Samaria in the vicinity of Sychar's well.

According to John, the woman of Samaria was an immoral woman; and she apparently had a bad reputation, if we are to judge by the fact that she came to draw water in the heat of the day when no one else, particularly the other women, would be present at Jacob's well. She came for water only. But instead she met Jesus. He spoke to her and gave her the water of life, a gift that she had never dreamed of but that satisfied her most important thirst—her thirst for God—completely. The story closes with the witness of this woman to others from her town, with the result that many of them also believed on Jesus, confessing that he was the Messiah and their Savior.

It is difficult to imagine a greater contrast between two persons than the contrast between the important and sophisticated Nicodemus, this ruler of the Jews, and the simple Samaritan woman. He was a Jew; she a Samaritan. He was a Pharisee; she belonged to no religious party. He was a politician; she had no status whatever. He was a scholar; she was uneducated. He was highly moral; she was immoral. He had a name; she is nameless. He was a man; she was a woman. He came at night, to protect his reputation; she, who had no reputation, came at noon. Nicodemus came seeking; the woman was sought by Jesus.

A great contrast. Yet the point of the stories is that both the man and the woman needed the gospel and were welcome to it. If Nicodemus is an example of the truth that no one can rise so high as to be above salvation, the woman is an example of the truth that none can sink too low. Thus, it is by no means an accident that John has placed these two wonderful stories together at the beginning of his Gospel and that they end in 4:42, with the Samaritans' statement that "This man really is the Savior of the world."

Do you know the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior? If you do not, you should learn that the gospel is as much for you as it is for anyone and that you need it as much as did the respected Nicodemus or the immoral woman of Samaria.

A Race without God

The fact that Nicodemus and the woman were different is important. It makes the point I have just elaborated. Yet if we are to proceed further with the story, we need to abandon the differences between the man and the woman at this point and instead concentrate on their similarities. Surprisingly, as we do this we find that the similarities are even more important than the differences and that it is on this basis alone that our study really can go forward.

What is it that Nicodemus and the woman at Sychar's well had in common? One answer is that they both thought that they were all right spiritually. There was an inner hunger, to be sure. This appears in the stories, and I will mention it later. But in their minds, and perhaps also in their entire outlook on life, each thought that he or she was all right. Nicodemus thought so because of his religious and intellectual achievements, the woman because of her superstitions and the religious traditions of the Samaritans. It is noteworthy that in their conviction that all was well when all was not well, Nicodemus and the woman have a great deal in common with the majority of those who live in our own very self-satisfied era.

Second, both Nicodemus and the woman were crudely literal, or materialistic, in their reaction to Jesus' spiritual teaching. In each case Jesus taught about the need for receiving new life from him. But when he spoke of it to Nicodemus, using the image of the new birth, Nicodemus thought that he was talking about obstetrics. And when Jesus spoke to the woman of the possibility of receiving "living water," she thought only in terms of the great distance between her home and Sychar's well and of the joy of not having to carry the heavy waterpots. These reactions were an illustration of the teaching of the apostle Paul given later to the Corinthians; for Paul was speaking of such spiritual blindness when he wrote, "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

Unfortunately, in their naturalistic reaction to Christ's teaching Nicodemus and the woman are also one with men and women of all ages, perhaps, above all, those of our own very materialistic age. Today we are asked, "Hasn't science shown beyond all doubt that we are living within a closed materialistic system and therefore are without and have no need of God?" We are asked, "Aren't the aspects of human behavior that used to be called religious really only a projection of family relationships and therefore entirely explicable in terms of present-day psychology? In fact, isn't religion itself merely a primitive attempt to give meaning to the data of human experience, a task which has now been achieved much more completely and satisfactorily through scientific investigation and discovery?" To persons asking such questions reality is limited to that which the five senses can grasp, and the most important terms of Christianity are meaningless. It follows from this that the twentieth-century materialist, just as certainly as the first-century materialist, needs to meet the Christ of Christianity and come to know the supernatural basis and reality of the Christian faith.

John R. W. Stott of All Souls' Church in London has written that what such people need is to be confronted with what he calls "authentic" Christianity. "Authentic Christianity—the Christianity of Christ and His apos-tles—is supernatural Christianity. It is not a tame and harmless ethic, consisting of a few moral platitudes, spiced with a dash of religion. It is rather a resurrection religion, a life by the power of God."

Third, Nicodemus and the woman of Samaria had in common the fact that they, like all men and women, were empty spiritually and thus sensed a need for God even though their outlook on life and their intellectual convictions denied it.

Do you sense this need? Many have known and spoken of it even though they may not have known precisely what it was they needed or longed for. One commentator calls attention to an expression of this from the pen of Sinclair Lewis. In one of his books, Lewis writes of a respectable business man who has kicked over the traces and gone off with a girl he thinks he loves. She says to him, "On the surface we seem quite different; but deep down we are fundamentally the same. We are both desperately unhappy about something—and we don't know what it is." The woman at the well could have said this to Nicodemus. Many women could say it to their husbands, many men to their wives. What is this longing? Augustine probably talked about it best when he confessed to God, "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless until they find their rest in Thee."

Finally, Nicodemus and the woman had in common the fact that they were lost spiritually; that is, in the words of the apostle Paul, they had "sinned and [had fallen] short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). This was the root of all their other problems and was their most significant similarity.

What does it mean to be lost? The dictionary defines "lost" as "ruined, destroyed, having wandered from the way, absorbed, wasted, hardened beyond sensibility or recovery, insensible." If to these definitions we add the thoughts of deliberate waywardness and rebellion, the resulting definition is not far from the biblical teaching about man as he is apart from God. Romans 3:12 tells us that "all have turned away," that we have "together become worthless." In this verse the word that is translated "turned away" means lost as the result of an active, willful departure from God's way. The Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, uses the same word 139 times to paint a horrible picture of our rebellious race.

According to God, mankind has willfully abandoned the way to him. "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:6). One commentator has written on this point, "We have rejected the law of God, spurned his calls of love, refused his counsel and laughed at his reproof. We have become worse than beasts in our relationship with our Creator. In our language, we speak of 'animal characteristics' in man and call the obstinate ones mulish, dogged, or pigheaded. But God tells us that this is to insult the animal creation, for we read: Tor the Lord hath spoken: I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass, his master's crib; but [my people] know nothing, my people have no intelligence'

(Isa. 1:2, 3). And our Lord laments over us, 'Woe to the sinful nation, to the people laden with iniquities, to the race of evil ones, to the rotten children. They have abandoned the Lord. They have despised the Holy One of Israel. They have drawn themselves backwards' (v. 4).

"From Genesis, where we find sinning man hiding among the trees, to Malachi, where God declares 'ye are turned aside out of the way' (Mal. 2:8) there is one long history of sin against love and rejection of grace. The position of man is even worse than that of the Devil, the fallen angels, and the demons. There is no record that there was ever made to them an offer of salvation, but of the human race there is the record that the greatest love of the universe was offered to them and that they wilfully rejected it. The Lord Jesus Christ stands weeping, 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathered her chickens under her wings, and ye would not' (Matt. 23:37)."

The Way Let me ask this simple question. What do you need to do when you are lost? You need to find the way back. And what do you need if you are unable to find it? You need a Savior. Imagine yourself without a sure direction, without the necessities of life, without any confidence in the future. What do you do? You look for one who can save you and show you the way home.

That is what Jesus came to do. He came to show a fallen, rebellious race, a race composed of people like Nicodemus, the woman of Samaria, you and me, the way home to God our heavenly Father. Of course, there is one great difference between the salvation that Jesus brought and the salvation that might be brought to someone merely lost in the woods. In the second case, the way need only be shown. In Jesus' case, the way had to be made, as it was, by his death. Jesus died for you in order that he might bear all the judgment and wrath of God that should have fallen on you because of your sin.

Will you come to him? There is no other way. The Bible says that God's righteousness, which is by faith in Jesus, is offered "to all"—that is the true universalism of the Christian faith—but that it comes only "to all who believe" (Rom. 3:22).

Chapter 45.
Living Water

John 4:7-14

In the city of Philadelphia, where I live, there is a beautiful drive that leads out of the city along the eastern bank of the Schuylkill River. Along the drive there is a section of the riverbank lined with boathouses, called Boathouse Row; and across from Boathouse Row there is a statue of a pilgrim with a Bible under his arm. Many who pass the statue by car never see more than the pilgrim. But if a person is on foot and is exploring the riverbank, he soon finds a stream that empties into the Schuylkill near the pilgrim, as well as a trail that winds along it. If he follows this trail up over Sedgley Hill toward Brewery Town, he comes upon the source of the spring.
There, over the spring's source, he sees an inscription once placed by the city government— "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again."

The quotation over the source of Sedgley spring is true, so far as it goes. No one would think of denying it. But it is only half a quotation. For the other half of the quotation one must turn to Christ's words to the woman of Samaria when she came to Jacob's well to draw water.

As Jesus spoke to the woman about water he made the obvious statement—"Everyone who drinks this water will be thirsty again." But then he also made a second statement, and in this statement there is a great promise. He offered a new kind of water, saying, "Whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life" (John 4:14). This promise is the basis for our study in this chapter.

A Weary Christ

It is not often that I have been really thirsty—certainly not in this country—but of one thing about thirst I am convinced: most people understand very little about it until they spend time in a tropical land, particularly an arid and extremely warm land such as the Middle East. Several times when I have been traveling in the Middle East I have found myself in places where a traveler dared not drink the water. I remember vividly how uncomfortable and at times almost desperate one becomes until a place is reached where the water is drinkable and intense thirst can be quenched. People seldom experience this in America and other English-speaking lands. So in our literature water appears often as a symbol of beauty or perhaps (in great quantities) even of destruction but seldom as a symbol for life. It is entirely different in a culture where water is a symbol of that without which a person will surely die.

We must see this as we turn to Jesus' conversation with the woman of Samaria, for the point there is that Jesus is as necessary for spiritual life as water is for physical life.

Jesus had been traveling with his disciples from the area of the lower Jordan to Galilee and had to go through Samaria, as the story tells us (v. 4). This was not entirely true in a purely geographical sense. From the area of the lower Jordan to Galilee there were two routes. One led through Perea on the eastern side of the Jordan to the northern end of the valley where it crossed over into Galilee. The other, the way Jesus took, went through Samaria, the country west of the Jordan. Normally, orthodox Jews would take the eastern route; it was longer but it avoided Samaria. They did this because of their hostility toward the Samaritans. When John tells us, then, that Jesus "must needs" go through Samaria, he obviously means Jesus had to go that way to meet the Samaritan woman.

So Jesus went through Samaria. About noon on the second day of travel he came to the vicinity of the Samaritan town of Sychar. Being tired from his journey, he sat at the foot of the hill leading up to Sychar, on the edge of Jacob's well. The disciples were sent off to the city to buy something to eat while Jesus rested.

What a picture of Jesus! Here was a Jesus who was not wearied merely by the heat. He could have stayed in the cooler area of the Jordan. Here was a Jesus who was wearied in his search for sinners and who had become thirsty seeking those to whom he was to offer the water of life. On the same errand he would one day experience an even greater thirst on the cross. One of the great devotional writers of our time, Geoffrey T. Bull, a missionary the Chinese imprisoned on the Tibetan border from 1950 to 1953 but later released, remarks on this aspect of Jesus' encounter with the woman: "If she could have seen just then what Jesus saw, she would have glimpsed another noonday when the sun would mourn in blackness and this same Stranger cry out from a Roman cross, 'I thirst!' She would have seen in him the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, the smitten Christ from whom the living waters flow. ...He was thirstier than she knew. He was speaking for the very heart of God. He was moving in the travail of his soul and looked for satisfaction in the restoration of this sin scarred woman."

Jesus became man and experienced all that we experience, but the point of the incarnation is that he did this to redeem men. So if he was weary, thirsty, hot, and on the road to even greater suffering, he was weary and hot for your sake and mine. Jesus suffered for the Nicodemuses, the women of Samaria, and the others whom this world holds. If you are already a believer, perhaps you should ask yourself whether you have ever wearied yourself in the pursuit of other men and women. Have you ever become hot or uncomfortable trying to communicate the gospel to others?

A Thirsty Woman

There is another picture in the first verses of John 4. The one picture is of a wearied Christ. The second is of the woman. She was a Samaritan, and she undoubtedly had had many opportunities to return the hatred of the Jews for the Samaritans by hating the Jews in return. Perhaps she had even had a taste of their hostility a few minutes before meeting

Jesus, for she was coming down the hill at the same time that Peter and the other disciples had gone up, and we can be certain that at this stage of their lives, Peter and the others would never have moved off the path for any woman, much less a Samaritan and one with loose morals at that. Perhaps she had been pushed aside or made to wait while the body of Galileans marched by.

Probably she came to the bottom of the hill with this fresh reminder of the hatred of the Jews in her mind, and as soon as she got to the well the first thing that she discovered was another Jew. She could tell he was a Jew by his dress. She was silent. She wasn't about to speak to him! While she was getting ready to lower her bucket into the well, however, Jesus made a request. He asked for a drink. When she remarked at the fact that he, a Jew, should do something as unheard of as to ask water of a Samaritan woman, he aroused her curiosity even further by offering her a new kind of water, "living water," that would be a spring of water within her "welling up to eternal life."

This is always the way it is in the spiritual realm. Jesus comes to us first. If we were left to ourselves, we would leave him sitting on the edge of the well forever. But he does not leave us to ourselves. Instead he comes to us. He asks the first question. He initiates the conversation. He uses all devices to break through to our hearts. Sometimes it is a question, sometimes a command, sometimes a chance remark made by someone else, but it is always from him.

Jesus offered the woman "living water." But what does that mean? What does it mean when he offers it to us? The woman, of course, at first understood the words with crude literalness, just as Nicodemus had understood the words about being "born again" literally. In Jewish speech the phrase "living water" meant water that was flowing, like water in a river or stream, as opposed to water that was stagnant, as in a cistern or well. Living water was considered to be better. Therefore, when Jesus said that he could give her "living water" the woman quite naturally thought of a stream. She wanted to know where Jesus had found it. From the tone of her remarks it is evident that she even thought his claim a bit blasphemous, for it was a claim to have done something greater than her ancestor Jacob had been able to do. Had Jacob been able to find a stream he would certainly not have taken the trouble to dig a well that was roughly a hundred feet deep. This was the level on which the woman was thinking.

Still the phrase should have meant more than this to anyone who was accustomed to thinking biblically. It should have meant more than this to the woman. Many times in the Old Testament God is pictured as the One who alone can supply living water to satisfy the thirst for God that exists in man's soul.

Isaiah wrote, "With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation" (Isa. 12:3). David said, "As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for you, O God" (Ps. 42:1). God declared through Jeremiah, "My people have committed two sins: They have forsaken me, the spring of living water, and have dug their own cisterns, broken cisterns that cannot hold water" (Jer. 2:13). In Isaiah 44 God makes the promise, "For I will pour water on the thirsty land" (Isa. 44:3). In chapter 55 he declares, "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat!" (v. 1). Several times in the writings of Ezekiel and Zechariah there is a picture of a river of life flowing out from God's presence in Jerusalem (Ezek. 47:1-12; Zech. 13:1; 14:8). In the New Testament, in the Book of Revelation, there is a reference to these themes in the promises for the end time, "For the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd; he will lead them to springs of living water. And God will wipe away every tear from their eyes" (Rev. 7:17).

Much of the Old Testament is filled with this pictorial religious language revealing the thirst of the soul, a thirst that can be satisfied only by God. However, the woman chose to misunderstand Christ's words by taking them literally. She was blind because she would not see.

Jesus was claiming to be the One who alone can satisfy human longing. Have you tested his claim? You may try to fill your life with the things of this world—money, fame, power, activity—but though these will satisfy for a time, they will not do so permanently. I have often said that they are like a Chinese dinner. They will fill you up well, but two or three hours later you will be hungry again. Only Jesus Christ is able to satisfy you fully.

A Springing Fountain

There is one more point that is of great importance to this study. Up to now we have been thinking mostly about the phrase "living water" from verse 10. Jesus said, "If you knew the gift of God and who it is that asks you for a drink, you would have asked him and he would have given you living water." This verse is important, but we must not overlook the point that four verses further on, in verse 14, Jesus repeats his offer with a significant variation. In verse 14 he says, "But whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life."

No one has ever seen a well of water springing up. Only the water in a spring springs up. The water in a well just lies there. So Jesus is not talking about a well. The woman had come to a well. Jesus has invited her to a spring. Now he adds that if she allows him to place this spring within her, the spring will never cease but will continue to bubble away forever.

Imagine, if you will, that you have just purchased a piece of property upon which you are going to build a house. There is water on the property. If the water is in a well, the water will give you no trouble. If you are there with your bulldozers to clear the ground for your house, all you have to do is push some dirt into the hole and the well will be gone forever so far as you are concerned. It is entirely different, however, if the source of the water on your property is a spring. Try to do the same as you did with the well. You push some dirt over a spring, and it seems to be gone. Five o'clock comes. The workmen go home. But the next morning, when the workmen come back, the stream will be there again, having simply pushed its way through the ground. A well can be covered. A spring seeps through anything you may place over it.

This is what the Lord Jesus Christ is saying. He is promising to place a spring within the life of anyone who will come to him. This spring will be eternal, free, joyous, and self-dependent. But he is also warning you that you will never be able to bulldoze anything over it!

We try, of course. I have done it myself. I know of many who have believed in Christ but who have come to a place in their lives where his way seems inconvenient and who have tried to stifle his presence by piling some foreign substance over the spring. Some have said, "I'm glad that I'm saved, but I'm going to go my way while I'm young. I paid too much attention to religion in my youth. Now I'm just going to cover it up." So they try. But instead of succeeding they discover that God just comes bubbling through.

Let me ask another question: What happens when a spring comes bubbling through dirt? The answer is: It produces muddy water. Is it the spring's fault? No! The fault lies in the dirt that has been pushed on top of it. Does this describe your life? Are you a Christian who has run from God, trying to cover over his presence, but instead only had your life filled with muddy water? If this does describe you, why don't you allow the Lord Jesus Christ to remove the dirt and purify the spring of his life within you?

Let me warn you that you cannot go your own way indefinitely. You will never get away with that. God must be true to his character, and God says that in his holiness he is determined to perfect the image of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, within you. If God were to allow you to go any way you want and make a success of it, then he would be a liar when he says that Jesus Christ is the only way, the only truth, and the only life. God is no liar. So he will make a mess of your life, a ruin of your life, if he has to, until you come to the point where you will let him perfect that work in you he began when you first tasted of the Lord Jesus.

Will you yield to him? If you do, he will satisfy any longing that you may ever have had. He put it there in the first place. And he will do with you that which is pleasing in his sight and which will bless others.

Chapter 46.
Facing the Truth

John 4:15-18

Several years ago I heard of a person who had become a nominal Christian because, as he said, he was looking for an "easy" or "comfortable" religion. I was amused when I heard this, but also a bit saddened, for I knew that the person had never understood the first thing about himself or about true Christianity.

Millions of volumes have been written about Christianity, of course. But this should not obscure the fact that at the heart of the faith there is a great simplicity. Christianity presents a twofold revelation. There is the revelation of God, primarily in Jesus Christ; and there is the revelation of ourselves. The two are related. Thus, no one has ever seen God unless at the same time he has seen himself to be a sinner. This has been the experience of all who have seen him—Moses, Isaiah, David, Peter, who, when they saw God, immediately confessed their sin. Conversely, no one has ever really seen himself unless God has been present to reveal the true state of his heart to him.

Another way of saying the same thing is this. Christianity begins by bringing people to the truth about their own depraved condition, but it does so to convince them of their need of Jesus Christ and to prepare them for understanding who he is and what he has accomplished for them by his death and resurrection.

Jesus said, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners" (Mark 2:17). It is only when you and I have recognized the nature of sin and its gravity that we will come to the One who is our soul's physician.

Guilt Exposed

The fact that we all need to recognize our sin and its gravity does not only lie at the heart of some abstract presentation of Christianity, however. It also lies at the heart of some of the most concrete of the biblical stories. In fact, in the story of the encounter of Jesus Christ with the woman of Samaria, which we are now studying, it is both the heart and turning point of the narrative.

Up to verse 15 of the fourth chapter, in which the story is told, much had been said both by the woman and by Jesus, but we cannot feel that any of it has really touched the woman deeply. It is true that Jesus, a Jew, had spoken to her first and so surprised one who had never known anything but scorn from her Jewish neighbors. Still her reaction was not much more than surprise. It is also true that Jesus had aroused her curiosity by offering her a new type of water, "living water," which would be a spring of water within her "welling up to eternal life." But even this offer must have been received light-heartedly and perhaps even humorously by the woman.
It was an amusing game, this verbal byplay with the interesting Jew, but it was not serious. Presumably the woman even continued to go about preparing to lower her bucket into the well to draw water.

Suddenly Jesus jolted her to her senses with a single sentence. It was not unkind; everything he said to the woman was kind. Still it was a sentence that must have hit the poor woman like a sudden slap in the face and at once have exposed her most serious failing and deep guilt. Jesus said, "Go, call your husband and come back" (v. 16).

At once the woman was recalled to her failure. "I have no husband," she said. She wanted to end that line of discussion as soon as possible.

Jesus said to her, "You are right when you say you have no husband. The fact is, you have had five husbands, and the man you now have is not your husband. What you have just said is quite true" (vv. 17-18). At this point all the woman's pretentions vanished completely, and, although she tried twice thereafter to change the subject (vv. 20 and 25), she knew that all her thoughts and actions were exposed before this man who was able to tell her all that she had ever done.

Not Allegory

It has been held quite widely by a number of New Testament scholars—perhaps in some cases to avoid the implications of Christ's supernatural insight and divinity—that the reference to the five husbands may be allegory; in fact, that the entire story may be allegorical. The basis for this theory lies in the fact that according to 2 Kings 17:29-31, when the original inhabitants of Samaria were exiled by the Assyrians in 721 B.C., people from five different places (each with their own gods) were brought in to replace them. According to this view, the woman would stand for Samaria. The five husbands would stand for the five false gods to whom, it could be said, the Samaritans had married themselves. The sixth man, to whom they were not legally married, would stand for Jehovah whom the Samaritans worshiped, but ignorantly.

This ingenious theory does not bear scrutiny. Thus, the teaching of the story about Christ's supernatural insight and the sinfulness of men and women stands.

In the first place, although it is true that people from five different cities are mentioned in 2 Kings 17:29-31, the fact is that when the gods of these people are mentioned in the same verses, it is not five that are listed but seven. The allegory breaks down at its most significant point. Second, as Leon Morris points out in his commentary, the false gods that are mentioned in 2 Kings were not introduced one after another, as the husbands would be, but were worshiped simultaneously. Third, it is inconceivable that John the evangelist would picture Jesus as speaking of the five false gods as legitimate husbands, while referring to Jehovah as the One with whom the people were living in adultery. The whole of the biblical tradition, which John knew, would reverse that.

No, the situation was real, and Jesus actually saw into the heart of the Samaritan woman. Do you realize that he also sees into your heart? It does not matter what your sin is—whether it is the sin of this woman, that of Moses, David, Peter, or merely the disobedience and rebellion that lurks in each of us. The Bible tells us that "nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13). He sees your heart. He knows all that you have done. Will you accept this? Will you acknowledge your sin before him? If you will, then God has already taken the first step necessary to bring you to him.

All Have Sinned

I know, as I say this, that for many the thought of sin is distasteful. Sin is unpopular, and Christians are often criticized for dwelling too much upon it. This is not because Christians love sin, however. It is simply because Christians are realists. They recognize that sin is an everyday experience and the number one problem of mankind. What is more, they recognize that the Bible everywhere insists upon this.

"The Scripture declares that the whole world is a prisoner of sin," writes Paul (Gal. 3:22). In 1 Kings 8, the chapter that contains King Solomon's great prayer at the dedication of the temple, Solomon declares, "There is no one who does not sin" (v. 46). David wrote, "They are corrupt, their deeds are vile; there is no one who does good" (Ps. 14:1). Psalm 143:2 declares, "No one living is righteous before you." Isaiah observed, "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:6). In the New Testament, in the first letter of the apostle John, we are admonished, "If we claim we have not sinned, we make him out to be a liar and his word has no place in our lives" (1 John 1:10).

This is also the burden of the first chapters of Paul's letter to the Romans. It is here, in fact, that we find the doctrine of the universality of man's sin stated in its most comprehensive form. Like a doctor's diagnosis these chapters probe man's spiritual illness; they conclude by declaring that all are incurably sick and that there is no hope for anyone apart from faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and in his atonement.

According to these chapters there are three types of men. The first type is what we would today call a hedonist, the man whose basis for life is materialism. Paul discusses him in Romans 1:1832. The hedonist does not acknowledge any standard other than those of his own making.

Consequently, he has determined to live for his own enjoyment and for whatever extraordinary pleasures he can find. "Why is this man a sinner?" Paul asks. "He is a sinner because he is on a path that is leading him away from God and therefore away from any real beauty, truth, or inner satisfaction." As Paul describes it, this path is marked by empty imaginings, darkened intellects, a profession of wisdom by one who is actually foolish, and finally a perversion of the worship of God that leads to a final abasement of man (vv. 21-23). In finding contemporary examples we do not have to look very far into the world around us.

What should a person do if he has been driving down a road to some destination but has taken a wrong turn? If he knows the country thoroughly, he could try to cut over to where he should be. But if he knew the country that well, he would not have been lost in the first place. Normally the only thing to do is to turn around and go back. It is the same spiritually. Some persons go very carefully down the path I have just been describing and never get far. Others abandon all caution and get quite far along, like the Samaritan woman. But the cure for each is the same. Each must first stop. This is known as repentance. Then he or she must turn around. This is conversion. And the person must go back. The hedonist is a sinner because the way he is taking leads him from God.

The second type of person, the type discussed in Romans 2:1-16, is what we would call a moral man. In Paul's day this was the Greek philosopher or professor of ethics. In our day it would be anyone who has high ethical standards but who does not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ as his Savior. Most people think of themselves in this category.

Why does God consider this person a sinner? The answer has two parts. First, he is a sinner because he has come short of perfection, which is God's standard of righteousness. It is the standard of the life of the Lord Jesus Christ, the only perfect human being who ever lived. Second, he is a sinner because he falls short of his own standards, no matter how high or low they may be.

Let me ask you this question. You probably do not consider yourself a hedonist. You consider yourself a moral person. Well, what is your standard of morality? You may say, "My standard is the Sermon on the Mount. Isn't that a good standard?" Yes, that is a good standard, but the question is not whether or not the Sermon on the Mount is a good standard. The question is: Do you live up to it? In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus said, "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). Are you perfect? Of course not! In that case, you are condemned by the standard of your own choosing.

You may not like that conclusion, of course. So you may say, "Well, I'll just lower my standard, if that is what the Sermon on the Mount involves. I'll make my standard the Golden Rule—'Do unto others as you would have others do unto you.'" Well, do you keep that standard? Do you always do to other people all that you would like done by them to yourself? Once again, the answer is no! So even the Golden Rule condemns you.

The point is that all of us are condemned by whatever standard we may erect, for none of us is able to live up to even the lowest standards of morality completely and consistently. We are all sinners, and deep within we know it. It is interesting and quite relevant that it was a recognition of these facts—that there are standards and that all men break them—that led as a first step to the conversion of C. S. Lewis, who began as an atheist and agnostic but became the most brilliant Christian apologist of our century.

There is one more type of person, however. Paul describes him in Romans 2:17-29. This is the man who would admit most if not all of what I have been saying and yet who would attempt to escape the conclusions by maintaining his faith in religion. "I have been baptized," he would say. "I am confirmed. I have given large sums of money to the church's support and served on its committees." "Well, good for you," Paul answers, "but you are still a sinner."

"Me, a sinner? Why?"

"Because God requires a complete perfection, including a change of the heart," Paul answers, "and none of the outward accouterments of religion—church membership, the sacraments, service, or stewardship —can do anything about it."

In the city of Basel, Switzerland, where I lived for three years, there is a carnival each year called Fashnacht. It is much like the Mardi Gras that is celebrated in predominantly Catholic countries or Catholic areas of a country, but it is held during the first week of Lent instead of before it, presumably to show that Basel is Protestant. Whatever the case, Fashnacht certainly does not show the city to be Christian in the biblical sense, for the carnival is always a time of riotous behavior in which the normally restrained and stolid Baselers let themselves go morally. Everyone knows what goes on. There are even jokes about it. But no one knows precisely who is doing what because the revelers wear masks. Each year during Fashnacht, however, the Salvation Army makes an attempt to challenge people to a higher standard of conduct by placing large posters around the city bearing the German inscription "Gott sieht hinter deine Maske." This means, "God sees behind your mask." The point is that God knows what is going on within and who is doing it.

The Lord Jesus Christ is looking into your heart and mind. What does he see? Does he see all that you have done and are doing, unconfessed and demanding his judgment? Must he say of you, "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one" (Rom. 3:10-12)? And is there no more to say? Or can he look at you as one who is indeed a sinner, but whose sin has been judged in his death and who now stands before him clothed in God's own righteousness?

This is the gospel. All have indeed "sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). But "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1).

The Invitation

I know that, as a result of this study, there may be some who have seen something of their own sinfulness, and I know that the first reaction upon seeing one's sin is to back off in despair. "If I am really so sinful," a person asks, "how can God love me? How can he have anything to do with me?" If you are saying that, I must not close without showing you one more phrase in Christ's words to the Samaritan woman. What did Jesus say to the woman? He said, "Go, call your husband"—that is true; it was an attempt to establish her sinfulness—but he finished the sentence by saying, "But when you have done that come back again."

"Go, call your husband." That was a word for her conscience. "Come back again." That was a word for her heart.

In the same way he speaks to you. You must see your need. You need to face the truth about your own condition. Yet you must also hear his warm invitation. "Come to me" (Matt. 11:28). The way is open. Say, "Yes, I am coming, Lord Jesus."

Chapter 47.
Salvation Is of the Jews

John 4:19-22

I do not know what Emily Post, Amy Vanderbilt, or Miss Manners would have thought of the Lord Jesus Christ if they had been living in the first Christian century and had heard him teaching the people and speaking to them. But I am sure that if they had overheard his conversation with the woman of Samaria, which we have been studying, at one point at least they would all have pronounced him bigoted and intolerable. Jesus had spoken to the woman of Samaria about her sin, reminding her that she was living with a man to whom she was not married, and this would be bad enough to one who thinks first of all of etiquette. But then, after the woman had obviously and politely tried to change the subject by asking the Lord's opinion on the rival Jewish and Samaritan claims about God and the forms of proper worship, Jesus actually claimed that in his day at least the Jewish way of worship was the only valid one and that the Samaritans knew nothing spiritually.

"Sir," the woman said, "I can see that you are a prophet. Our fathers worshiped on this mountain, but you Jews claim that the place where we must worship is in Jerusalem" (vv. 19-20). She was about to go on by asking which way was correct but Jesus anticipated her, interrupting. He said, "Believe me, woman, a time is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem. You Samaritans worship what you do not know; we worship what we do know, for salvation is from the Jews" (vv. 21-22).

If the question of the woman were asked in our day, no doubt many would attempt to sidestep it. Many preachers and even many theologians would answer by some vague appeal to ecumenicity or to the general areas of agreement among most of the world's religions. Some would be embarrassed. Jesus took none of these approaches. Instead of dodging the question or merely attempting to be polite, Jesus spoke forcefully, acknowledging that the Jews had filled a unique place in the history of salvation—in fact, that there was no salvation apart from them—but then pointing to the day when all national distinctions would pass away and when men and women would worship God in spirit and in truth on the basis of faith in his death and resurrection.

Why did he say this? To understand why Jesus answered as he did is to understand the way of salvation more perfectly and to move away from all forms of human religion—whether of Jew or Gentile—toward a true religion based on God's grace.

Rival Religions

Before we can come to this point, however, we need to understand something of the rivalry that existed between the Jews and the Samaritans. About 750 years before Christ's conversation with the woman, when the northern half of the Jewish nation, the nation of Israel, had been carried off into captivity by the Assyrians, the conquering people had moved other people back into the area to resettle it. This move is described in the Old Testament in 2 Kings 17, where we are also told that the settlers were sent out from the five city-kingdoms of Babylon, Cuth, Hamath, Ava, and Sepharah.

It is not possible to transport an entire population, of course. So the result was that some Jewish people remained. Perhaps they had hidden in caves, bribed their captors, or escaped captivity. Almost at once these Jews began to intermarry with the newcomers, thereby producing a race that was partially Jewish and partially Assyrian. For the orthodox Jew this was an almost unforgivable sin. It was, in fact, forbidden in the Old Testament. Therefore, in the eyes of the pure-blooded Jews who remained in the southern kingdom of Judah, those who remained in the north actually lost their right to be considered Jews at all and forfeited their heritage.

In time the same type of defeat that had resulted in the captivity of the northern kingdom also befell the south. The southern Jews did not lose their identity, however. For seventy years they were held in captivity by the Babylonians. Nevertheless, when the exiles returned from Babylon at the end of that period and began to rebuild their city and its temple, they were still Jewish and were proud of their heritage. Perhaps for this reason and perhaps also because of the teaching of the law, the southern Jews refused help in rebuilding the temple when such help was offered to them by the Samaritans in about 450 B.C. In anger the Samaritans then built their own temple on Mount Gerizim in Samaria, contrary to the law. This was the temple to which the Samaritan woman referred. Eventually this became a rival temple, and the religion of the Samaritans became a rival religion.

What was the status of this temple? What was the status of the Samaritan faith? These were the questions at issue, and it was these that Jesus was answering.

In answering them it is interesting that Jesus did not stress racial superiority. There could be no question of racial pride simply because Jesus was in Samaria to win the Samaritans.

Nevertheless, the Samaritan religion was a man-made religion, and Jesus would not allow the Samaritan woman to believe that any religion of human origin, a religion based on human ideas, is acceptable to Jehovah. Human religion was not acceptable then, and it is not acceptable today. Accordingly, salvation was of the Jews alone because only the Jews possessed a religion that had its origin in God. Moreover, it was only in Judaism, with its system of sacrifices and temple worship that there was any true sense of the holiness of God and of the necessity of a substitutionary sacrifice as the grounds of forgiveness and of an acceptable approach to him.

Since this is a difficult point, let me say it again in other terms. Salvation is always of God's grace, not of human merit; and since grace was offered to the sinner on the grounds of the death of an atoning sacrifice and since in Christ's time that sacrifice could only be offered at Jerusalem by a legitimate priest, a descendant of Aaron, it is obvious that there could be no salvation for anyone except through the Jewish priesthood which in turn was available only to a circumcised member of one of the tribes of Israel. Jesus was impressing this upon the woman, thereby reasserting the right of God to establish the means of approach to him and encouraging her to turn from any trust in human religions.

Gentile Salvation

I do not know whether the record of the conversation between Jesus and the woman of Samaria that we have in John 4 is the whole of the conversation. It may be only an attenuated version. But I do know that if Jesus had gone on to explain these truths to the woman, he could have drawn on three great examples from the Old Testament.

The first example he could have drawn upon was Ruth. Ruth was a Moabitess, a foreigner who had been married to the son of a Jewish woman named Naomi. She had met her husband in Moab, where Naomi and her sons had gone during a period of famine in Israel. The sons had died, and when Naomi decided to return to her own land Ruth, her daughter-in-law, determined to go with her. Ruth had apparently learned from Naomi during the years they were together, and she had come to worship Naomi's God. At first Naomi tried to persuade Ruth to remain in Moab, but Ruth would have none of it. Ruth replied, "Don't urge me to leave you or to turn back from you. Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your God my God" (Ruth 1:16). These are beautiful words, but I am afraid that the beauty of the words has kept many persons from noticing the far more important ordering of the thought. Ruth wanted to join Naomi in the true worship of Jehovah. But notice, she could not say "Your God will be my God" until she had first said "Your people will be my people." In her statement Ruth confessed her need for a change in nationality before there could be a change in her God.

A second example of this truth can be seen in the account of Naaman, the Syrian. He was a general of the most powerful state of his day. He was strong and respected. There is no reason to think that he was any less ruthless than any other military commander. He was feared. Yet he was also pitied, for somewhere along the way he had contracted leprosy, and there was no known cure.

Through a young Jewish slave girl, who had doubtlessly been captured during one of his raids, Naaman learned of the existence in Israel of Elisha who (he had been told) could cure him. He went to Palestine. But when Elisha refused even to come out to meet him and instead merely sent him word that he was to wash himself seven times in the Jordan, all the national pride of the general rose to the surface, and he expressed his scorn of the muddy river that could not even begin to compare, he said, with the beautiful rivers of his country. As he cooled down, however, a servant helped him to change his mind. "It's worth a try," the servant argued. "If Elisha had asked for a ton of gold, you would have given him that. Why not dip in the river? Try it. You've come a long way. It will cost you nothing." Naaman did and was cured.

Now, however, there follows the significant part of the story. Naaman did something strange. He asked for several sacks of dirt. Naaman explained, "Please let me, your servant, be given as much earth as a pair of mules can carry, for your servant will never again make burnt offerings and sacrifices to any other god but the Lord" (2 Kings 5:17).

Think what that means! We must imagine that the work is done and the caravan of horses with their riders, followed by the mules with their burden of dirt, returns to Syria. Word runs ahead that Naaman is returning and that he is cured of leprosy. There is a joyous reception when the travelers arrive. But then, before the night comes and Naaman retires, the dirt that has been brought from Israel is poured into a frame made to receive it, and Naaman takes his place upon the earth of Palestine to pray to Jehovah—a Gentile who is willing to come as a Jew, relying on the same grace that was shown by the Jews' God when he healed him.

The final story comes from Esther. It reveals the same truth. In Esther's day there had been a dirty little bit of anti-Semitism that arose because Haman, a high Persian official, hated a Jew named Mordecai. Esther, the adopted daughter of Mordecai, intervened, and the gallows built for Mordecai by Haman bore Haman's body instead. The people were saved. It was a great day, and there was much rejoicing. It was also a great demonstration of the power of the Jews' God to preserve them, and this fact caused many of the Persians to believe on him: "And many people of other nationalities became Jews because fear of the Jews had seized them" (Esther 8:17). What does that mean? It is simply the Old Testament's way of saying that many of the Persians were saved. They became Jews, being admitted to one of the Jewish tribes, and then were permitted to bring their sacrifices to a Jewish priest and to receive God's forgiveness on the ground of the death of the substitute.

Salvation for All

These three examples are enough to show that Jesus was entirely in line with the Old Testament tradition when he declared that before his time the Gentiles had to become Jews in order to be saved. But we must not overlook the fact that at the same time that he was reaffirming these truths, Jesus also predicted a change that was to come shortly. It is true that salvation was of the Jews, but soon the offer of salvation was to be broadened to include all persons—Jews and Gentiles—and the way of approach was to be revealed as faith in the only complete and perfect sacrifice that he alone would provide by dying for sinners.

God did not nullify his promises to Israel. He fulfilled them in Christ. Thus, the day came when the long period of preparation with its sacrifices and temple worship came to an end. At the very moment when Christ died there was an earthquake. The veil of the temple, which had divided the holy place of the temple from the Holy of Holies, through which only the high priest could pass—and that only once a year on the Day of Atonement—was torn in two from top to bottom. Thus God signified that henceforth he was done with sacrifices. The final sacrifice, Jesus of Nazareth, had been offered. The priesthood, too, was ended. Now only Christ was high priest. Even the temple was superceded, for now the only way to God was through Jesus.

Do you believe these things? If you do, you are today among those who can come boldly to the throne of grace through Jesus Christ and can find grace to help in your need. You do not have to make a pilgrimage to present your sacrifice. You do not need to change your race. All that you have to do is abandon your own efforts to obtain salvation and come to God by faith in him who declared himself to be the way, the truth, and the life (John 14:6). If you do, you will find him to be all that the Scriptures declared him to be. He is the Son of God—the Savior.

To Jew and Gentile

The Christian belief that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah who fulfilled all to which the sacrifices pointed cannot be entirely acceptable to those who are steeped in the Jewish religion and who wish to retain their Judaism. Nothing but a sellout to a watered-down doctrine of universalism will make the Christian religion universally popular. But at the same time Jewish people must recognize that apart from Jesus Christ and under the Old Testament laws, there is no way in this day for me, a Gentile, to approach the Holy One of Israel. To do that I would have to abandon my own nationality and then be initiated into one of the twelve tribes of Israel (which is impossible because their identity has been lost). I would then have to bring a lamb as an atonement for my sin to the high priest (who no longer exists) and have it sacrificed by him on the altar of a temple in Jerusalem at a site now occupied by a Mohammedan mosque.

There is no other way of salvation for a Gentile under the teaching of the Old Testament.
Salvation is of the Jews. So if Jesus is not the Messiah, the one through whom the blessing of Abraham is to come upon the nations, the goyim, then today all who cannot bring their sacrifices are lost. The veil still hangs before the holy presence of Jehovah; the wall of partition between the Jew and Gentile still stands. It is only through Jesus' shed blood, the blood of the perfect sacrifice, to which all the Old Testament sacrifices point, that I stand cleansed and spotless before God. It is only through him that I share with the believing Jew a vital and transforming access to God's presence.

At the same time the Gentiles must be reminded that the fact that Jesus was a Jew is itself a great and definitive blow against all anti-Jewish prejudice. Moreover, the fact that he endorsed the Old Testament must draw me toward it. To love the Lord Jesus Christ more is to love the Jew more.
It is to rejoice in God's continued and evident blessing upon the Jews, to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, and to look for the time when (according to the prophetic books of the Bible) God will again use the Jews to bring new and added blessing upon the nations.

Chapter 48.
How to Worship God

John 4:23-24

Christian worship is the most momentous, the most urgent, the most glorious action that can take place in human life."

These words by the noted Swiss theologian Karl Barth undoubtedly find an echo in the hearts of all who truly know God and earnestly desire to serve him, regardless of their opinion of Barth's theology. But in spite of the obvious truth that the worship of God is an important and even urgent imperative for Christians, it is a sad fact that in our day much that passes for worship is not worship at all, and many who sincerely desire to worship do not always know how to go about it or where to begin. "What is worship anyway?" some ask. "Who can worship? Where can one worship? How does one worship?" ask others.

One Bible student has written: "Thanks to our splendid Bible societies and to other effective agencies for the dissemination of the Word, there are today many millions of people who hold 'right opinions,' probably more than ever before in the history of the church. Yet I wonder if there was ever a time when true spiritual worship was at a lower ebb. To great sections of the church the art of worship has been lost entirely, and in its place has come that strange and foreign thing called the 'program.' This word has been borrowed from the stage and applied with sad wisdom to the type of public service which now passes for worship among us."

Are these words true, even in part? Are the questions I have just repeated genuine? If so, there is an answer for them all in the words of Jesus. Jesus said, "Yet a time is coming and has now come when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth, for they are the kind of worshipers the Father seeks. God is spirit, and his worshipers must worship in spirit and in truth" (John 4:23-24).

Worship Is Essential

Before we begin to look at these words in detail, however, we must first of all see that worship itself is an important subject and that these are important verses for dealing with it.

There are several ways of showing this. For instance, in Philippians 3:3 the apostle Paul speaks of worship as one of the three great marks that reveal the presence of the new nature within the Christian. He writes: "For it is we who are the circumcision, we who worship by the Spirit of God, who glory in Christ Jesus, and who put no confidence in the flesh." Most Christians would quickly acknowledge the last of these points. It is a question of holding to the true gospel. Many would also think highly of the second point, for joy is important. It is a mark of the Spirit, according to the fifth chapter of Galatians. I strongly suspect, however, that not many think of the worship of God as a mark of the presence of the new nature within. Yet in this verse it is included along with the other essentials.

Another way of making this point is to note that there are three great "musts" in John's Gospel. The first "must" occurs in 3:7, where Jesus says, "you must be born again." The second "must" is in verse 14 of the same chapter. There Jesus says, "The Son of Man must be lifted up." The verses we are studying give us the third "must," for they tell us that all who worship God "must worship in spirit and in truth." These three great doctrines—the necessity for the new birth, the necessity of Christ's death, and the necessity of true worship—belong together.

Perhaps it is not even irrelevant to point out that this is the major passage in which John deals with the nature and necessity of worship, for of the thirteen uses of the words "worship" or "worshiper" in John's Gospel, ten of them occur in this section, and it is only here that worship is actually discussed and defined.

Spiritual Worship

What is worship? Part of the answer is to be seen in the fact that if you and I had been living in England during the days of the early formation of the English language, between the period of Geoffrey Chaucer and William Shakespeare, we would not have used the word "worship" at all. We would have said "worth-ship," and we would have meant that in worshiping God we were assigning to God his true worth. Philologically speaking, this is the same thing as "praising" God or "glorifying" his name.

If someone should ask the two most important questions that follow from that definition, however—namely, "What is God's true worth?" and "How do we become aware of it?"—we are immediately brought to the heart of Christ's words to the Samaritan woman. For Jesus said that those who acknowledge God's true worth must do so "in spirit and in truth." In other words, they must do so "in truth" because truth has to do with what his nature is, and they must do so "in spirit" because they can only apprehend it spiritually.

Let me explain that a bit further. Many persons have been led astray in thinking that when Jesus spoke of "spirit" in this verse he was speaking of the Holy Spirit. I do not believe that this is the case. There is a sense, of course, in which we only come to worship God after the Holy Spirit has been at work in our hearts moving us to do so. But in this verse Jesus is not speaking of that. He is speaking of spirit generally (without the definite article), not the Holy Spirit, and he is teaching that in the age he was inaugurating by his death and resurrection the place of worship would not matter, for a man or a woman would not worship merely by being in the right place and doing certain right things. He would worship in his spirit, which could be anywhere.

I can make this even clearer by placing it in the context of the three parts of man's nature. Man is a trinity. He has a body, soul, and spirit. Jesus is saying that nothing is true worship of God except what takes place in man's spirit.

Many people worship with the body. This means that they consider themselves to have worshiped if they have been in the right place doing the right things at the right time. In Christ's day the woman thought this meant being either in Jerusalem, at the temple there, or on Mount Gerezim at the Samaritans' temple. In our day this would refer to people who think they have worshiped God simply because they have occupied a seat in a church on Sunday morning, or sung a hymn, or lit a candle, or crossed themselves, or knelt in the aisle. Jesus says this is not worship. These customs may be vehicles for worship. In some cases they may also hinder it. But they are not worship in themselves. Therefore, we must not confuse worship with the particular things we do on Sunday morning.

In addition, however, we must not confuse worship with feeling, for worship does not originate with the soul any more than it originates with the body. The soul is the seat of our emotions. It may be the case, and often is, that the emotions are stirred in real worship. At times tears fill the eyes or joy floods the heart. But, unfortunately, it is possible for these things to happen and still no worship to be there. It is possible to be moved by a song or by oratory and yet not come to a genuine awareness of God and a fuller praise of his ways and nature.

True worship occurs only when that part of man, his spirit, which is akin to the divine nature (for God is spirit), actually meets with God and finds itself praising him for his love, wisdom, beauty, truth, holiness, compassion, mercy, grace, power, and all his other attributes. William Barclay has written on this point, "The true, the genuine worship is when man, through his spirit, attains to friendship and intimacy with God. True and genuine worship is not to come to a certain place; it is not to go through a certain ritual or liturgy; it is not even to bring certain gifts. True worship is when the spirit, the immortal and invisible part of man, speaks to and meets with God, who is immortal and invisible."

Liturgy

Incidentally, the truth that we are to worship God in spirit also has bearing upon the question of the various types of liturgy used in Christian churches, for it means that, with the exception of liturgical elements that suggest wrong doctrine, there is no liturgy that in itself is either inherently better or worse than another. For any given congregation, one type of service will presumably be more valuable than another. But the decision regarding what that type of service will be ought to be arrived at—not by asking whether one likes emotional or nonemotional hymns, extemporaneous or read prayers, congregational responses or silence—in short, whether one prefers Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, or Quaker services—but by asking how effective the service is in turning the attention of the worshiper away from the service itself to God. In this respect an order of worship is to be evaluated on the same basis that we use to evaluate the preacher.

In thinking through this particular issue I have been helped by the concepts of C. S. Lewis. Lewis was a member of the Church of England and was accustomed to various forms of what we generally call a "liturgical" service. Nevertheless, Lewis did not plead for liturgy. He asked merely for what he called "uniformity," on the grounds that "novelty" in the worship service at best turns our attention to the novelty but may actually turn it to the one who is enacting the liturgy.

Lewis wrote, "As long as you notice, and have to count the steps, you are not yet dancing but only learning to dance. A good shoe is a shoe you don't notice. Good reading becomes possible when you need not consciously think about eyes, or light, or print, or spelling. The perfect church service would be one we were almost unaware of; our attention would have been on God." We should pray that God will use any form of church service in which we happen to be participating to that great and essential end.

Worship in Truth

Finally, we need to notice that the true worship of God is a worship not only in spirit but in truth. What does that mean? What does it mean to worship God "in truth"?

First, it means that we must approach God truthfully, that is, honestly or wholeheartedly. That is what Jesus was referring to in a negative way when he said of the people of his day, "These people honor me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me. ...they worship me in vain" (Matt. 15:8-9). According to Jesus, no worship is true worship unless there is an honesty of heart on the part of the worshiper. We must not pretend to worship. We must worship truthfully, knowing that our hearts are open books before God.

Second, we must worship on the basis of the biblical revelation. This is also implied in the verses I have just quoted. For the verse that begins "They worship me in vain" immediately goes on to condemn those who have substituted "rules taught by men" for the doctrines of Scripture. "Your word is truth," says the Scripture (John 17:17). So if we are to worship "in truth," as God commands us to do, our worship must be in accord with the principles and admonitions of this book.

When the Protestant Reformation first took place under Martin Luther in the early sixteenth century and the doctrines and principles of the Word of God, long covered over by the traditions and encrustations of ceremony of the medieval church, again came forth into prominence, there was an immediate elevation of the Word of God in Protestant services. Calvin particularly carried this out with thoroughness, ordering that the altars (long the center of the Latin mass) be removed from the churches and that a pulpit with a Bible upon it be placed in the center of the building. This was not to be on one side of the room, but in the very center, where every line of the architecture would carry the gaze of the worshiper to the Book that alone contains the way of salvation and outlines the principles upon which the church of the living God is to be governed.

Finally, to approach God "in truth" also means that we must approach God Christocentrically. This means "in Christ," for this is God's way of approach to him. Jesus himself signified this when he said to his disciples, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6). This is a difficult point for many to accept, of course. But it is precisely because of the difficulty that God has taken such pains to teach that this is the way of approach to him. We see this even in the Old Testament in the instructions given to Moses for the design of the Jewish temple.

What was the original tabernacle? It was not an edifice of great beauty or permanence. It had no stained-glass windows, no great arches. It was made of pieces of wood and animal skins. Nevertheless every part of it was significant. The tabernacle taught the way to God. Take that tabernacle with its altar for sacrifice, its laver for cleansing, its Holy Place, and its Holy of Holies, and you have a perfect illustration of how a person must approach God. The altar, which is the first thing we come to, is the cross of Christ. It was given to teach that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins and to direct attention to the Lamb of God who should come to take away the sins of the world. The laver, which comes next, is a picture of cleansing, which Christ also provides when we confess our sins and enter into fellowship with him. The table of shewbread, which was within the Holy Place, speaks of Christ as the bread of life. The altar of incense is a picture of prayer, for we grow by prayer as well as by feeding on Christ in Bible study. Behind the altar of incense was the great veil, dividing the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. This was the veil torn in two at the moment of Christ's death to demonstrate that his death was the fulfillment of all these figures and the basis of the fullness of approach to the Almighty. Finally, within the Holy of Holies was the ark of the covenant with its mercy seat upon which the high priest placed the blood of the lamb once a year on the Day of Atonement. There, symbolized by the space above the mercy seat, was the presence of God into whose presence we can now come because of the great mercy of God revealed in the death of Christ for us.

There is no other way to come to God. To come through Christ—the Christ of the altar, laver, shewbread, incense, veil, and mercy seat—is to come in truth. He is the truth. You must come in God's way and not in any way of human devising.

An Inexhaustible God

The wonder of Christian worship is that when we come to God in the way which he has established, we find him inexhaustible and discover that our desire to know and worship him further is increased. Bernard of Clairvaux was one who knew this. He wrote toward the middle of the twelfth century:

> Jesus, thou Joy of loving hearts,
> Thou Fount of life, thou Light of men,
> From the best bliss that earth imparts
> We turn unfilled to thee again.
>
> We taste thee, O thou living Bread,
> And long to feast upon thee still;
> We drink of thee, the Fountainhead,
> And thirst our souls from thee to fill.

When we so come, when we worship in that way, we find ourselves approaching what the compilers of the Westminster Shorter Catechism rightly described as the chief end of man. The catechism asks, "What is the chief end of man?" It answers, "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever."

Chapter 49.
"I Am He"

John 4:25-26

Did you ever stop to think that the character and accomplishments of a person can be summarized by the various names that are given to him during the course of his life? Or did you ever realize that it is sometimes possible to give a whole biography of a person through names alone?

Let me do this for the life of Julius Caesar, the great Roman general and emperor. The earliest name of Julius Caesar was Julius or Jules. As he grew older it would have been Julius Gaius, involving the family name. Titles were added that were earned throughout his career: soldier, general, quaestor, consul. He was elected Pontifex Maximus, Tribune, and Caesar. Finally, as the feeling of his contemporaries turned against him, Julius became an "ambitious ruler" and finally an "enemy of the people." A person who knows these titles as well as the details of how they were given to Caesar could easily sum up the whole career of the Roman emperor by means of them.

The same thing is true of the names of Jesus Christ. Only here the names are much more important. The names of Caesar are names given by men in recognition of his work. The names of Jesus are names given by God in order to reveal Christ's divine nature and the significance of his ministry. Thus, we know Jesus as the Word of God; the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world; the Son of God; the Son of man; the Savior; the Light of the world; the Lord; the Beloved; our great High Priest; the Conqueror; the King. Some of these titles have already been studied briefly in our survey of the first chapter of John's Gospel, where they occur. These are great names. No wonder Isaac Watts wrote in one of his hymns:

Join all the glorious names Of wisdom, love and power, That ever mortals knew, That angels ever bore: All are too mean to speak his worth, Too mean to set my Savior forth.

We come now to a name that is in some respects greater than them all.

"I AM THAT I AM"

We must remember at this point that Jesus had been talking to the woman of Samaria about her sin and of her need for "living water." She had tried to change the course of the conversation on several occasions, first by asking Jesus where it was that men and women ought to worship—in Jerusalem or in Samaria—and then by attempting to postpone any final commitments until the Messiah should come. The woman said, "I know that Messiah is coming. When he comes, he will explain everything to us." Jesus answered her briefly in one great sentence, "I who speak to you am he" (John 4:25-26). Apparently, this truth finally broke through to the woman's consciousness, and she left her water jar to go back to the city, calling, "Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?" (v. 29). The words of Jesus were undoubtedly the turning point in the woman's conversion.

Unfortunately, the full import of Christ's claim is obscured by the English translation. As we read the words, they seem to express no more than the claim: "Yes, I am the Messiah." That is important in itself, of course, and we shall come back to it. Nevertheless it is less than the words imply. Actually, the words are a tide. To be precise, Jesus did not really say, "I am he." The "he" has been added by the English translators. He simply said, "I am." The point of his claim is that the title "I am" was similar to, if not identical with, the great Old Testament name for God: Jehovah.

At this point we can understand why it is possible to call this title—"I am"—the greatest of all names for the Lord Jesus Christ. It is possible to understand why Paul wrote of him: "Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (Phil. 2:9-10). The name which is above all other names is "Lord," which means "Jehovah." This is in its turn an exact equivalent of the words "I am." This is God's own name. Thus, the name is above all earthly names, and it is at this name—Jehovah, Lord, "I am"—that all beings in heaven and earth shall bow.

How much of this registered with the woman of Samaria we do not know. We do know that several other times during his ministry Jesus used the words "I am" to refer to his deity. He once said to the Jews, "If you do not believe that I am the one I claim to be, you will indeed die in your sins" (John 8:24). That meant that they would not be saved unless they recognized that he was God. We also know that even the Jews themselves once took the word in this sense, for later in the same conversation, after Jesus had explained more clearly who he was and had said, "Before Abraham was born, I am" (v. 58), we read that those listening to Jesus attempted to stone him for blasphemy.

In all, the claim of Christ to be the great "I am" occurs seven times in John's Gospel (in 4:26; 6:20; 8:24, 28, 58; 13:19; 18:5), always as an expression of his claim to be God. And there are seven other very important instances in which the words are coupled with a noun describing him as the source of all good and the answer to all man's needs. Jesus said, "I am the bread of life" (6:35) ... "the light of the world" (8:12, 9:5) ... "the gate" (10:7, 9) ... "the good shepherd" (10:11, 14) ... "the resurrection and the life" (11:25) ... "the way and the truth and the life" (14:6) ... and "the true vine" (15:1, 5).

Obviously, not all of this was known to the woman or even could be known to her. Yet, the use of God's name—Jehovah—could not fail to be striking. "Can this be the Messiah?" she must have asked. "Is he a spokesman for God? Is he one who is so close to God that he can use God's name of himself?" No doubt she was pondering these questions as she went off to call others to the One "who told me everything I ever did."

The Messiah

Whatever may have been the woman's understanding of Christ's claim to be God—and she may have understood much more than we think—there can be no doubt that the woman fully understood that he was at the very least claiming to be the Messiah. The Samaritans were expecting the Messiah, as were the Jews. When the woman exclaimed, "When he comes, he will explain everything to us," she was probably thinking of the prophecy of the coming of the Messiah that is found in Deuteronomy 18:18. In that verse God told Moses of a coming prophet who should tell the people "all things."

Actually, in some ways the Samaritan expectation of the Messiah was purer than that of the Jews themselves, for it did not have the political overtones that the idea had in Judaism. Jesus was always careful not to admit to being the Messiah in the sense the Jews gave it. Although the Samaritan view was imperfect, it was not false. They looked for a prophet. Thus, Jesus did accept the title when they gave it to him.

In Hebrew the word mashiach, which gives us the word "Messiah," means "the anointed one," as does the Greek word "Christ." This in turn refers to the fact that during certain periods of Old Testament history a man chosen by God for a special ministry was consecrated to that ministry by a ceremony in which his head was anointed with oil. That was the way in which kings were set apart for their royal office, for instance. To give one example, it was the way in which Samuel signified God's choice of the young shepherd boy, David, to be the future king, replacing the disobedient King Saul (1 Sam. 16:13; cf. 10:1). This was the way the high priests were installed in their offices (cf. Exod. 28:41). It was even true that on some occasions at least prophets were also anointed, for Elijah anointed his successor Elisha with oil before he himself was taken up into heaven (1 Kings 19:16). The anointed one—whether prophet, priest, or king— was a person set apart by God for a special task.

In time this general meaning of "messiah" acquired a more specific one, for God had promised to send a deliverer who would embody everything that the previous anointing could only faintly symbolize. He would be a great prophet, for he would fulfill God's words to Moses: "I will raise up for them a prophet like you from among their brothers; I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him" (Deut. 18:18). He would be a great priest, for he would present the perfect sacrifice for man's sin. Finally, he would be a great king, for he would reign forever on the throne of King David (2 Sam. 7:11-16).

A prophet! A priest! A king! This was what Jesus claimed in his conversation with the woman of Samaria. He claimed that all the promises concerning a deliverer of Israel and of the nations were fulfilled in him. He was the One for whom the human race had been waiting.

Two Genealogies

Either Jesus of Nazareth is God's Messiah, as he claimed to be, or else there will never be a Messiah. The evidence is in the two genealogies of Jesus found in Matthew and Luke, for according to these accounts, Jesus exhausts all messianic lines of descent from King David.

This proof of Jesus' messiahship has been set forth by many scholars, especially in the early centuries of church history. It has been stated since by James Orr of Scotland. Let me quote from a more recent and particularly lively statement by Donald Grey Barnhouse. "First... there [are] two genealogies. The lines [of descent] run parallel from Abraham to David, but then Matthew comes down to Jesus by way of Solomon, the son of David, while Luke comes down to Jesus by way of Nathan, the son of David. In other words, the two genealogies are the lines of two brothers and the children become cousins___The whole point of the difference lies in the fact that Solomon's line was the royal line and Nathan's line was the legal line.

"For example, the former king of England had an older brother, now the Duke of Windsor, who had a prior claim to the throne of Britain. Suppose that Windsor had been the father of a son by a real queen before he abdicated. It can readily be seen that such a child might be a strong pretender to the throne in case there was no other heir apparent. George VI is in the royal line for he has reigned; any child of Windsor might claim to be in a legal line. Nathan was the older brother of Solomon, but the younger brother took the throne. Nathan's line ran on through the years, and ultimately produced the virgin Mary. Solomon's line ran on through the years and ultimately produced Joseph. Matthew does not say that Joseph begat Jesus, but that he was the husband of Mary of whom was born Jesus (Matt. 1:16). And Luke uses a word for son that includes what we should call a son-in-law.

"But the greatest proof of all lies in one of the names in the account of Matthew: the name Jechonias. It is that name that furnishes the reason for the inclusion of the genealogy of Jesus' step-father, for it proves that Joseph could not have been the father of Jesus, or if he had been, that Jesus could not have been the Messiah. In the use of that name there is conclusive evidence that Jesus is the son of Mary and not the son of Joseph. Jechonias was accursed of God with a curse that took the throne away from any of his descendants. 'Thus saith the Lord,' we read in Jeremiah 22:30, 'write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling anymore in Judah.' Not one of the seven sons (1 Chron. 3:17-18) of this man ever possessed the throne. No carnal son of this man could have been king because of the curse of God. If Jesus had been the son of Joseph, he would have been accursed and could never have been the Messiah.

"On the other hand, the line of Nathan was not the royal line. A son of Heli would have faced the fact that there was a regal line that would have possessed the crown and would have contested any claim that came from the line of Nathan. How was the dilemma solved? It was solved in a manner that is so simple that it is the utter confusion of the agnostics who seek to tear the Bible to pieces. The answer is this: the line that had no curse upon it produced Heli and his daughter the virgin Mary and her son Jesus Christ. He is therefore eligible by the line of Nathan and exhausts that line. The line that had a curse on it produced Joseph and exhausts the line of Solomon, for Joseph's other children now have an elder brother who, legally, by adoption, is the royal heir. How can the title be free in any case? A curse on one line and the lack of reigning royalty in the other.

"But when God the Holy Spirit begat the Lord Jesus in the womb of the virgin without any use of a human father, the child that was born was the seed of David according to the flesh. And when Joseph married Mary and took the unborn child under his protecting care, giving him the title that had come down to him through his ancestor Solomon, the Lord Jesus became the legal Messiah, the royal Messiah, the uncursed Messiah, the true Messiah, the only possible Messiah. The lines are exhausted." Barnhouse concludes by observing that "any man that ever comes into this world professing to fulfill the conditions will be a liar and the child of the devil."

Is Jesus your Messiah? He is the only Messiah you will ever have. Come to him. Come to him now! If you do, you will find that he is able to give you new life and satisfy you fully.

A Lesson in Patience

Let me make one more point in closing: the name "Messiah" includes a lesson in patience. For it is a name that is linked to the expectations of those with whom God had been dealing for the thousands of years of Jewish history. When Adam and Eve sinned God came to them in grace, clothing them with skins and promising a deliverer who would come from the seed of the woman. They looked for the Messiah. God appeared to Abraham, promising that out of his loins would come one that should bring blessing to Israel and the nations. Abraham looked for the Messiah. God appeared to the prophets and through them repeated the promise to the Jewish people. They looked for the Messiah. In Christ's day people were still looking: Simeon, Anna, Elizabeth, and others. For all these long years there had been no fulfillment. It was only at the end of this period of waiting that God's Messiah actually came and fulfilled the promises given.

The great New Testament scholar B. F. Westcott has written: "It cannot have been for nothing that God was pleased to disclose his counsels, fragment by fragment, through long intervals of silence and disappointment and disaster. In that slow preparation for the perfect revelation of himself to men which was most inadequately apprehended till it was finally given, we discern the pattern of his ways. As it was in the case of the first advent, even so now he is guiding the course of the world to the second advent. We can see enough in the past, to find a vantage ground for faith; and, when the night is deepest and all sight fails, shall we not still endure, like the men of old time, as seeing the invisible?...

"By that title 'Christ' God teaches us to wait. ...By that title 'Christ' God teaches us to watch. ...By that title 'Christ' God teaches us to hope. It is the pledge of his personal love shown through all the ages. It is the pledge of the final establishment of his kingdom of which the sure foundations are already laid. False hopes, selfish fancies, earthly ambitions were scattered by Christ's first coming. But he brought that into the world which gives their only reality to all the emblems of power. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. Life if we look at it in Christ is transfigured: Death if we look at it in Christ is conquered. When we interpret what he has done through the church in preparation for his second coming by the light of what he did through Israel in preparation for his first coming, we can wait and watch and hope, certain of this in all checks and storms and griefs that he shall reign till all enemies are put under his feet."

If you will trust the Lord Jesus Christ as your Messiah and Savior, he will save you and will transform you into one who shows no anguish about an unknown future but instead shows forth a quiet confidence in God.

Chapter 50.
The Cry of New Life

John 4:27-30

It is not at all surprising that the disciples were amazed and bewildered when they returned from the city of Sychar to Jacob's well and found the Lord Jesus Christ talking with the Samaritan woman. According to their standards of conduct, this was highly irregular. It was bad enough that she was a woman. The rabbis had said, "Let no one talk with a woman in the street, no, not with his own wife." They had argued, "Each time that a man prolongs conversation with a woman he causes evil to himself, desists from the law, and in the end inherits Gehinnom." But beyond this, in addition to being a woman, the person to whom Jesus was talking was a looseliving Samaritan, a sinner. And the disciples knew, as did everybody, that "Jews do not associate with Samaritans."

This was more than ample ground for the surprise and bewilderment that John tells us overtook the disciples. But the amusing part of the story is in the fact that the disciples would have been far more surprised and bewildered if they had been able to see what had taken place in the life of the woman as a result of the Lord's conversation with her.

Rebirth

What had happened was that the woman had been born again. She is the first clear example in the Gospel. She had come down the hill a child of Adam's race, thinking only of the life she had known and of her very mundane need for more water. Instead she had met the second Adam, Jesus, who had filled her with a desire for a quality of life that she had never dreamed of and who had revealed himself to her as the One through whom that life is imparted to men and women. As a result of Christ's words the woman believed on him and became his witness.

How do we know that the woman of Samaria had been born again? We know it because of the changes that took place in her. Sometime ago I was reading a book on childbirth that included within it a partial listing of the changes that take place in a baby's life during the first few seconds after its birth. I am told that there are dozens of these changes. To begin with, eyes that have previously been accustomed to darkness must adjust themselves to the light. A body that was used to temperatures of nearly 100 degrees Fahrenheit within the mother must adapt to temperatures approximately 20 degrees lower. The circulation of the infant's blood changes, no longer flowing through the umbilical cord, as it did when the child was in the womb, but instead flowing through the lungs. A valve in the heart, which had been open until birth, must close permanently so that the used blood and fresh blood circulating through the heart will not mingle. Lungs must fill with air and begin their lifelong function. These and many other changes involving the nose, throat, digestive tract, and skin, must all take place within a few seconds of birth if the baby is to live its new life and be healthy.

In the same way, there are certain changes that must take place within the life of the one who has been born again spiritually. These took place in the life of the Samaritan woman, and since they took place we know that she was converted. These changes must also occur in the life of those who are born again in our day. If they do not take place, there are grounds for questioning whether the birth from above has occurred.

Confession of Christ

The first thing that the doctor or nurses attending upon the birth of the baby want to hear is a cry. The cry of the child is evidence to the doctors that air has entered the lungs and that the baby has begun to breathe. This is the same spiritually. When a man or a woman is born again, the first thing that any Christian should desire to hear is the cry of new life, evidence that the breath of God has come into the person.

This is why the Bible speaks in many places about the need for a public confession of faith in Jesus Christ. It is not true that the birth of the child of God depends upon the outward confession, as if a person needs to confess Christ before God will receive him into his family. It is rather the other way around. We confess because we have been born again. At the same time it is equally untrue that a confession of Jesus Christ is optional. Some persons think that they can be secret believers, but the Word of God never considers this a possibility. What does the Word of God say? "Whoever acknowledges me before men, I will also acknowledge him before my Father in heaven. But whoever disowns me before men, I will disown him before my Father in heaven" (Matt. 10:32-33). "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:9-10).

It is at this point that we find the greatest contrast between Nicodemus, whose story is told in John 3, and the woman of Samaria, whose story is told here in chapter 4. So far as any human being could judge, Nicodemus was, of the two persons, the one who was most interested in spiritual things. He came to Jesus, after all; the woman did not come.

Christ sought the woman. Nicodemus asked Christ the first question; the woman was approached by Jesus. Nicodemus actually asked how one could be saved, while the woman apparently tried to avoid the same point when it was involved in Christ's questions. To all appearances Nicodemus was the more sincere and spiritually oriented person. Yet there is not the slightest evidence that he actually believed, while the woman showed her faith in every aspect of her speech and conduct.

Nicodemus had heard a great sermon on the new birth, but there was no personalized confession. We see him twice more in John's Gospel, but again the same statement is true. In chapter 7 we are told how the Jewish leaders were plotting to take Christ's life. Nicodemus intervened, "Does our law condemn anyone without first hearing him to find out what he is doing?" (John 7:51). This was a good point. It was an argument for civil liberties. We can applaud it. But it was not confession by Nicodemus of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as his Savior, and that alone is what would evidence the new birth. Similarly, after Christ's death Nicodemus came with Joseph of Arimathaea to embalm the dead body (John 19:39), but many unbelievers would do as much out of guilt or sentimentality.

Nicodemus may have believed—may have believed, I say—but once again we have no evidence for it. We fail to hear the cry that is the evidence of the breath of God within the human being.

It is so different with the woman of Samaria. She had not wanted to be saved. She did not even want to talk with Jesus on a personal level. Still she was born again, and she proved it immediately by departing for the city of Sychar with the personal invitation and testimony, "Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?" (John 4:29). Jesus had revealed himself to her as the Messiah. She believed his testimony, and the claim that the Messiah had come quite naturally became the core of her testimony. "The Messiah is here," she was saying.

Changes of Values

The story of the conversion of the woman of Samaria also gives us a second evidence of the fact that she had been born again. She had a change of values, a change in her interests. John indicates it beautifully when he tells us, "Then, leaving her water jar, the woman went back to the town and said to the people..." (v. 28).

I like this personal touch by John who recounts the story. The fact that John tells us that the woman left her water jar is important on one level, at least, as evidence that the story is being told by an eyewitness. This is the sort of thing John often notices and reports—as in the first chapter, in which he reports the hours of the day at which the two disciples stopped to spend the night with Jesus, or that it was night when Judas left the upper room to betray his master, or the fact that the disciples caught 153 fish after Jesus had told them where to cast their nets when he met with them in Galilee after his resurrection. Such details are the mark of the eyewitness; yet the observation by John that the woman left her water jar behind has more significance than its merely being further evidence of John's reliability.

Think how well this fits the story. From one point of view the story is all about water. The woman had come for literal water. There had been a discussion of wells and water. Christ had offered her living water. Now having found the water that alone satisfies the soul, the woman thinks no more of her water jar.

I wonder if you have experienced a change in your life and values as a result of pondering the truths of the gospel. I do not mean, "Have you been totally transformed overnight?" That does not often happen, although it can. Generally, the Christian life is one of growth, just as a baby must grow through childhood, adolescence, and into adult life. I do not mean, "Have you been totally transformed?" I mean, has there been at least a partial transformation of your values? Are you different now since you have believed? Are you being changed?

This is one of the great themes of John's Gospel. It is true that John is very much concerned that there be a vigorous verbal witness to the Lord Jesus Christ. But at the same time he is equally aware that the believer's life must back up the verbal witness. This theme emerges quite strongly in the final discourses of Jesus just before his crucifixion. In those discourses Jesus says that the disciples are to be one among themselves, just as he and the Father are one (John 14:20; 17:11, 21-22). They are to be committed to their task "in truth" (John 17:19). They are to do the truth (John 3:21; 1 John 1:6-7). They are to love one another (John 15:17). They are to keep his commandments (John 14:15). At every point the reality of the new life is to show itself in the life of the believer.

If this is not true of you, perhaps you need to leave the water jars of your old desires and interests in order to bear a vigorous and believable witness to the Lord Jesus.

Concern for the Lost

The final proof of a genuine change in the woman of Samaria is a new concern on her part for others. She had a verbal confession followed by a change in values. Now she had also a concern for the lost. Previously she had known many of the people of Samaria. Some of them she had known too well. But she had never been concerned for them. Probably they had often used her, at least some of them had. She had used them. Now for the first time she was concerned for their salvation. On the basis of the things she had learned she was now overflowing with a desire for them to meet Jesus. We are told: "Then, leaving her water jar, the woman went back to the town and said to the people, 'Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?' They came out of the town and made their way toward him" (John 4:28-30).

What is it that actually gave this woman a concern for those who had been close to her? Someone might answer, "Gratitude, gratitude for what Jesus had done for her." But gratitude would have kept her near Jesus at the well. It would not have sent her to the city. Someone else might answer, "A new awareness of who Jesus was." But certainly this alone would only have encouraged her to discover more about him. Someone might argue that it was "satisfaction at the way he had answered her questions." But again this would hardly have made her a soul winner. All these reactions, good as they were, would only have kept the woman of Samaria near Jesus.

What made her want to share her discovery? There is only one answer. It was love, the love of the Lord Jesus already beginning to spring up within her. She had learned of this love from Christ. He had loved her, a sinful woman. Now she was to love as he loved. Before, she had loved in one sense only. It was an imperfect, human love. Perhaps it was even largely sexual. Now she was able to love with a measure of the love with which Christ had loved her. This was a divine love, and it changed her completely.

Let me tell you how the gospel first came to Korea, the only Far Eastern country where today there is a substantial Christian population (in excess of 25 percent). Robert J. Thomas, a Welshman, was a colporteur working in China for the Scottish Bible Society. In the course of his work he learned that the Korean language is based on Chinese and that, as a result, the Korean intellectuals could read it. His main responsibility was toward the millions in China, of course. But the love of Christ for the Koreans constrained him, and he determined to push on to that country. An American ship called the General Sherman was sailing to Pyongyang, a large city in the north. He boarded it. As the ship drew near Pyongyang a sharp fight broke out between the officers of the American ship and the Korean coast guard. The ship was burned in the conflict, and all the passengers were killed. The death of Thomas was unusual. As the ship and the passengers were sinking, he struggled to reach the shore and staggered up out of the water, his arms filled with books. They were Bibles. He thrust these into the hands of the Koreans who clubbed him to death. It was through such love that the gospel first came to Korea in the year 1866.

The Bible sets this pattern for us when it declares, "For Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again" (2 Cor. 5:14-15). Do you love because Christ first loved you?

Are you burdened to share the gospel with others who have not yet believed on our Savior?

The Invitation Repeated

Finally, I wonder if you have ever thought about the specific invitation to the men of the city offered by the Samaritan woman. We have already been thinking of three great words each beginning with the letter C. They are the evidences of the fact that she had been born again —a confession of faith in Christ, a change of values, a concern for the lost. Three great words beginning with C! But here is a fourth, the word "come." This was the heart of her invitation, and she had learned it (as she had learned everything else) from Jesus. What had Jesus said to her?

Jesus had said, "Go, call your husband, and come back" (v. 16). Now she, who had come, repeated the invitation, "Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?" (v. 29).

Come! This is a great word of the Christian gospel. It has brought peace to millions of restless hearts and satisfaction to many that were empty and lonely.

Think of the great verses that contain it. It was God's word to Abraham, "Come into the land which I shall show thee" (Acts 7:3 KJV). It was God's call to Moses to be Israel's deliverer, "Come, I will send you to Egypt" (Acts 7:34). David wrote, "Come and see the works of the Lord, the desolations he has brought on the earth" (Ps. 46:8). God spoke through Isaiah, saying, "Come now, let us reason together ... though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they are red as crimson, they shall be like wool" (Isa. 1:18). The angels spoke the word to all skeptics as they pointed the disciples to the empty tomb, "Come and see the place where he lay" (Matt. 28:6). It was Christ's invitation, "Come, follow me" (Mark 10:21). "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). Finally, it will be the song of the angels as they invite the redeemed to the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev. 19:17) and of Jesus himself as he says to his own, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world" (Matt. 25:34).

If you have heard that invitation from the lips of the Lord, it is your privilege and duty to pass that word on. As in the case of the woman of Samaria, God's "Come!" must become our "Come!" Come! It is the greatest invitation in the universe. Won't you come? If you have already come, won't you share the invitation with another?

Chapter 51.
Christ, the Soul Winner

John 4:30

When Jesus Christ told his disciples that they were to "Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28:19), the Lord was giving them marching orders for the church. They were to be his witnesses. They were to carry the gospel everywhere. When this is said the questions immediately arise: But what constitutes the Christian's witness? And how can a Christian witness? The first of these questions was answered when we considered the witness of John the Baptist, recorded in the first chapter of John's Gospel. The second question can be answered in the context of Christ's dealings with the woman of Samaria recorded in chapter 4.

Previously we noted that a genuine Christian witness consists of three things (see the chapters on John 1:19-51). First, the witness must realize that he has no independent importance in himself. He must know that he is not the answer to man's problems. Second, he must know that Jesus is the answer and must point men and women to him. Third, the witness must point others to Christ with the express intention of having them believe on him. John the Baptist did each of these things well, and this made him the first great example of a witness to Jesus Christ in John's Gospel.

It is entirely possible that a person might understand these truths and even want to witness to Jesus Christ, however, and yet not know how. He might say: I know what I should do, but how do I do it? How do I show that Jesus is the answer to the kid next door who is on drugs? How do I get my sophisticated roommate to admit her need for Jesus Christ? How do I get the mechanic who works on my car to listen to my testimony? How do I overcome the built-in hostility toward the gospel by those who work with me every day? What words do I use to talk about Christ to my wife, my husband, my children, or my friends? If you have ever asked these questions or are still asking them, then a study of the way in which Jesus related to the woman of Samaria should be of help to you and should allow you to build upon the truths we have already considered.

As I look at Christ's dealings with the woman of Samaria, I see five great principles emerging. We can learn from these principles. Moreover, if we do, we will experience results similar to those recorded by John. We are told that many of the Samaritans "came out of the town and made their way toward him" (John 4:30).

The Sinner's Friend

The first great principle is this: Be a friend to those you are trying to win. Jesus showed himself a friend to those who were lost. He is described as having been a friend of publicans and sinners; this (although intended critically) was good reporting. Jesus could have kept aloof from mankind, just as we can keep aloof. But he would have won no one that way. Instead, Jesus went to the sick, lost, lonely, distressed, and perishing, and moved among them as a friend. In this story we find him in the woman's country, at the woman's city, sitting on the woman's well (vv. 5-6).

There is an illustration of this basic fact about the Lord Jesus in one of the books by Watchman Nee, the Chinese evangelist. Nee had been talking to another Christian in his home. They were downstairs, as was his friend's son. The friend's wife and mother were in an upstairs room.

All at once the little boy wanted something and called out to his mother for it.

"It's up here," she said. "Come up and get it."

He cried out to her, "I can't, Mummy; it's such a long way. Please bring it down to me."

He was very small. So the mother picked up what he wanted and brought it down to him. It is just that way with salvation. No one is able to meet his own need spiritually, but the Lord Jesus Christ came down to us so our need could be met. Nee writes, "Had He not come, sinners could not have approached Him; but He came down in order to lift them up."

I wonder if you are like that in your witnessing? Do you keep aloof or do you go to others? Another way of asking the same thing is to ask whether or not you have contact with nonChristians socially. Do you go to their homes, sit in their kitchens, ask them their interests?

A great deal of our difficulty in this area comes from the fact that Christians have often looked at the world as if it would inevitably get them dirty if they should get into it. They have taken verses like 2 Corinthians 6:17—"Therefore come out from them and be separate"—as meaning that Christians are to have no dealings with the world, rather than seeing that the words only have to do with avoiding conformity to the world, not isolation from it. Jesus did not teach isolation, and he did not practice it. He said in his great prayer for us recorded in John 17, "My prayer is not that you take them out of the world, but that you protect them from the evil one" (v. 15). When he departed for heaven he left his disciples in the world to evangelize it.

I am convinced that we need very practical ways of displaying friendship with the unbelievers we contact—the friendship that was so evident in the life of Jesus. For a start you might invite a number of non-Christian friends into your home for dinner. You might go to a concert with them. You might take in a sports show. Why not befriend your coworkers? Join a club, a choral society, a civic organization. It is not even a loss to go shopping together or invite your friends in for coffee. These are only beginning suggestions. If you are serious about taking the gospel to the lost, the Lord will show you other fruitful avenues of getting to know non-Christians. Just remember: Take the initiative and be friendly.

Ask Questions

Second, ask questions. It is never a bad move to ask questions. As we read the story of Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman, we discover that this is precisely what he did, and that he did it at the beginning of the conversation. He asked for a drink (v. 7). Looking at the conversation from the outside, as we do look at it, this is almost amusing. The woman was the one with the needs; she had the real questions. Jesus was the One with the answers. Nevertheless, Jesus humbled himself by asking her for a favor and so established an immediate and genuine point of contact.

Moreover, there were two important consequences as the result of his asking the woman for something. First, he aroused her interest. Dale Carnegie reminds us in his very successful book, How to Win Friends and Influence People, that the voice any person likes to hear best is his own. Jesus got the woman of Samaria talking. Her talking put her in a good mood (perhaps even changed her mood if, indeed she had arrived at the well shortly after being pushed off the path by Peter, as in an earlier study I indicated may have been the case). Out of her good mood the woman then clearly developed a favorable interest in Jesus. She must have found herself thinking, "My, what an interesting person this is! How polite! And what discrimination he must have to be interested in me!"

The second consequence of the Lord's asking her a question is that the woman found her curiosity aroused. He had asked her a question; she found it natural to begin to ask him a series of questions.

Let me state this again in a slightly different way. People are always full of questions, many of them religious questions. If you can get them to express these questions through yourself asking questions, by the grace of God you have already accomplished a great deal in your witness and God will use the aroused interest to point the one asking the questions to Jesus. Paul Little has written correctly about provoking such questions, "Once the non-Christian takes the first step in initiative, all pressure goes out of any conversation about Jesus Christ." He adds that thereafter "it can be picked up at the point where it is left without embarrassment."

Something to Give

Third, offer something relevant. Jesus offered the woman something related quite directly to her need. In one sense the offer was always of himself, of course. Yet to aging Nicodemus Jesus spoke of himself as one who offers new life, a new beginning (John 3:3). He spoke of himself as light to the man who had been born blind (John 9:5). To the woman the same offer was couched in the metaphor of water. He said, "Everyone who drinks this water will be thirsty again, but whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life" (vv. 13-14).

Most Christians need to learn from this principle. It will not do for us to witness about the transmission and reliability of the Bible if the person we are talking to is a young woman who isn't interested in that but who is afraid she will end up an "old maid" if she becomes a Christian. We must share Christ's offer to guide our lives and enrich them in whatever way he leads us. It will not be much use for us to speak about the power of Jesus Christ to deliver a person from the grip of drugs or alcohol if the man we are speaking to is a disciplined scientist whose greatest hang-up is his suspicion that other scientists have disproved Christianity. We need to offer him the challenge of searching the Scriptures himself to see whether these things are so and to encourage him to test Christ's claims. Above all we must not present our message in the language of the last century or in cliches that have no meaning to most of the non-Christian world.

Most people are thinking of their own needs. We must offer Jesus to them in ways that relate to those needs.

Good News

Fourth, stress the good news. Show that the gospel of Jesus Christ offers comfort. This does not mean, I am sure you realize, that we are totally to overlook sin. Jesus did not do that. He brought the woman to the point of recognizing her sin by his reference to the issue of her husbands. Nevertheless, even as he gently uncovered the sin he offered comfort, for he coupled his inquiry into her marital status with the invitation to come again to him (v. 16).

Unfortunately, it is true that we often do exactly the opposite in witnessing to non-Christians. The comfort of the gospel is there; but we forget the comfort, in our zeal to expose (and, I am afraid, often condemn) the sin. For instance, imagine a situation in which a non-Christian offers a Christian a drink at a party. Aren't there thousands of Christians who would immediately reply, "No, thank you. I don't drink. I'm a Christian"? They then think that they have offered a splendid witness to Jesus Christ, when actually they have really only succeeded in condemning the nonChristian. At the same time, they would have given him the wrong idea that nondrinking is somehow a very important part of Christianity. Nondrinking may be an important part of their Christian life. But the point I am making is that the statement "I don't drink; I'm a Christian" is no more intelligible to the unbeliever than his saying to you, when you ask him to go to a football game, "No thanks. I don't go to football games; I'm a non-Christian."

There are two real dangers in this. The first is the danger that in getting our witness tangled up in such issues, we miss the fact that our friend may be quite desperately lonely—perhaps that is why he drinks—and never suggest a cure for his loneliness. Or we may miss his feeling of guilt, sorrow, meaninglessness, or whatever it may be.

The second danger is that in focusing attention on some aspect of the nonbeliever's conduct, we may actually give the impression that he must improve himself before he can come to Jesus. This is quite wrong. We will never want to give the impression that when we come to Jesus we can do as we please, that we can sin that grace might abound. That would be untrue also. But neither do we want to suggest that there must be self-reformation before a man or a woman can come.

In England, in the early part of the nineteenth century, there was a woman who had heard the gospel but who had never been able to respond to it personally. She had come from a Christian home. She understood the faith. But still she could not come. She considered herself unworthy. One day she wandered into a very small church and sat down in the back. She was almost in despair and hardly heard the words of the elderly man who was speaking. Suddenly, right in the middle of his address, the preacher stopped and, pointing his finger at her, said, "You, Miss, sitting there at the back, you can be saved now. You don't need to do anything!" His words struck like thunder in her heart. She believed at once, and with her belief there came an unimagined sense of peace and real joy. That night Charlotte Elliott went home and wrote the well-known hymn:

> Just as I am, without one plea,
> But that thy blood was shed for me,
> And that thou bidd'st me come to thee,
> O Lamb of God, I come, I come.

If we are to witness for Jesus Christ, we must never give the impression that a person must first become worthy of the gospel. Nor should we forget that there is comfort in the gospel for sinners.

Point to Jesus

The fifth principle is that we must end by confronting the individual with his responsibility to decide for or against Jesus Christ. Jesus said, "I who speak to you am he" (v. 26). Well, was he or wasn't he? This was the decision placed before the woman. It must be the same in our witnessing. If we do not get to the point of focusing on Jesus himself, our witness is incomplete. It is not yet a full witness. If we do not get to the point of showing that a decision is necessary, our witness is inadequate.

These are the principles of how we should witness, from the story of Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman. First, be friendly. Second, ask questions. Third, offer that which most suits the individual's needs. Fourth, stress the good news. And fifth, show that the person must decide either for or against the Lord Jesus.

What will happen if you do that? I believe that the results will be similar to those that the Lord Jesus experienced in Samaria. The first obvious results were in the life of the woman. About midway through the conversation, the woman acknowledged her need, saying, "Sir, give me this water so that I won't get thirsty" (v. 15). A few moments later she confessed her sin, "I have no husband" (v. 17). Third, she began to show a quickening of spiritual intelligence: "I can see that you are a prophet" (v. 19). Fourth, she affirmed her faith in the Lord Jesus: "Could this be the Christ?" (v. 29). Finally, she took to her town the good news that she had received.

You may think that the people among whom you work or with whom you associate may be difficult specimens to speak to. That may be true. So was the woman. Yet she became the first great witness after John the Baptist. It may be that God will use your witness to reach one who in his turn may evangelize an entire generation.

Chapter 52.
The Secret of Satisfaction

John 4:31-34

In Spain there is a very old proverb that says, "All laws go the way that kings desire." Behind that proverb is a rather interesting story. About the beginning of the twelfth century, there was a debate about whether the country's churches were to use Gothic or Roman prayer books in their services. The question eventually came before Alfonso VI, who was king at the time. Alfonso decided to leave the matter to chance, so he threw a copy of both prayer books into a fire, declaring that the one that survived the ordeal should be chosen. However, when the Gothic missal survived the blaze, the king immediately threw it back into the fire and chose the Roman liturgies. Thus was the matter decided, and the proverb became popular throughout the country.

Many Christians treat the will of God in this manner. They say they want God's will. They declare that they are leaving the matter up to him. But then, when God reveals what they are to do, they continue trying to "find out his will," as they say, until events finally turn out to suit them. When they eventually do get their way—and, of course, find that it does not yield them the satisfaction they had hoped for—many of these persons become confused and desperately unhappy.

Unfortunately, such persons have never learned that true satisfaction in life comes from yielding totally to God's will in God's service and that knowing God's will consists in being willing to do it even before we know what it is.

The Will of God

If you have ever found yourself in the place of trying to get God's will to conform to your own— most of us have at one time or another—then you should be helped by the thoughts that the Lord Jesus Christ shared with his disciples on this subject.

We are told in the fourth chapter of John's Gospel that when Jesus and his disciples arrived in Samaria, where he was to meet the Samaritan woman, Jesus waited in the valley near Jacob's well while his disciples went up the hill to Sychar to buy food. While they were gone the woman came, and Jesus talked to her, leading her to faith. About the time the woman left her water jar to go up to the city to bring others to Jesus, the disciples had finished their errand and had returned. They were surprised that Jesus had been talking to the woman, but they were doubly surprised when Jesus showed no interest in the food they had purchased. He told them, "I have food to eat that you know nothing about." Peter and John and the others thought on the purely literal level, as Nicodemus and the woman had also both done, and began to wonder if someone had brought him food during their absence. At this point Jesus replied that the food he was talking about was not physical but spiritual. He said, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work" (v. 34).

This is a great sentence. It is even a "golden sentence," as Charles Haddon Spurgeon once described it. In essence these words are an expression of what was undoubtedly the keynote of Jesus' life, telling us that above all else Jesus lived to do God's will. They are the essence of his life. Moreover, they tell us that doing God's will gave Jesus complete satisfaction.

We shall understand a great deal more about the satisfaction that comes from desiring God's will and doing it when we compare the obedience of Jesus, recorded here and elsewhere, with the disobedience of Satan with which it forms a great contrast. In Isaiah 14 we are told in four verses of the thoughts that entered Satan's mind at the moment of his revolt against God and of the eventual results of this rebellion. The point of the verses is that Satan's revolt occurred in the area of the will, in desiring his will rather than God's, and resulted in dissatisfaction for Satan and his eventual judgment. Isaiah writes, "How you have fallen from heaven, O morning star, son of the dawn! You have been cast down to the earth, you who once laid low the nations! You said in your heart, 'I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High.' But you are brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit" (Isa. 14:12-15).

In these verses there are two interesting features in Satan's thought. The first is Satan's desire to climb above that station to which God had called him. He had already been given the highest position of any created being. According to Ezekiel he was "full of wisdom and perfect in beauty" (Ezek. 28:12). He was what we might call the king and high priest of the creation. Nevertheless, none of this was enough for Satan. Satan desired to rise into heaven ... above the stars ... to sit upon the mount of the assembly ... above the heights of the clouds ... to be like the Most High. In other words, he wanted to push God off the throne and receive the worship of the universe himself.

The second important feature of these verses is the strong assertion of Satan's own will. If you take time to count the occurrence of the phrase "I will" in these verses, you will see that Satan asserts his own will five times. He said, "I will... I will... I will... I will... I will." In time Satan's "I will" was multiplied many billions of times, first by the very distinct and equally rebellious "wills" of his followers and then by the "I wills" of billions of men and women. Satan's "I will" was the origin of sin in the universe; the results of sin show the tragic consequences of anyone's attempting to do things in any way other than that which God determines.

What were the results of this rebellion? When Satan caused Adam and Eve to sin in the Garden of Eden, God expressed the results of willfulness by telling Satan that it would be his fate to eat dust all the days of his life (Gen. 3:14). This symbolizes dissatisfaction. We might say that God told Satan that life for him would be dry, unnourishing, and tasteless. In Isaiah God describes the same thing in another way by describing Satan's end. "But you are brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit."

How different was the obedience of the Lord Jesus Christ! Jesus declared, "I desire to do your will, O my God" (Ps. 40:8). Paul later wrote of his obedience, saying that Jesus "did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross! Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (Phil. 2:6-10).

It is a great contrast. Satan exalted his own will and found nothing but misery. He brought misery to others. Jesus submitted himself to the will of God and both found and brought blessing.

I wonder if you have been able to learn from this contrast. Do you see the benefits of submitting yourself to God's will? Are you willing to go in whatever direction he sends you? I am convinced that we know little about our own natures until we come to the point of recognizing that naturally we prefer our will to God's and that even at best, even after God works with us, we often only desire to know and to do his will halfheartedly.

Have you ever prayed to know God's will, surrendering yourself to him as best you know how, had his answer, but then had a heavy feeling as you set out to do as he directed? If so, isn't it true that you are acting like the little girl who wrote to her grandmother to thank her for her Christmas present? She wrote, "Dear Grandma, thank you for the pincushion. I have always wanted a pincushion, but not very much." We are all like that. We say, "Thank you, Lord, for having a will for my life. I have always wanted your will for my life." Yet if we are honest, we are forced to admit, "... but not very much." Thus it is that for many people one of the great steps in their spiritual growth comes when their will is first surrendered to God's will and they are enabled to say, as Jesus did, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me."

Doing the Will of God

That verse also leads to a second point in our study, for Jesus did not say, "My food is to will the will of him who sent me." That is important enough, but it is only part of the story. He actually said, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me." This is important for us, for it is often true that even when the will of God is revealed to us we fail to do it.

At one point in his ministry Jesus told a story involving a father and his two sons. The father owned a vineyard. He came to the first son and said, "Son, go work today in my vineyard." The son said, "No, I won't." But afterward, Jesus reported, the son repented and went.

The father came to the second son and gave him identical instructions. This son said, "Yes, I'll work in the vineyard." But then he failed to do it.

Jesus asked those who were listening to him, "Which of the two did the will of his father?" When they pointed out that it was the first of the sons, in spite of the fact that initially he had refused, Jesus then showed that this was precisely the contrast between the religious leaders of his day who were always saying, "Yes, yes," to God but who were not obeying him, and the sinners of his day who initially disobeyed but after that repented.

The contrast is still valid. Do you say, "Yes, yes," but then not do what God instructs you to do?

Or do you do his will and not merely talk about it?

I have always been impressed by the number of verses in the Bible that give us specific things to do. For instance, if you are not yet a Christian, there is a verse in the Sermon on the Mount that is specifically for you. Jesus said, "Enter through the narrow gate. For wide is the gate and broad is the road that leads to destruction, and many enter through it" (Matt. 7:13). If you are not yet a Christian, God's will for you is that you might believe in Jesus as your Savior.

If you are a Christian, there are hundreds of clear-cut statements for you to consider. Jesus said, "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and praise your Father in heaven" (Matt. 5:16). He said, "Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you" (Matt. 5:44). Peter wrote, "But in your hearts set apart Christ as Lord. Always be prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have. But do this with gentleness and respect" (1 Peter 3:15). He wrote, "Humble yourselves, therefore, under God's mighty hand, that he may lift you up in due time. ...Be self-controlled and alert" (1 Peter 5:6, 8). Paul declared, "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will" (Rom. 12:1-2). A list of such verses could be almost endless, but this is enough for our purposes. Do you do such things? Do you work at them? Let me share a challenge that the great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon had for the congregations of his day. Spurgeon wrote this about doing God's will: "Some of you good people, who do nothing except go to public meetings, and Bible readings, and prophetic conferences, and other forms of spiritual dissipation, would be a good deal better Christians if you would look after the poor and needy around you. If you would just tuck up your sleeves for work, and go and tell the Gospel to dying men, you would find your spiritual health mightily restored, for very much of the sickness of Christians comes through their having nothing to do. All feeding and no working makes men spiritual dyspeptics. Be idle, careless, with nothing to live for, nothing to care for, no sinner to pray for, no backslider to lead back to the cross, no trembler to encourage, no little child to tell of a Savior, no greyheaded man to enlighten in the things of God, no object, in fact, to live for; and who wonders if you begin to groan, and to murmur, and to look within, until you are ready to die of despair? Let us have practical Christianity."

Finishing the Work

Finally, Jesus did not merely say, "My food is to will the will of him that sent me" or even "My food is to do the will of him that sent me." He said, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work." Unfortunately, many of us begin the work but then fail to finish it.

Before the incarnation, Jesus declared through David, "Here I am, I have come—it is written about me in the scroll. I desire to do your will, O my God; your law is within my heart" (Ps. 40:7-8). To do that, Jesus Christ assumed our humanity. Jesus was born in Bethlehem and was raised in the dirty little town of Nazareth and grew up in the carpenter shop of his earthly stepfather Joseph. In time he began his teaching ministry, a ministry that took him throughout all the towns and villages of Palestine. During these years, he looked ahead to the cross, which loomed ever larger before him. Finally, just before his crucifixion as he prayed in the garden, Jesus observed, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (John 17:4). One of his last cries from the cross was, "It is finished" (John 19:30).

Aren't you glad that the Lord Jesus Christ finished the work that God the Father gave him to do? It resulted in our salvation. Are you like him in that? Are you attempting to finish the work that you have been given?

Early in his life, George Müller, the founder of the well-known faith orphanages in England, made friendships with three men, none of whom was a Christian. Müller was burdened for these three friends and began to pray for them. He prayed for years, recording in his diary the fact that he was continuing to pray for them. Müller prayed throughout his lifetime and finally died without seeing any one of them come to faith. Nevertheless, after Müller's death, each of these three men believed, two of them well up in their seventies and one over eighty years of age.

The other story is told by Spurgeon of a missionary who had gone to the American Indians. As this man lay dying, the last thing he did was to teach a little child its letters so that the child might begin to read. Someone remarked how strange it was to see such a great man at such a seemingly insignificant work. But he replied that he thanked God that when he could no longer preach, he still had at least enough strength to teach the poor child. This man desired to finish his life's work. He wanted to brush in the final stroke that would complete the picture.

You have not finished the work that you have been given if you have merely put in a year at it, teaching a class, serving on a board. You have not finished the work if you have merely gone witnessing on a weekend. You have not finished your work merely by trying to help a child once and then dropping this great responsibility. The will of God is done for you only when your part is ended and the work itself is entrusted into the hands of your successor.

Chapter 53.
God's Harvest

John 4:35-38

There are few things in life so tragic as having missed a great opportunity. Let me give you an example.

During the first three days of July 1863, in the midst of America's great Civil War, the armies of the North and South clashed decisively at Gettysburg. For the first three days of the battle the fighting was inconclusive, but then the tide began to turn against General Lee and the Confederate forces. The northern troops under General G. G. Meade were winning. Lee began to retreat southward on the night of July 4, while storm clouds drenched the east coast with rain. When Lee reached the Potomac, he found that the river was swollen with rain. He could not cross it. Behind him was the victorious Union army. Before him was the river. He was trapped.

Here was the great, golden opportunity for General Meade. Meade could have attacked immediately, destroying Lee's army and, in effect, ending the Civil War. President Lincoln actually ordered him to attack. However, instead of attacking, Meade delayed. He held a council, then delayed again. Eventually the water of the river receded, and Lee escaped over the Potomac, from which ground he was able to extend the war by two more years. Meade never regained his lost opportunity, and it was to General Grant that Lee eventually surrendered on April 9, 1865.

This story shows us the tragedy of having missed a great opportunity. But if this principle is true in the physical realm, as we realize, it is certainly more true spiritually. The Bible recognizes this when it says, "What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26). Or again, "If it is burned up, he will suffer loss; he himself will be saved, but only as one escaping through the flames" (1 Cor. 3:15).

Apparently, the Lord Jesus Christ had been thinking along these lines as the result of the failure of the disciples to understand the need of the Samaritan woman. No doubt, as the disciples had started up the hill toward Sychar, the Lord had gazed after them. He had seen them pass the woman who was on her way down. She was the one to whom Jesus had come to Samaria to witness, but the disciples were unaware of her need. Perhaps they had even stood several abreast in the path and forced her to go around them with her water jar, while all this time Jesus looked after them from the well. After Jesus had spoken to the woman and the disciples returned, of what were they thinking? Once again, it was certainly not of her or her need. They had completed their errand. Now they wanted the Lord Jesus Christ to eat lunch.

Jesus must have smiled as he began to teach them, first, about the priority of spiritual things over physical things and, then, about their great opportunities. They had missed one opportunity, but Jesus did not chide them about that. Instead he began to teach them about their next opportunity so that they might not miss it.

He used a proverb to do it. The proverb said that after sowing seed a farmer needs to wait four months for the harvest. Jesus argued that in the present case that was not so: "Do you not say, 'Four months more and then the harvest'? I tell you, open your eyes and look at the fields! They are ripe for harvest. Even now the reaper draws his wages, even now he harvests the crop for eternal life, so that the sower and the reaper may be glad together" (vv. 35-36).

The development of the story shows that this was certainly true metaphorically. The hills of Samaria were spiritually ripe, for many of the Samaritans believed (vv. 39, 41). Nevertheless, it may even have been true in an observable sense. At any rate, I can imagine the woman returning with the men of the city even while Jesus was talking with the disciples so that, when he said that the fields were "ripe" to harvest, this was literally true as hundreds of the townspeople in their white robes began streaming down the hillside toward him.

The disciples had missed one opportunity; Jesus did not want them to miss this one. He was using the incident to show that there were now great opportunities for the spread of the gospel, and he was encouraging them on the basis of these opportunities to be missionaries.

Motivations for Mission

This was not to be the only motivation for their great assignment of bringing other men and women to the Lord, of course. Nor is it our only motivation. The first great motivation for evangelism is that the followers of Jesus Christ are not at liberty to set their own priorities. We are under marching orders, as the Duke of Wellington once said in answer to a similar question, and it is the Lord Jesus Christ, our commander-in-chief, who has issued them. What are the orders? The orders are that we are to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, baptizing those who believe, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This command, spoken to the disciples later, is given to us several times—once in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and in the opening chapter of Acts.

In each case the emphasis is different. In Matthew's account, the account of Christ's commissioning of the disciples to world mission in Galilee, the authority of the Lord is emphasized. Here Jesus says, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations" (Matt. 28:18-19). In Mark the emphasis falls upon the final judgment. Luke presents the great commission as the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy, for it is through the preaching of the cross that blessing is to come to the nations. In John's account Christ places the great commission in the context of his own commissioning by the Father. "As the Father has sent me, I am sending you" (John 20:21). Finally, in Acts the command is linked to a definite program of world evangelization. "But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

In light of these texts it should be evident that the command to evangelize the world is a command that touches each of us personally. It touched all Christ's disciples then. It touches all Christ's disciples now. The question is not whether you should go but where you should go. Wherever he sends you, there you are to be a missionary and an evangelist.

You may have to witness in your office. You may have to witness in your home. You may have to witness at school. You may be saying, "But I don't have the courage." Well, God knows that you lack it, but he has promised to supply all your need according to the riches of his glory in Christ Jesus. You may be saying, "But I have a family and children to take care of." Why should that hinder you? It certainly should not hinder you from giving a witness where you are today. It should not even deter you from work abroad if that is what God has called you to. Perhaps God will pick you up now and fill you with a yearning to spread his Word in a place you now know only by name but will one day come to love with a divine love and regard the place of your greatest labor for him.

Men Are Lost

The second motivation for world missions is that men and women are lost without Jesus Christ. This means that they are lost in this life as well as for eternity. Paul wrote to the Ephesians that before their conversion they were "separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). Jeremiah wrote of men as "lost sheep" (Jer. 50:6). Jesus told pointed stories about a lost sheep, a lost coin, and a lost son (Luke 15). John wrote of Jesus, "Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18). The same truths are taught in Revelation 20:11-15 where we are told about the judgment of the great white throne. At this judgment all are called to account, and those whose names are not found written in the Book of Life are lost.

Are men really lost? The great weight of theological opinion in our day is against this conclusion, but the Bible teaches it and we must stand with God's Word.

The various shades of universalism in the church are opposed to this teaching. It is probably universalism more than any other single factor that has blunted the cutting edge of evangelism and severed the lifeline of missions. The view of most anthropologists is against it. They tend to glorify primitive cultures. Often they teach that the spread of the gospel tarnishes an essentially beautiful religion. The truth of the matter is that although there may be and undoubtedly are some glimmerings of truth in paganism, the glimmers of truth that men may possess never lead them to God, and, as a result, there is always a great deal more of degradation and perversion in primitive cultures than nobility. The third ground on which the teaching of the Bible is opposed is religious relativism, the view that all men are on the same road to God and that the differences we see are only the differences between the various stages along it.

Are these views right? If they are right, then we may take our ease, leaving the world at peace. However, if they are wrong and the Bible is right, then we must give for the support of missions and we must go wherever God sends us.

Physical Needs

The third motivation for missions is found in the physical and social needs of large portions of the human race. The physical and social needs of men are not our prime motivation, for we know that it profits little if people gain the blessings of this world while losing their own souls. Yet these needs are a strong motivation, and they impel us onward. The Bible tells us that many times as the Lord looked upon the sick, poor, needy, and lonely, he had compassion upon them and healed their infirmities. He sat down with sinners. He touched the lepers. We are to follow his example.

I know that someone will reply, "But I am not sure that I want to do that. Doesn't it mean that I myself will get dirty?" In one sense, it does; but you are called to a life of such involvement.

When the great musician Johann Sebastian Bach was first called to the Sans-souci Palace in Potsdam by King Frederick the Great, he decided upon his arrival that he should first freshen himself from his journey. Instead, the king commanded an instant appearance, and Bach therefore arrived in the palace dirty and improperly attired. Some of the courtiers, with their court manners and habits, laughed at Bach's appearance. But the king instantly chided them for their insensitive contempt, and he had Bach play. Later, Zinzendorf, who knew the story, applied it to Christianity and Christian workers, saying, "Nothing is more beautiful than a dusty warrior." He was right. Nothing so commends the evangelist as an involvement with the persons whom he serves. Nothing in their need—be it spiritual, moral, social, or physical—should fail to impel him forward.

Fourth, the love of the Lord Jesus Christ impels us. Paul wrote, "For Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again" (2 Cor. 5:14-15).

A Ripe Harvest

Finally, we are motivated in the task of evangelism by the opportunities that each succeeding day thrusts upon us. Do we seize the opportunities as Christ did? Or do we do as the disciples did and walk by them?

We need to realize that the opportunities that are present today are present because of the coming of Jesus Christ and not because of any fortuitous arrangement of circumstances or because of our imagined ability to create them. This thought is suggested in the verses in a way that is not at once apparent to the casual reader. When Jesus quoted the proverb about the lapse of four months between sowing and harvest and disagreed with it, saying that the sowing and reaping could take place simultaneously, he was reminding the disciples of an Old Testament prophecy that had to do with the coming of the Messiah. According to the Old Testament the Messiah would usher in a period of great physical blessing for this earth. Amos had written, "'The days are coming,' declares the Lord, 'when the reaper will be overtaken by the plowman and the planter by the one treading grapes'" (Amos 9:13). Moses had written, "Your threshing will continue until grape harvest and the grape harvest will continue until planting" (Lev. 26:5). In a spiritual sense this had come true. The Messiah had come. Thus, the age of waiting had passed, and the period of perpetual reaping had dawned.

Are you aware of this harvest? Are you aware that God's Spirit is moving in our time? I am convinced he is. This is particularly evident in the student world. Let us ask ourselves: Are we awake to these opportunities and present to take advantage of them? Do we speak the Word in season? Are we available? If not, we must ask the Lord of the harvest to help us see the fields of ripe grain.

A Second Proverb

There is, however, one more proverb referred to by Jesus. It comes at the end of this section. It is true, said Jesus, that in the day of the Messiah, the reaper shall overtake the sower. But it is also true that at times the sower will not see the results of his labors. "One sows and another reaps," said Jesus. "I sent you to reap what you have not worked for. Others have done the hard work, and you have reaped the benefits of their labor" (John 4:37-38).

If you obey the Lord Jesus Christ and witness as he has commanded you to do, there is no guarantee that in every case you will see the results of your labors. Jesus will encourage you in your witness. You will probably see people come to faith in him. You will reap. But it is also true that, when you sow, some of the results of that sowing will appear only in an age when you are gone and that you will not see it. Do not be discouraged if that happens. We are harvesting fruit that is the result of the efforts of our predecessors. There will also be harvesting on the basis of the sowing that is going on today. We may see the results. We may not see the results. But whatever the case, we are to keep on with our commission.

The question for us is, "Do we sow the seed?" That is our job. We are to take the Word of the living God to those who need to hear it and thus allow the Lord Jesus Christ to use it to bring forth a harvest in their lives.

Chapter 54.
The Savior of the World

John 4:39-42

If ever there was a great spiritual climax to a story, that climax is found in the phrase with which John the evangelist ends his account of Christ's conversation with the woman of Samaria. The woman had believed in Jesus as the result of his conversation with her and had immediately gone off to her own city to tell others about him. These came and believed. They asked Christ to stay with them. When he did, others believed also. John's account of this miniature revival in Samaria is then rounded off with the concluding testimony of these new believers concerning Jesus: "They said to the woman, 'We no longer believe just because of what you said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Savior of the world'" (John 4:42).

This great phrase—"the Savior of the world"—concludes John's story and is therefore particularly significant. Of course, no one really wanted a Savior of the world in Christ's day. The Jews wanted a savior of Jerusalem. The Samaritans wanted a savior of Samaria, as their conduct at a later time indicates (cf. Luke 9:52, 53). The Greeks wanted to save Greece; the Romans, to save Rome. But Jesus was not this kind of a savior. Jesus is the Savior of the world. Jesus appeared on earth for men of all races in order that he might die for them and be the means of their salvation.

It is because he did this that you and I, who are not Jews, have a Savior.

The Human Race

Before we look at this phrase—"the Savior of the world"—we need to look at the very important word "world." In Greek the word is kosmos. It occurs about 185 times in the New Testament, but what is highly significant for our study is that 105 of these 185 occurrences are in the books traditionally attributed to John. The word kosmos occurs 78 times in the Gospel of John, 24 times in John's epistles, and 3 times in Revelation. We get a sense of how unusual John's use of the word is when we realize that Matthew uses the word only 8 times and that it occurs just 3 times each in the Gospels of Mark and Luke. In other words, we are dealing here with one of the great concepts, or themes, of John's Gospel.

But what does the word kosmos mean? Initially the word probably denoted an ornament; that is, an object that was decorative or beautiful because it was well proportioned or well constructed. This usage appears many times in Homer and is preserved for us in our English word "cosmetic." From this original use, the word passed quite naturally into a word describing the universe because of its beauty and harmony. The universe is God's ornament. This sense of the word is retained in one of the three uses of it in John 1:10, which tells us that the world (meaning the universe) was made by Jesus Christ. Since the earth with its order and beauty was the most significant part of the universe for mankind, it was natural that the word kosmos should next be applied to this earth and, after that, to the men who live upon it.

This latter idea is the one normally used by John. In John the word kosmos most often means "the human race." In the later chapters of the Gospel particularly, the word denotes the human race in its opposition to God. Consequently, those who are called to faith in the Lord Jesus Christ are distinguished from it. We find John writing: "It was just before the Passover Feast. Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father. Having loved his own who were in the world, he now showed them the full extent of his love" (John 13:1). Later, Jesus makes the distinction even clearer by praying on behalf of the disciples: "I pray for them. I am not praying for the world, but for those you have given me, for they are yours" (John 17:9).

In these later chapters the line of distinction is drawn between those who are Christ's and those who are merely "of the world." In the early chapters (that is, before Jesus has begun to do much of his work) the references deal with Christ's actions toward the human race generally.

God's Light

Let us look at some of these references. The first important one is John 1:9, which says, "The true light that gives light to every man was coming into the world."

What does that mean? If we are to understand this verse, we need to remember, first of all, that it does not refer to some imagined divine light or spark of divinity that is said to be innate to mankind. That is a view which has been held by the Quakers and peripheral Christian denominations, but it is not what the verse is teaching. We discussed this issue in one of our studies of John's first chapter. The "Light" of the verse really refers to the historical Jesus. The point of the verse is that Jesus shone upon all men—from the outside, as a spotlight shines upon the darkened front of an empty house—rather than there being any light shining forth from within.

The fact that Jesus shines upon all men is, however, important. It is important because it tells us that he is the light, rather than another. The verse says that he is the "true" or "genuine" light. It is important because we are told that the light is for all.

Do you realize that it is only because of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ that you, a Gentile (if you are a Gentile), have spiritual light? Before Christ's coming, salvation was, as Jesus maintained, "of the Jews." To the Jews belonged the adoption, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the service of God, and the promises (Rom. 9:4). That is true; it is a fact of our history. On one occasion, when Daniel O'Connell, a nineteenth-century Irish politician, taunted the great English statesman Benjamin Disraeli in the House of Commons about his being a Jew, Disraeli replied, "Yes, I am a Jew; and when the ancestors of this right honorable gentleman were brutal savages in an unknown island [he meant Ireland], mine were priests in the temple of Solomon and were giving law and religion to the world." It was a just rebuke. For centuries the true light of divine revelation was confined to Judaism. Now, however, through Jesus Christ the light of God's law and true religion have come to us Gentiles.

Have you recognized that the Lord Jesus Christ came to be your Light? If you will allow him to do so, he will use that light first to reveal the darkness of your heart and life to you and then to lead you into the light of his truth and righteousness.

The Lamb

The second important reference to the relationship of Jesus Christ to the world of men is that he came to be the world's Savior. That is the teaching of John the Baptist who declared, "The next day John saw Jesus coming toward him and said, 'Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!'" (John 1:29). Jesus is only the Savior of those who believe on him, for salvation is through faith alone. "Without faith it is impossible to please God," says the author of Hebrews (Heb. 11:6). Yet it is also correct to say that he died in order that all might come to repentance.

I wonder if you have ever pondered on all that is involved in that phrase, "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world." At the very least it referred to the sacrifices, as I pointed out in an earlier study. The sacrificial lamb had always figured highly in Israel's religious culture. Abel had sacrificed a lamb and thereby received God's blessing. Abraham had performed various sacrifices. The offering of lambs figured in the worship at the temple and was practiced daily. Thus, when John the Baptist termed Jesus the "Lamb of God," he was clearly identifying Jesus as the innocent substitute who would die in place of all those who have sinned.

However, John's phrase also referred to the culmination and far-reaching effect of the sacrifices. To understand the importance of this truth, we need to go back to the time when God first instituted sacrifices. There in the Garden of Eden, after man had sinned, God shed the blood of one animal for one person and then established this as a repeatable form of worship on the basis of which a sinful man might come to him. When Abel did that, God judged him righteous (Heb. 11:4). He rejected the more beautiful offering of Cain because it was not a sacrifice.

For thousands of years men lived with this basic one-lamb-for-one-person institution. The time came when the Jews were in slavery in Egypt and God was about to bring them out and lead them into their own land. At this time God instituted the Passover. Each family in Israel was to take a lamb and examine it for defects. Only a perfect lamb could be chosen. After three days, on the night of the Passover, the lamb was to be killed and eaten and its blood spread upon the lintel and side posts of the door of the house as a sign to the angel of death to pass over that house as it went through Egypt slaying the firstborn that night. One lamb for a person? Yes! But here God revealed that it could also be one lamb for one family.

The Exodus took place, and several months later the people were at Mount Sinai where God gave them the law. In the law were instructions for the Day of Atonement, on which the high priest was to kill a lamb for the nation and then take its blood within the veil into the Holy of Holies, where it was sprinkled upon the mercy seat beneath the wings of the cherubim. Here was the progression: one lamb for one person, one lamb for one family, one lamb for one nation. ...But then Jesus came, and it was John's role to identify him as one lamb for this world.

For some years now I have been convinced that this was the primary meaning of Palm Sunday. Men who love liturgy and liturgical parades have seized upon this event, as men will, and have built it into a day of triumph in which Jesus supposedly presented himself as King to a warm and enthusiastic populace. But that is not what Palm Sunday is about. Jesus did not present himself as King to the people of Jerusalem only to be surprised several days later by their rejection of him. The day of crucifixion was the necessary prelude to Easter, and Palm Sunday was the necessary prelude to the day of the crucifixion. At Calvary Jesus died as God's Lamb. Palm Sunday was the day on which that Lamb was led into Jerusalem. Palm Sunday was the day on which Jesus offered himself as our substitute.

This was probably true in a very literal way. We must remember that the idea that Jesus was crucified on what we call Good Friday is a tradition inherited from a later period of church history and is therefore not necessarily accurate. In fact, recent studies have indicated that Jesus may have died just before sundown on Thursday of Passover week; that is, before a Friday Passover beginning on Thursday evening. According to this reckoning, there would have been two sabbaths in that particular Passover week, the regular Saturday Sabbath and the Friday Passover Sabbath. Thus, Jesus would have died on Thursday, would have spent three days and three nights in the tomb, as he foretold, and would have risen from the grave before sunrise on Sunday morning, which was (by Jewish reckoning) the first day of the week.

The bearing that all this has upon the matter of the Passover lambs is readily apparent. For if Jesus was crucified on Thursday before a Friday Passover and if he entered Jerusalem on Sunday, as the Bible indicates, then Jesus was entering Jerusalem at the precise moment at which the thousands of Passover lambs were being led into the city to be taken into the thousands of Jewish homes. What better way could Jesus have dramatized the claim that he was God's Lamb? When he later died, as he did, at the precise moment when, according to John, the Jewish people were actually killing their lambs and feeding on them, the imagery was complete.

Do you realize that Jesus Christ truly is the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of this world? Do you realize that he came to die for you? Each of us should believe these things and commit ourselves to him.

God So Loved the World

The final important reference to the world in the opening chapters of the Gospel is in John 3:16. There we read: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life."

Where can a sinful human being such as you or I learn that God is love? You will not find it taught in books on human history. You will not find it in philosophy or in your own reasoning. You will not even find it in the other religions of this world. You will find this truth only in Christianity, at the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ. How do we know that God loves us? It is not because someone else tells us so. He may be mistaken. It is not because the universe is beautiful; the universe is also horrible at times. There is no love in space; space is nothingness. Even on earth we must admit that there are tidal waves and hurricanes, earthquakes and disease, just as there are gorgeous spring days and beautiful sunsets. How do we know that God loves us? Only because Jesus of Nazareth died for us! The Bible says, "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

He died for us even when we were hostile toward him. What did men do when Jesus appeared as the Light? Men rejected the Light. What did men do when he appeared as the Lamb? Men crucified the Lamb. What did men do when Jesus appeared as the great and supreme manifestation of God's love? Men hated that love and despised it.

So we ask ourselves: Can God really love a race that rejects his Light, crucifies his Lamb, and despises his love? Everything within ourselves would say no. But the reality of the crucified Christ forces us to say yes, for he is indeed the Savior of such a sinful and rebellious world.
Samuel Medley expressed this in a song written toward the middle of the eighteenth century:

Awake, my soul, in joyful lays,
And sing thy great Redeemer's praise:
He justly claims a song from me,
His loving-kindness is so free.

He saw me ruined in the fall,
Yet loved me notwithstanding all,
And saved me from my lost estate;
His loving-kindness is so great.

May the knowledge of the truth of the love of God for our race, found so long ago by the woman of Samaria and her friends, be yours as you come to know our great Savior.

Chapter 55.
Christ in Galilee

John 4:43-45

Not long ago a person complained to me that the Bible is difficult to understand. His objection was not only that the language of the Bible is difficult—I pointed out that there are very readable modern translations such as the American Bible Society's Good News for Modern Man or the New York Bible Society's New International Version—but that even then the concepts are difficult and that many passages contain contradictions. Because of this problem the person told me that in his opinion God was being difficult and unfair.

I answered this objection in two ways. I said that first of all it is really not right to charge that the basic message of the Bible is difficult to understand. It may be difficult to accept. I believe that no one ever does accept it unless God has already done a previous supernatural work in his mind and heart. Still this is not the same thing as saying that it is difficult to understand. "How, for instance, could God make John 3:16 any clearer?" I asked. "He simply tells us that he loves us so much that he sent his Son to die in our place so that anyone who commits himself to him will not be separated from him forever but will have new life. In other words," I said, "God has made the basic message of the Bible so clear that even a child can understand it," and, indeed, many do.

"On the other hand," I added, "it is also true that there are parts of the Bible that seem to contain contradictions and are difficult to understand. But then, aren't we glad that the Bible contains statements that are deep enough to challenge our thought and keep us learning even through a lifetime of Bible study? The fact that this is true is one proof that the Bible is from God, for no other book would be so infinitely provocative and challenging. Moreover, I have personally learned, as have many others, that it is often the passages that seem difficult on first reading that yield the greatest harvest as the result of a deeper investigation."

The Problem

I give this particular introduction to these verses simply because they contain just such a difficulty and yet, upon a closer study, yield great blessing. The difficulty is apparent to anyone who reads them, and it becomes even more evident (at least initially) when these verses are compared with similar verses in the other Gospels.

Let me explain what I mean. John 4:43-45 says: "After the two days he left for Galilee. (Now Jesus himself had pointed out that a prophet has no honor in his own country.) When he arrived in Galilee, the Galileans welcomed him. They had seen all that he had done in Jerusalem at the Passover Feast, for they also had been there." Quite obviously, these verses are transition verses, taking the reader from the period of Christ's life spent in Samaria to the next stage of his ministry in Galilee, and they give a reason for Christ's decision to move to Galilee. The difficulty is that all the other Gospels also report the reason that John gives for Christ's move to Galilee, quoting Jesus as saying that a prophet has no honor in his own country, but in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, Jesus is quoted as saying this of Galilee as an explanation of why he had to go somewhere else (Matt. 13:57; Mark 6:4; Luke 4:24), while in John the move is reversed.

Moreover, there is a second difficulty that is apparent even without comparing the Gospels. In John Jesus says that he is going to Galilee because he will have no honor there. Yet the next verse tells us that "the Galileans welcomed him. They had seen all that he had done in Jerusalem at the Passover Feast."

What is the solution? Well, different answers have been given. First, some commentators have argued that Jesus went to Galilee to prove that his saying spoken earlier about not being received there was actually the case. The difficulty with this view is that, if this is what Jesus intended, he was mistaken, for he actually proved that even the Galileans would receive him. A second explanation is historical. Those who hold it argue that after the success Jesus had just known in Samaria, he wanted to slip away to a place where he would be able to rest. That sounds plausible, but it runs aground on the difficulty that Jesus had apparently determined to go back to Galilee even before he had the success that he did in Samaria (John 4:3), and, of course, even in this explanation he is mistaken. A third explanation is that to John "his own country" was actually Judea, rather than Galilee, and that in his view Jesus was returning to Galilee because the Jews in Jerusalem had not responded to his teaching. That would be a satisfactory explanation were it not for the fact that the other three Gospels all apply Christ's statement to Galilee.

If none of these explanations is adequate then, is there another that will do justice to both the literal meaning of the words and to the historical context? I believe that there is. Moreover, I believe that this view emerges precisely when we take the words at their face value. The explanation is simply that at this point Jesus Christ moved his ministry to Galilee precisely because he had not been received in Galilee previously, and it was therefore the Galileans above everyone else who needed him. In other words, Jesus went to Galilee because the Galileans needed the gospel. Doesn't that make sense? I believe that it does. I also believe that it gives a revelation of our Lord's own motivations in his ministry that can speak to us personally.

Regardless of Failure

Let me try to put this understanding of the verses in terms that we can easily appropriate and apply. What do we learn from this insight into the outlook on his ministry that motivated the Lord Jesus Christ? The first thing is this: Jesus had determined to do the will of God for his life regardless of the consequences. That is, he had determined to do God's will regardless of apparent success or failure.

We see that in a very graphic way in the light of Christ's previous rejection by his countrymen. The story of Jesus' initial appearance in Galilee is told in Luke. From Luke we learn that he had been so badly received by the Galileans that he was almost executed at their hands. Jesus had come to Nazareth, where he had been brought up, on the Sabbath. When he went into the synagogue on this particular day to worship, he was asked to take part in the service, as male Jews were often asked to do. He was given the task of reading the Scriptures, so he picked a prophecy from Isaiah that concerned himself. He read, "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners and recovery of sight for the blind, to release the oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor" (Luke 4:18-19; Isa. 61:1-2).

He then began to teach them, beginning with the claim that the prophecy of Isaiah was being fulfilled on that precise day as he began his ministry. He ended with the prediction that most of the people would not receive him. At this point the citizens of Nazareth were so incensed that they led him to the top of a high cliff where they were about to cast him down to his death. We are told that Jesus simply passed through them and went his way.

This was the kind of reception Jesus had received in his own area of the country, and this would be fresh in his memory at the time of his return visit. Moreover, the favorable reception that he had received from the Samaritans would also be fresh, so that it would be a great temptation for him to simply remain where he was and work there. What did he do? He went to Galilee because he was determined to do God's will regardless of the consequences.

I wonder if we do that. If something does not work, isn't it true that we quickly throw it out and try something else, and that we do the same thing spiritually? If our witness is not readily received, we are quick to shake the dust off our feet and go elsewhere. Here the conduct of the Lord Jesus Christ should be helpful.

We are to keep hunting for effective means of presenting the gospel. No one would question that. Still, we are to learn from Christ's example that even when we have done our best and have not had success in our witnessing, we are to keep on trying.

Let me put it in another way. Your job as a witness to the Lord Jesus Christ is not to convert people. That is God's job. He will do the converting. Nevertheless, you have a job to do, and your job is to bring as many as you can into contact with the gospel. Moreover, you are not to stop doing your job even if the results from your own vantage point seem meager.

Man's Need

The second thing we learn from Christ's decision to go into Galilee is that he was motivated by an acute sense of man's need. He once used an illustration about a doctor to describe his activity. He said, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners" (Mark 2:17). It was the need of men and women who were lost, without the gospel, that moved him.

Are you so motivated? Ask yourself these questions: "Whom do I know who is particularly needy? Whom do I know who is in need of physical help? Whom do I know who needs the gospel?" You might gain help along these lines by looking about for the most lonely person you know, the most introverted, the one who is most oppressed with guilt, sin, or distress. Speak to him or her. You might find an amazing openness to the gospel simply because you are (or could be) the only one who has ever taken time to listen to that person and share his problems.

Motivated by Scripture

The final lesson from the decision of the Lord Jesus Christ to enter Galilee is that Jesus was motivated by the specific statements of Scripture and that, therefore, we should be motivated by such specific statements too.

We see this not as much in John's Gospel as in Matthew's. In the early chapters of Matthew the author shows that Jesus' early ministry in Galilee was in direct response to a specific Old Testament prophecy about it. The prophecy is in the ninth chapter of Isaiah, which Matthew quotes as follows: "Leaving Nazareth, he went and lived in Capernaum, which was by the lake in the area of Zebulun and Naphtali—to fulfill what was said through the prophet Isaiah: 'Land of Zebulun and land of Naphtali, the way to the sea, along the Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles—the people living in darkness have seen a great light; on those living in the land of the shadow of death a light has dawned'" (Matt. 4:13-16).

Clearly Jesus knew the Scriptures and studied them for the light they threw upon the course of his ministry. It was in response to this verse and many hundreds of verses like it that he made his decisions.

What does this have to do with us? A person might argue that the Bible does not contain such specific prophecies about what each of us is to do and about the course of our lives. That is true. Nevertheless, the Bible contains principles by which God instructs us how we are to organize our lives, fix our values, witness to others, and serve him. If we will read the Bible and allow God to interpret it and apply it to our own situation, then we will have the same type of direction that Jesus had and will be able to obey God on the basis of his written revelation.

That is the only way to any geniune blessing in the Christian life. Success, even in preaching the gospel, will not satisfy indefinitely. Neither will martyrdom. We will find blessing only when we allow God to speak to us through the Scriptures and obey him.

Martin Luther was a man who had come to learn this both theoretically and in practical experience. God had spoken to him through Scripture and had given peace to his soul. Scripture had kept him on course both in times of rejection and danger and in times of apparent success. Thus it was a study of Scripture that he recommended to others. On one occasion Luther was asked to autograph the flyleaf of a copy of the German Bible that he had translated, and he responded by writing a small testimony of his experience with this book. He first wrote John 8:25—"Who are you? ...Just what I have been claiming all along." It was a claim on the part of Jesus Christ to divinity. Then Luther added, "They desire to know who he is and not to regard what he says, while he desires them first to listen; then they will know who he is. The rule is: Listen and allow the Word to make the beginning; then the knowing will nicely follow. If, however, you do not listen, then you will never know anything. For it is decreed: God will not be seen, known, or comprehended except through his Word alone. Whatever, therefore, one undertakes for salvation apart from the Word is in vain. God will not respond to that. He will not have it. He will not tolerate any other way. Therefore, let his book, in which he speaks with you, be commended to you; for he did not cause it to be written for no purpose. He did not want us to let it lie there in neglect, as if he were speaking with mice under the bench or with flies on the pulpit. We are to read it, to think and speak about it, and to study it, certain that he himself (not an angel or a creature) is speaking with us in it."

It is true. The Bible is God's Word. In whatever circumstances we may find ourselves, it is not only an adequate source of information; it is also a treasure, the only absolutely necessary source of guidance for our lives.

Chapter 56.
The Second Miracle

John 4:46-54

It does not matter who you may be, sooner or later you are going to experience great sorrows or even tragedies in your life. You may be rich or poor, a man or a woman, black or white. Tragedy inevitably will become a part of your personal experience and there will be nothing you can do to avoid it.

That is not merely my own opinion, of course. It is a truth that has been recognized by many throughout history. One of the oldest pieces of literature in any language contains an expression of this that has become somewhat proverbial. It is from the Book of Job: "For hardship does not spring from the soil, nor does trouble sprout from the ground. Yet man is born to trouble as surely as sparks fly upward" (Job 5:6-7). The Hebrew of this saying is beautiful; for the two Hebrew words translated by our one word "sparks" are literally "the sons of flame," and the thought is that men are born to endure the fires of this life and eventually perish in the burning.

We know it is true. Psychologists tell us that life begins with pain, as the child, who for the first nine months of its life has rested warmly and comfortably within the uterus of its mother, is suddenly pushed and pulled into a hostile environment in which his first independent act is to cry. The experience is one akin to strangulation as the baby gasps for its life. For a time after birth the mother cares for the baby's needs. Yet, as the child grows up, the years progressively knock away the props of life and the child is forced increasingly to depend on his own resources. He must learn to eat and clothe himself. Eventually he must go to school, then earn a living. In time there will be the failure of his plans and the dissolution of cherished relationships. There will be pain and sickness. Death will inevitably come to friends and family, and at last the person himself will face his own death and that which lies beyond.

I am not pointing this out to spread gloom. There is enough sorrow in this world without emphasizing it. Rather, I am writing in this way to start us thinking about how you and I will react to such events when they come to us. What will we do? Will we be beaten down by them? Or will we triumph over them in complete victory? The verses we end with show how we can have such victory and how the same solutions can enrich our lives even in the far more abundant times of joy and great happiness.

In Joy and Sorrow

The basis for arriving at such solutions comes from a story in the life of Jesus Christ. It is the story of a rich nobleman whose son was dying and who, out of his desperation, came to Jesus about it. By the end of the story we find that not only had the son been cured but in a far more wonderful way the rich man and his entire family had found a genuine faith in Christ.

The story begins by telling us that "once more he visited Cana in Galilee, where he had turned the water into wine" (John 4:46). It ends with the remark: "This was the second miraculous sign that Jesus performed, having come from Judea to Galilee" (v. 54). Why do we have this emphasis upon the place where Jesus performed the miracle? Why is this called the second miracle, when obviously many other miraculous things had been done by Jesus previously (cf. John 2:23; 4:45)? Why, in fact, is the former miracle of changing water into wine at Cana mentioned? Quite clearly, this is John's way of telling us that we are to put the two miracles— that of changing water into wine and that of healing the nobleman's son—side by side. In other words, we are to see them in relationship to each other and compare them.

What does the comparison show? In the first place it shows a number of similarities. Both were "third-day" miracles. Thus, the miracle at the wedding occurred three days after Jesus had left the area of the lower Jordan River to return to Galilee (2:1), while this miracle similarly occurred three days after Jesus had determined to leave Judea to return to Cana through Samaria (4:43). Both miracles contain an initial rebuke to the one who requested it. In the first case it was to Mary, Jesus' mother (2:4). In the second it was to the nobleman (4:48). Third, in each case Jesus performs the miracle at a distance, doing nothing but speaking a word (2:7, 8; 4:50). Fourth, the servants possess unique knowledge of what happened (2:9; 4:51). Finally, each account concludes with a statement that certain persons who knew of the miracle believed. Thus, in the earlier story we are told that "his disciples put their faith in him" (2:11), while in the second narrative we are told that the father "and all his household believed" (4:53).

These points reinforce the need of comparing the two stories. Yet the significant point of the comparison is not in the similarities but in their one great difference. What is the difference? Certainly that in the first the scene is one of joy, festivity, and happiness. The stage is a wedding. In the second the scene is fraught with sickness, desperation, anxiety, and the dreadful shadow of death. One is a picture of joy, the other of sorrow. In comparing the two we are clearly to see that life is as filled with the one as the other and that Jesus, the One who is the answer to all human need, is needed in both circumstances.

One writer has noted: "Jesus is more than equal to either occasion. He has a place in all circumstances. If we invite him to our times of innocent happiness, he will increase our joy. If we call on him in our times of sorrow, anxiety, or bereavement, he can bring consolation, comfort, and a joy that is not of this world."

In pointing to this truth John is further documenting his claim that Jesus is indeed "the Savior of the world"; for Jesus is the Savior of all men, at all times, and in all circumstances.

Growth of Faith

The next fact we are told is that the man who came to Jesus at Cana was a nobleman. This is not the same word that is used in chapter 3 where Nicodemus is described as being a Pharisee, "a ruler of the Jews." The word that is used of Nicodemus is one that denotes preeminence of authority, however derived. In this case, the word is basilikos, which is related to the word for king and therefore denotes royalty. The word could even mean that the man was a petty king, but in this context it probably means that he was one of the royal officials at the court of Herod.

Moreover, the man had some means, for he had servants. Here was a nobleman, rich, no doubt with great influence. Yet neither his rank nor riches were able to exempt him from the common sorrows of mankind. Remember, as you think about those in positions of importance or power, that there is just as much sickness among them. And there is just as much of a need for Jesus Christ.

The wonderful thing, of course, is that this man sensed his need and its solution. When Jesus had performed his first miracle by changing water into wine, the miracle was at first known only to the disciples and to the servants who bore the wine to the master of ceremonies. Still, people being what they are, the news must have spread and have created a stir in Galilee. In time, some of the Galileans got to Jerusalem and learned of miracles that Jesus had been doing there. They told about these when they returned. It is part of the same picture that news of what Jesus was doing must have reached even Herod's court, for the nobleman had heard of Jesus and immediately remembered what he had heard when faced with the fact of his son's illness.

News came to the nobleman that Jesus was back in Galilee at Cana where the first miracle had been performed. Leaving home he made the four-hour trip (about twenty-five miles) from Capernaum, where he lived, to Cana. There he begged Jesus to accompany him back to Capernaum and heal his son.

There are two ways of looking at the man's faith at this point. The first way is to be surprised that he was exercising faith at all. Here was a man who was high in the court, where he doubtless exercised great authority, traveling twenty-five miles to request a miracle from a carpenter. It is true that desperation has driven many men and women to unusual actions, and that therefore we must not find this overly significant. Nevertheless, the man's faith is surprising. That is one way of looking at it. The other way of looking at the man's faith, however, is to look at it in the way in which Jesus looked at it and to realize that although it was real faith it was nevertheless quite weak. The man apparently believed that Jesus was able to heal his son. But he limited Jesus to the place—he thought it was necessary that Jesus should come down to Capernaum—and to a mode of operation. Presumably the nobleman thought that Jesus would have to touch his son to heal him, just as Jairus thought that Jesus would have to touch his daughter to heal her (Mark 5:23) and the woman with an issue of blood thought it would be necessary for her to touch the hem of Christ's garment (Mark 5:28). It therefore became Jesus' purpose to teach the nobleman and to help his faith to grow.

At first Jesus delivered a rebuke. He said, "Unless you people see miraculous signs and wonders, you will never believe" (John 4:48). That was the equivalent of calling him a curiosity seeker and was perhaps directed as much toward the crowd that had gathered as to the nobleman. It was a test of the man's faith or sincerity. How did he react? Fortunately, the nobleman proved himself to be truly noble, for he was not offended, nor did he seek to justify himself either before Jesus or the others. He simply stood his ground, reiterating his need and humbling himself to receive his answer in whatever way Jesus chose to give it to him.

Here then is the first answer to the way in which we can find triumph or victory in sorrow. It is to trust Jesus enough to allow him to operate in whatever way he chooses.

Believing Is Seeing

But there is also a second lesson to be learned, and it was this lesson that Jesus next began to teach him. Jesus taught that one must believe first, then he will see the results. Jesus had said, "Unless you people see miraculous signs and wonders, you will never believe." This statement was a true description of the thinking of vast numbers of men and women. The world even has it in a proverb, which says, "Seeing is believing." The teaching of Jesus was that in spiritual things the order is reversed and that believing is seeing, for it is only as one believes in Jesus that he sees spiritual things happening. Therefore, Jesus told the boy's father, "You may go. Your son will live" (v. 50). The nobleman was called upon to believe without sight. It was hard, but that is precisely what he did. The story goes on to say, "The man took Jesus at his word and departed."

Needless to say, if it had been a mere man speaking, the belief of the nobleman would have been absurd. No one believes without sight. Yet in spiritual matters it is entirely logical to do so— because we are dealing not with a man but with God. Jesus is God. Hence, to believe him is the most logical thing in the universe.

Moreover, to believe in Jesus is also the most effective way to set one's mind at rest, even when faced with sorrow. For we are told that having believed Jesus the nobleman simply continued on his way. The word used, plus the tense employed (imperfect), suggests that the nobleman believed Jesus so implicitly that he simply picked up his work where he had left it and went on about his business. At any rate, it is obvious that he did not rush home; for although the conversation took place about one o'clock in the afternoon and the journey was only four hours, the nobleman did not get back until the next day. When he did return it was to learn that his son had been healed instantly the day before at the very hour in which Jesus had spoken to him.

What a splendid story this is! And it is all the more splendid in that the man came to such strong faith from such a weak beginning. It is hard to read this story without thinking of that other similar story of the centurion who came to Christ requesting him to heal his sick servant. There are some noted similarities, so much so that some scholars have imagined these to be two versions of the same incident. Yet they are not the same, and the greatest of all differences is to be found in the attitudes of the two men involved. The centurion had the greatest faith. He said to Jesus, "Lord, I do not deserve to have you come under my roof. But just say the word, and my servant will be healed" (Matt. 8:8). Jesus praised his faith, saying, "I tell you the truth, I have not found anyone in Israel with such great faith" (v. 10). Still the centurion had this faith from the beginning, while the nobleman who sought out Jesus in Cana came to the same level of faith in a very short time through Jesus' teaching.

Truths for Everyone

The applications of this story to our own experiences are obvious. I am sure that you have already seen some of them. First, if Jesus acted as he did with this man and if his actions actually had the effect on him that the Bible tells us they did, then surely Jesus is the answer to our own anxieties also. The man came, talked to Jesus, and then went on his way without any tangible evidence that his request had been granted. Why? Because in meeting Jesus and in talking with him, his anxiety evaporated. It can be the same for you. You may be weighed down under great burdens. You may be crying inside. Just come to Jesus. Tell him about it. He will be delighted to ease your burdens and to take the weight of them all upon himself.

The second application is that the experience I have described may be true even though our actually seeing the results is postponed. They may even be postponed until after this life. We witness the death of a parent, friend, or child. We experience sorrow or sickness ourselves. We come to Jesus and find him saying, "I know what I am doing. I am working it all out." The Bible says, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28). There will always be circumstances in which we will not see that this is true. Nevertheless, we are to go on about our business. We may have to pass through the night into the bright day of the next world before we see how our prayers are answered. Still we are to believe and know that Jesus has heard and that he has answered.

Finally, there is fact that these truths are for everyone. That is the burden of this first great section of John's Gospel. What has John done? He has shown Jesus at work in the three major sections of his world—Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. He has shown him with the rich and the poor, with the educated and the uneducated, with Jews and Samaritans, with religious leaders and those who show no religious orientation at all. He has shown him as the "light of the world," "the lamb that takes away the sin of the world," "the Savior of the world." In other words, he has shown us that the gospel is for everyone. Thus, the gospel is for you also, whoever you may be.

Jesus is speaking to you when he says, "Come now, let us reason together ... though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they are red as crimson, they shall be like wool" (Isa. 1:18). He speaks to you when he says, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28).

The Gospel of John, Volume 2

Christ and Judaism (John 5-8)

by

James Montgomery Boice

To him who is indeed that Christ, the Son of the living God

Preface

It has been more than thirty years since I began to study the Gospel of John in a serious way and nearly twenty-five years since my studies of the Gospel began to appear in print. They have been out of print for some time. So it was with much gratitude that I learned of Baker's interest in reissuing them in this revised and attractive version.

When I first preached on John, I was often asked whether I ever found myself running out of ideas as I progressed at such a slow pace. (My exposition of the entire Gospel took eight years.) I answered such questions with the reply that the opposite was actually the case. Rather than running low on ideas or growing stale as a result of the week-by-week exposition, I found myself increasingly stimulated by John's narrative and regretful that in spite of every effort on my part I was still unable to penetrate all the deep truths of the book or to express adequately what I saw. In my studies for this volume, particularly for the comments on chapter 6, I found myself delving deeper into the doctrines of grace as summarized under the five distinguishing points of the Reformed faith (or Calvinism) and was greatly blessed as a result. There is a sense in which the founding of the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology (1974) and later my involvement in the work of the Alliance of Confessing Evangelicals (founded 1994) had its origin in my work on this chapter.

There have been related blessings too. In the course of preparing this volume I discovered the sermons of Charles Haddon Spurgeon as I had not done previously, and I came to love his ability to handle even the most difficult doctrines pastorally. Consequently, a debt to Spurgeon shows up increasingly from these pages forward.

At times, as in the first volume, I deviate from a straightforward exposition of the text to deal in somewhat greater detail with themes suggested by it. In the previous volume I did this in reference to witnessing and baptism, which I discussed for a total of eight chapters (chapters 1623). In this volume, eight more chapters are similarly spent, first, in regard to the questions of sabbath observance versus the celebration of Sunday as the day of Christian worship (chapters 59-62) and, second, in regard to the doctrine of the Scriptures (chapters 68-71).

The outline of John's Gospel, which I introduced in volume 1 as the basis of the five-volume division of my exposition, is still being followed. Volume 1 deals with the coming of the light of the Lord Jesus Christ into this world (chapters 1-4). Volume 2 deals with the growth of hostility toward him on the part of the religious leaders (chapters 5-8). This is linked to the sabbath question, hence the lengthy discussion of that subject. Volume 3 shows Jesus beginning to call out a people to himself from among Israel, beginning with the calling of the man who had been born blind (chapters 9-12). Volume 4 examines the final discourses (chapters 13-17). Volume 5 contains an exposition of the last events of Christ's earthly life, culminating in his resurrection (chapters 18-21).

The writing of these studies is the most difficult work I do, far more difficult, for example, than counseling, preaching, traveling, or any of the other normal activities that make up the bulk of an active ministry. Yet this is important work. I trust that it will be greatly blessed to many students of God's Word. Others have worked on this volume, particularly Miss Caecilie Foelster, who carefully edited all my early manuscripts and saw them through the various stages of production. May God richly bless their efforts in thus helping to make the divine Word more widely and fully known. I earnestly pray that what is of the human author only may be quickly forgotten. May that which is of God bear much fruit unto life eternal.

To him who is indeed "that Christ, the Son of the living God" be all glory forever. Amen and amen.

James Montgomery
Boice
Philadelphia,
Pennsylvania

Chapter 57.
Christ and Judaism

John 5:1

The fifth chapter of John's Gospel begins a new section of the book. Like the first major section of the Gospel, this next section extends over four chapters, beginning with chapter 5 and ending with chapter 8. It deals as a whole with the development of opposition to the Lord Jesus Christ on the part of the Jewish leaders in Jerusalem and with Christ's response to their opposition. The fact that this is a new section is important; for if we recognize the differences between this section of the Gospel and the first four chapters, we will have a lesson for ourselves about how we are to persevere in God's service.

Little is ever accomplished in this life without a firm purpose. Caesar would never have conquered Gaul; Einstein would never have discovered relativity; the United States of America would never have landed men on the moon; nor would many thousands of other great accomplishments ever have been achieved without a firm purpose. Moreover, just as this is true in secular matters, so is it true spiritually. The only difficulty is that many Christians seem to live more by whim than by a firm determination to pursue the will of the Lord; consequently, many lack a firm purpose. We know what this means personally when we begin a work but soon drop it, when we determine to study the Bible every day but end up doing so only for about a week, when we get fired up to witness for Jesus Christ but then stop when we notice the first real sign of hostility.

Why do so many Christians seem to live like this? Why do we lack perseverance? There may be many answers, of course, but there are two main reasons—hostility and the danger of success. It is my conviction that these two dangers faced the Lord Jesus Christ in his determination to fulfill the will of his Father in his life and that we can be helped by studying his reactions to them. Simply put, the first of these dangers emerges in the fifth chapter of John in the opposition of the Jewish rulers to Christ and his teachings and is dealt with there, while the second danger—the danger of success—emerges in chapter 6.

At the end of these chapters, chapters 5 and 6, we find Jesus firmly following the path that God had set before him; namely, the path of the cross.

The Jewish Elite

The fifth chapter of the Gospel begins with a sentence that immediately shifts our attention to a new class of people. John writes, "Some time later, Jesus went up to Jerusalem for a feast of the Jews."
The new class of people is "the Jews," but we must not understand this to mean all of the Jewish people; that is, the term is not meant ethnically. When John says "the Jews" he means the Jewish rulers who had their headquarters in Jerusalem, and it is these primarily with whom Jesus now comes into conflict.

The expression "the Jews" is not at all common in the other three Gospels—Matthew, Mark, and Luke. These Gospels use the phrase occasionally, most often in the expression "the King of the Jews." But at the most this is only half a dozen times or so. In John the case is quite different. In the fourth Gospel the phrase occurs some seventy times. It is true that in some instances out of this great number of occurrences the term is neutral, or even praiseworthy, as in Christ's statement, "Salvation is from the Jews" (4:22). But generally the term is used critically of those religious leaders who opposed Christ and the gospel. Thus John clearly distinguishes between the Galileans, who were Jewish in the ethnic sense, but whom he does not call Jews, and the Jews of Jerusalem. Moreover, even in regard to Jerusalem he distinguishes between the leaders, whom he terms "Jews," and others. For instance, the parents of the man born blind were certainly Jewish, but they are not called Jews. Instead, they are said to have reacted in certain ways because "they were afraid of the Jews" (9:22), meaning the religious leaders.

It is these jealous and hostile leaders of the Judaism of Christ's day who are now brought into the picture. According to the first four chapters of John's Gospel most of the major groupings of the nation had already responded to Christ favorably—the disciples of John the Baptist and other Judeans, the Samaritans, the people of Galilee, even (according to the previous chapter) some who were in the service of Herod. The only exception has been the Jewish rulers.

There is probably a historical reason why the Gospel shifts to the conflict between Christ and these men at this point, and this is simply that a number of important historical events had taken place between Christ's last visit to Jerusalem and the visit recorded in the fifth chapter. There is a lapse of time here that John indicates generally by the phrase "some time later." It was during this lapse of time that the events in question took place.

What happened during this period? First, there had been a shift in the policy of Rome toward the Jewish nation that had greatly sharpened the danger of insurrections and war. The anti-Semite Roman commander Sejanus, working through Pilate, deprived the Sanhedrin of its jurisdiction over capital crimes, with the result that the Sanhedrin had to abandon the Great Hall of Hewn Stone in the temple court and move as a body to the market of Annas on the temple mount. We see the results of this change a year or so later when the Sanhedrin was compelled to come to Pilate seeking the death penalty in the case of Jesus Christ. Second, there was an increase, partly as a result of the Roman action, of Zealot activity leading the more pessimistic among the rulers to predict a time of persecution and suffering. Thus, Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai prophesied the future destruction of the temple, and Rabbi Zadok began a forty-year partial fast for the preservation of Jerusalem that ended only when the city was overrun by the Roman legions under Titus and destroyed by them. From the biblical point of view the most significant event was the arrest and eventual execution of John the Baptist, who was Christ's forerunner. We notice this by comparing John 3:24, where we are told that "This was before John was put in prison," with 5:33-35, which speaks of the ministry of John in the past tense.

In such a tumultuous period of history it is no wonder that the leaders of Judaism reacted to the emergence of Jesus as a new and potentially dangerous figure. It is understandable that their hostility intensified when he revealed himself to be above their personal interpretation of the law and actually defended his actions by identifying himself with God the Father. Here is a great hostility. Yet Jesus did not allow this hostility to deter him from following the path the Father had set before him.

Do you allow hostility to deter you? If you determine to live for God in the midst of this sinful world or speak a word for Jesus Christ to those who do not yet know him, you can be sure that hostility in some form will come. Perhaps you have already experienced it. Have you allowed it to get you off the track of Christian living and witnessing? If so, you need to get back on the track by following the example of Jesus.

No Bitterness

Jesus Christ did not allow the hostility of the Jewish leaders to deter him from the path that God had placed before him. But, on the other hand, neither did he allow it to produce a bitterness in his outlook on his ministry. Unfortunately, this bitterness has often happened to Christ's disciples, perhaps to you. I have known Christians who have not allowed hostility to get them off course, but unfortunately they have become so bitter that they have greatly limited their opportunities for service and it has darkened their lives.

It is interesting to note, precisely at this point, that this is what some scholars have claimed happened in the early church in reference to

Judaism, and that we even have a reflection of what happened in references such as those in which John critically mentions "the Jews." In other words, some scholars are saying that Christian anti-Semitism has its origins in the New Testament Scriptures and can be eliminated only when today's Christians repudiate their error at its source.

Let me give you some references that will made this clear. In a recent book a well-known Jewish rabbi, Rabbi Ben Zion Bokser, argues that "the historic roots of Christian anti-Semitism go back to the basic teachings of the New Testament." In another book Rabbi Samuel Sandmel argues similarly, "We Jews figure as villains, all of us or some of us, in much of your Bible. Only very lately has this bothered you extensively and intensively, and the reality has to be faced that some of you are not bothered by this at all."

It is not just rabbis that have been making this point. Actually, the same accusation has been leveled—only in even more forceful language—by Protestants. A. Roy Eckhardt, editor of the Journal of the American Academy of Religion, states that "all the learned exegesis in the world cannot negate the truth that there are elements not only of anti-Judaism but of anti-Semitism in the New Testament." He calls for a denunciation by Christians of "anti-Semitic allegations" in John, in Paul, and elsewhere. On other fronts Noel Freedman of the San Francisco Theological Seminary has claimed that the New Testament "is simply an anti-Semitic book." In the foreword to Judaism and the Christian Predicament, Union Theological Seminary's Frederick C. Grant has expressed the hope that the reversal of traditional attitudes toward the Jews that he detects in our age "will in time ... involve more than just a formal repudiation of anti-Semitism. It will also include a repudiation of impossible literalism and legalism in the interpretation of the Bible, or the refusal to interpret it at all."

Is this true? Is the New Testament anti-Semitic? One cannot help admiring the vigor with which these writers—both Christians and Jews—are attempting to purge the world of anti-Jewish prejudice. And there can be little doubt that the defeat of anti-Semitism is long overdue.

Nevertheless, at the same time, one must question whether this approach properly represents the biblical view and whether the cure prescribed is adequate. Actually, it is more likely that the cavalier way in which some Protestant exegetes handle Scripture actually breeds an insensitivity to it and consequently sets aside the one sure hope of a cure.

In the first place, it simply is not true that the New Testament is anti-Semitic. It is true that the New Testament contains statements that sound anti-Semitic to modern ears, conditioned as they are by centuries of prejudice. The New Testament speaks of a general failure of the Jewish people in the time of the apostles to believe in Jesus as their Messiah and Savior, and it laments this unbelief. Still, if this is to be judged anti-Semitic, then statements about the failure of Gentiles to believe must be considered anti-Gentile. Actually, the New Testament writers show great anguish because those of their own nation had failed to embrace what was for them the "Good News" of God's action in Christ for man's salvation. At no point in any of the nonbiblical literature of the times does any writer claim, as Paul does (Rom. 9:3), that he would be content to see himself accursed if that would bring about the salvation of the Jewish people.

Critics have imagined an anti-Semitic element in John's references to "the Jews" as those who crucified Jesus. But, as we have seen, this was a political designation for John rather than an ethnic one. He himself was a Jew and was proud, as were the other disciples, of his heritage.

Second, the current judgment against certain biblical strains seems to overlook entirely the positive things said about the Jews in the New Testament, even by those writers who are judged to be most anti-Semitic in their statements. Paul is considered a prime offender because of his sharp polemic, particularly against the Judaisers who were subverting his hard-won churches. But it is Paul who most clearly spells out the advantages of Judaism. "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew, or what value is there in circumcision?" he asks. "Much in every way! First of all they have been entrusted with the very words of God" (Rom. 3:1-2). "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ" (Rom. 9:4-5). This certainly is not anti-Semitism. On the contrary, it shows an unusual sensitivity to God's dealings with the Jews in history and great appreciation for the spiritual inheritance available to all men through them.

Moreover, if the Jews as a whole have refused to believe in Jesus, this is remarkable to the New Testament writers precisely because of the way God worked through the Jews in the past. It is this that gives rise to extensive comment. In Paul's mind, the fact that God seems now to be working through the Gentiles, calling out another people, the church, is so unexpected and so astonishing that he properly calls it a "mystery" kept secret since the world began.

Finally, the New Testament also points to great future privileges for Israel, when Israel as a whole will receive her Messiah, even as many individual Jews receive him now. Eckhardt argues that Jesus is not the Messiah of Israel because he is not the kind of Messiah Israel was and is expecting. But this is faulty logic. One might as well say that he is not the Savior of the Gentiles because most Gentiles do not want a Savior. The Christian must argue against both these conclusions, maintaining that Jesus is indeed the Messiah and Savior in spite of people's rejection of him, and that it is precisely people's unawareness of this need that most reveals it. Moreover, it would even be a correct reading of Paul (Romans 9-11) and John (Revelation) to claim that God has preserved the Jewish people throughout history so that they can bear a great witness to him in the end days.

Our Example

The conclusion of all this is that Jesus Christ did not respond to the hostility of the leaders of Israel toward himself with bitterness any more than he allowed their criticism to deter him from his path to the cross. In his reaction we have a pattern for our own.

How are we to avoid these two dangers? There is only one answer. It is by keeping our eyes upon the Lord Jesus. John Bunyan pictured it graphically in Pilgrim's Progress in a scene in which Pilgrim escapes death from two ferocious beasts who are chained to either side of a path.

He escapes by walking directly toward a light that is held before him. Christ is our light. His light shines on the path we are to follow. The Bible admonishes us to lay aside everything that might hinder us in our purpose and to run life's race "fix[ing] our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:2).

Chapter 58.
The Third Miracle

John 5:2-9

It is almost commonplace today to observe that the "system" often seems to help those who need it least while it is hardest on the destitute. We speak of this economically when we say that the rich get richer while the poor get poorer. Those who are well educated often get better educations. Those on the treadmill of unemployment and relief often sink deeper and deeper into the welfare morass. In one sense, some people even apply the principle in the area of religion when they say—wrongly, of course—that "God helps those who help themselves." So deeply is this ingrained in the modern mind that people try to tell me that the last statement—"God helps those who help themselves"—is in the Bible.

Actually, the opposite is true. For one of the great principles of the Word of God is that God, the Almighty, helps the helpless. The gospel is for everyone. But that only means that it is to you and me, who cannot help ourselves spiritually, that the offer of salvation comes.

The Need of Humanity

The fifth chapter of John contains one of the great biblical expressions of this principle. It is the third miracle that John records in his Gospel, specifically the miracle in which Jesus Christ enables a lame man to walk. There are probably two reasons why John records it. First, it was this miracle that marked the beginning of angry disbelief and hostility toward Jesus on the part of the Jewish leaders. It is to this theme that the Gospel now turns. Second, there is the fact that the story illustrates how Jesus came to the weak and helpless, and saved them. This aspect of the story is particularly apparent at the beginning of the account of the hostility that developed between Jesus and the Jewish leaders; for the leaders were the ones who should have accepted him and among whom we would have thought he should have done his most extensive work. But they were insensitive, and Christ moved instead among the masses.

John tells us that all this happened when Jesus returned to Jerusalem for a feast. This would have been one of the great religious feasts of Israel, though we do not know which one. Apparently he was alone, for none of the disciples is mentioned as having been with him. While in Jerusalem Jesus passed by the pool of Bethesda, which John tells us was distinguished by five collonades, where he saw the lame man.

It is interesting to stop at this point to note that the pool of Bethesda, mentioned here by John, is now known to archaeologists. There was a time when critics of the Gospel were giving the book a very late dating and were arguing in part on the basis of this reference that the author of the Gospel did not really know what Jerusalem was like in Christ's time. They said no one had ever heard of a pool by this name and, besides, no one has ever even uncovered a five-sided pool from antiquity. Now, however, the name "Beth Eshatain" has emerged from the copper scroll found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. It gives us the name Bethesda. And what is even more important, the pool itself has been found. Actually, the pool of Bethesda (now known as the pool of St. Anne) is two twin pools each surrounded by colonnades. Thus, there are five collonades—four of which surround the pools and one that divides them. This is the pool of which the apostle John was writing when he recorded that in Christ's day sick people gathered there believing that an angel intermittently stirred up the water, and that whenever this happened the next person to step into the water would be cured.

It is a pitiful picture, as John relays it. But it is far more pitiful when we realize that he is including the description to dramatize the helpless and woefully hopeless condition of the human race.

"Now there is in Jerusalem near the Sheep Gate a pool, which in Aramaic is called Bethesda and which is surrounded by five covered colonnades. Here a great number of disabled people used to lie—the blind, the lame, the paralyzed" (5:2-3). What a comprehensive description that is! It is really a twofold description. First, the people are called disabled; that is, they are said to be without strength to help themselves. Then, their disability is spelled out by three more terms. John calls them blind, lame, and paralyzed.

This is the human race as it stands apart from the grace of God through Jesus Christ. How does God view people before that act in which he places new life within them? One answer is in Romans 5:6, which tells us that it was when we were "still powerless" that Christ died for the "ungodly." The American Standard Version of the Bible and the Roman Catholic Confraternity translation both translate this verse to say that it was when we were "weak" that the love of God was shown to us. The Williams and Goodspeed translations say "helpless." Phillips uses the English word "powerless." Beyond this, the lexicons tell us that the Greek word means "infirm, feeble, unable to achieve anything great, destitute of power among men, sluggish in doing right." In other words, God tells us that it was when we found it impossible to do anything for ourselves spiritually that Christ died for us.

When we use the word "impossible," we must be careful to indicate in what sense the word is meant. For instance, there are cases of conditional impossibility in which we mean that something is impossible unless something else should happen. I might say that it is impossible for me to pay all this month's bills, but that is a conditional impossibility since it might happen that I would receive an unexpected check that would cover them. I would be using the word in the same way if I should say that it is impossible for me to take on an extra job, unless I drop one that I am already doing; or that it is impossible for me to work with this noise, unless I wear earmuffs. I could extend this list indefinitely, for there will always be an infinite number of things that are impossible, unless something else should happen.

In quite another category, however, are those impossibilities that will remain impossibilities because they can never be affected by circumstances. It is impossible for a thing to be true and false at the same time and in the same relationship. It is impossible for black to be white. It is impossible for something to exist and not exist at the same time. God places disabled man in this category of impossibilities when he declares that it is impossible for man to do anything by himself that will satisfy God.

We find these truths summarized in the many verses that tell us what man cannot do spiritually.
We read, "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). Jesus asked the people of his day, "Why is my language not clear to you?" then answered, "Because you are unable to hear what I say" (John 8:43). Peter wrote that, unaided by God, a person cannot cease from sin (2 Peter 2:14).

Blind, Lame, Paralyzed

In case any should question the full import of what John is teaching at this point, he goes on to three additional terms to characterize the great multitude at the pool of Bethesda. They also characterize us. The first term is "blind." Jesus spoke of this blindness in chapter 3 when he told Nicodemus, "No one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again" (3:3). He spoke of it again when he said to the religious leaders (after he had healed a man who had been born blind), "If you were blind [i.e., like the man who had been born blind but who, nevertheless, had believed], you would not be guilty of sin; but now that you claim you can see [which they could not do], your guilt remains" (9:41). The religious leaders thought they could see, but they were actually blind about spiritual things, as they proved by their refusal to believe on Jesus. The man who had been born blind knew he was blind, but Jesus gave him spiritual as well as physical sight, which he proved by confessing Jesus as his Lord and by worshiping him (9:38).

The second word is "lame." It follows the other, for how can a person walk the narrow way that leads to life if he is blind? The story of the paralytic man who was brought to Jesus by his friends who lowered him into Jesus' presence on a mat through an opening in the ceiling illustrates our spiritual lameness (Matt. 9:1-2; Mark 2:1-5; Luke 5:17-21). The man could not come on his own. He needed someone to bring him to Jesus. Jesus spoke of man's inability to walk in a spiritual sense when he declared, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (6:44).

Finally, John also tells us that humanity is "paralyzed." Have you never heard someone say, "Oh, I ought to get up and do so and so, but I feel so tired I can't raise my arms. I feel paralyzed"? Well, that is precisely the case in spiritual terms. The difficulty is not with knowing that there is a job to be done. We should be righteous. We should be like Jesus Christ. It is just that when we think about such a standard we seem paralyzed. Certainly, we could say with the apostle Paul as he writes of himself apart from the power of God at work in his life, "For I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out" (Rom. 7:18).

Grace

It is a desperate picture if we take it seriously. Yet it is the glorious prelude to the gospel of God's grace, for it is to such people—blind, lame, and paralyzed—that Christ came.

We read that the Lord Jesus Christ walked into that vast collection of sick people and saw there a man who had been disabled for thirty-eight years. No one recognized Christ as he moved among them, for they were blind spiritually. Besides, they had their hopes set on the superstition about the moving of the water. No one rose to meet him, for they were lame. No one reached out a hopeful hand; they were paralyzed. Yet Jesus moved among them and healed this most helpless of sinners.

"Do you want to get well?" Jesus asked him.

The lame man answered, "Sir, I have no one to help me into the pool when the water is stirred. While I am trying to get in, someone else goes down ahead of me."

Jesus commanded, "Get up, pick up your mat and walk." At once the man was made well and did as Jesus commanded.

That is how God saves sinners today. If our salvation depended upon our recognizing him or reaching out a hand toward him, who would be saved? The answer is: No one. Yet instead of waiting for us to come—instead of waiting to "help those who help themselves"—Christ comes to us and speaks the words that give life.

In Harry Ironside's commentary on this passage, the well-known Bible teacher tells a story from the early days of his ministry. He was in San Francisco at the time, and it was his custom then to take some of the Sunday school children down to the beach on Washington's birthday. On one particular morning, as he did this, he found the beach covered with all sorts of wreckage. At first no one knew where it had come from. But later, when they had returned to the city, they learned that it had come from a great liner called the Rio de Janeiro, which had been on its way to America from China. Trying to make the San Francisco harbor in the fog the previous evening, the ship had run upon a rock and been broken in pieces. Although hundreds of people were drowned in this accident, some escaped. The newspaper told this story about one of them. A young American journalist on board ship had both his legs broken. He lost consciousness, and while in that condition had been thrown into the water. The water probably brought him back to consciousness and he began to float. He floated for hours. Finally that utterly helpless man was drawn out of the water by a rescue party. As Ironside read that, he saw in the story a marvelous picture of God's grace to sinners. Some swam for hours before they were picked up, strong and hearty men. Others were drowned. But this man had no ability to swim; he was helpless. Yet he was saved. No wonder Jesus told us that "the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost" (Luke 19:10).

No Argument

He came to find you. Will you argue that you are not helpless, that you are not blind, lame, or paralyzed? If you will argue God's verdict upon your spiritual capabilities, you will not be saved. The Bible teaches that God will not debate his verdict upon the spiritual condition of the human race. God declares that the creature is not the Creator. You are not as perfect as the Lord Jesus Christ, and that makes you a spiritual paralytic or any other name for a handicap that you may wish to apply to it. Yet—this is the glory of the gospel—it is for such that Christ died.

In the seventeenth century, an English bishop named William Beveridge wrote these words: "I cannot pray, except I sin; I cannot preach, but I sin; I cannot administer, nor receive the holy sacrament, but I sin. My very repentance needs to be repented of; and the tears I shed need washing in the blood of Christ." Bishop Beveridge was right. But as soon as I am able to accept the fact that I am ungodly man by nature and therefore completely unable to rise to meet God by any inborn effort, then I can also know that my sins have been dealt with in Christ and that he gives new life to all who trust him for their salvation.

Chapter 59.
Lord of the Sabbath

John 5:9-16

The ninth verse of chapter 5 has brought us to an ominous note. The story of the healing of the disabled man at the pool of Bethesda has just been told, but at this point we read: "The day on which this took place was a Sabbath."

This does not sound too serious to us because the observance or nonobservance of the sabbath is not too big an issue in our time. Nevertheless, the issue was serious in Christ's time and, what is more, actually loomed larger and larger as Christ's ministry unfolded. On the grounds of this issue the Jerusalem authorities eventually plotted to destroy him. It is also true, however, that in another sense the issues are serious in our time too, even though, strictly speaking, most persons are not struggling with the question of how to worship God on Saturday. The importance of the issue emerges when we ask these questions: Why is it that Christians generally worship on the first day of the week, on Sunday, rather than on the Jewish sabbath, which is Saturday? Is God displeased with worship on either one of these days? Why do we not observe both? Or even, why observe either? Does worship on a given day of the week have anything to do with true religion?

These questions lie behind the subject matter of the next four studies, each of which deals with the sabbath-Sunday question. More specifically, the chapters deal with the problem that arose between Jesus and the Jewish authorities, the purpose and history of the Jewish sabbath, the significance of the Christian observance of the first day of the week, and the question of how we as Christians should celebrate it.

Grace or Regulations?

We must begin, however, with the real significance of the sabbath question, and that is: Is the Christian to be ruled by grace or is he to be under regulations? The special gravity of this problem is set forth in a quotation that shows Dr. Lewis Sperry Chafer's view of the sabbath question.

"The distinction between the reign of law and the reign of grace is at no point more sharply drawn than in the question of the observance of the seventh day of the week or the first day of the week; for these two days are symbolical of the dispensations to which they are related. Likewise, at no point is personal religious prejudice, which is born of early training and sentiment, more assertive than on the sabbath question. It was His liberal teaching on the observance of the sabbath which, more than aught else, provoked the wrath of the Jewish leaders against Christ, and, it may be observed, there is no religious subject today which so draws out personal convictions and opinions. The reason is evident. Few have really comprehended the exact character and principle of grace. To many, Christianity is a system of human works and character building from which merit accrues. And the observance of a sabbath day presents extraordinary opportunities for the exercise of meritorious works."

This, of course, was precisely the situation in Christ's day, as also in ours. God had commanded a sabbath for the Jewish people, but the leaders had perverted it by transforming it into a system by which they thought they were earning grace by good works.

The need to observe the sabbath is found in the Ten Commandments. God said, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates" (Exod. 20:8-10). This basic principle was further developed in other Old Testament books and was applied to all areas of Jewish life, even to the way the fields were treated. Thus, Jeremiah warns that the failure of the people of his day to properly observe the sabbath would result in the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians: "Be careful not to carry a load on the Sabbath day or bring it through the gates of Jerusalem. Do not bring a load out of your houses or do any work on the Sabbath, but keep the Sabbath day holy, as I commanded your forefathers. ...But if you do not obey me to keep the Sabbath day holy by not carrying any load as you come through the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, then I will kindle an unquenchable fire in the gates of Jerusalem that will consume her fortresses" (Jer. 17:21-22, 27).

This was God's teaching for Israel concerning the sabbath. Moreover, it was taken so seriously by him that we even read that the people remained captive in Babylon for seventy years so that all the broken sabbaths on the land might be paid for (2 Chron. 36:21).

The difficulty lay in the fact that the leaders of Israel had added man's regulations to God's law, and this had reduced the observance of the sabbath to the worst forms of legalism. For instance, the law said that a man was not to travel on the sabbath day (Exod. 16:29). "But what is traveling?" asked the scribes. "What constitutes a journey?" In answering this question they then developed the concept of a sabbath day's journey, which was roughly a thousand yards. So a man could walk that far on the sabbath, but to walk more than that was sin. If, however, a rope was tied across the end of a street, then the whole street technically became one house; and a man could walk a thousand yards beyond the rope. Or if he deposited enough food for a meal at any given place on Friday night, on the next day he could walk to it, eat his meal (thereby technically establishing a home), and then walk a thousand yards more. If he were clever enough at this, I suppose that a determined man could walk halfway across Palestine.

Or, take the matter of carrying a burden. The text in Jeremiah prohibits this. But what is a burden? Is a handkerchief a burden? The answer was yes if it was carried, but no if it was worn as an article of clothing. So, obviously, the way to get a handkerchief out of an upstairs drawer and into a downstairs drawer was to take it out of the one, tie it around your neck, go downstairs, and then place it in the new location.

The same logic also worked in this way. Take a man who is out walking. He spits. Is that work? It depends on what happens to the saliva. If it goes into the dirt and makes a slight furrow, then that is plowing and it is work. But if it hits a rock, no work is done. So, under this system, being religious on Saturday more or less depended on which direction you spit.

All this was abhorrent to the Lord Jesus Christ. So he determined to rescue Israel from her enslavement to these man-made sabbath regulations and to restore a proper balance by showing that the sabbath was made for man rather than man for the sabbath. In this way he paved the way for a fuller revelation of God's grace in his coming death and resurrection.

The Example of King David

We want to come back to the discussion of this theme in John's Gospel, but before we do we need to turn to the parallel discussion of the same issue in Matthew. The reason is that Matthew's Gospel, more than John's, was written to Jews and therefore develops this subject in a fuller form.

Jesus had been walking through the grain fields with his disciples on the sabbath, and his disciples were hungry. The disciples leaned over and gathered a few heads of grain. They rubbed it in their hands, releasing the chaff, and then ate the ripe grain. Unfortunately, nearby Pharisees saw it and objected that it was not lawful for the disciples to do this on the sabbath; for, according to their view, this was harvesting. Jesus answered, "Haven't you read what David did when he and his companions were hungry? He entered the house of God, and he and his companions ate the consecrated bread—which was not lawful for them to do, but only for the priests. Or haven't you read in the Law that on the Sabbath the priests in the temple desecrate the day and yet are innocent? I tell you that one greater than the temple is here. If you had known what these words mean, I desire mercy, not sacrifice,' you would not have condemned the innocent. For the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath" (Matt. 12:3-8).

In this reply there are three principles. The first is contained in Jesus' remarks concerning King David. Every Jew knew the story to which he referred. David had been anointed by God to be king over the people, but they had rejected this anointed king in order to follow Absalom, David's rebellious son. David was forced to flee from Jerusalem for his life. He had no food. Being without food, he and his followers entered the tabernacle and took the "consecrated" that was always there and ate it. Every Jew knew that only the priests were allowed to enter the temple. Only priests could eat this bread. Nevertheless, God did not strike David dead for doing it. Why? The explanation is that God considered the anointing of David to be more important than the law about the bread. And it was useless and hypocritical for the people to be pretending to serve God through the minute laws of the tabernacle worship when they were rejecting God's king. It is insulting to God to act out ritual if the heart is far from him.

This clearly applied to the situation in Christ's day. For it was also useless and hypocritical for the scribes and Pharisees to be insisting upon their little sabbath rules while they were actually turning their back on God's anointed Messiah, the Lord Jesus. There he was! He was greater than the temple! So if they rejected him, even the sabbath, backed by all the Old Testament laws, was meaningless.

Formalism

The second principle in Christ's reply is that the formalism practiced by the Jewish authorities actually blinds one to real need. In other words, it hardens people in their relationship to others. Jesus noted this when he remarked that they did not know the meaning of the statement, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice."

Here were men who were being punctilious in the observance of their interpretation of God's law, and yet we read that because Jesus was not obeying their regulations they were determining to kill him. Moreover, they would even try to keep their own regulations while they did it. The arrest of Jesus came at the time of the Passover, the most holy week and day in Israel's calendar. The difficulty these men faced was that they wanted to dispose of Jesus without defiling themselves for the Passover. So they held a conference to see how they could fit it all in. They concluded that it could be done if they could follow this order. There would be a trial by night (which was illegal—but not so illegal, they argued, as failing to keep the Passover). Next there would be an official trial by day, in the early morning hours. There would be an approach to Pilate (they needed to make sure that no one actually went into his quarters, for that would defile any Jew and prohibit him from eating the Passover). Finally there would be the execution. The whole thing would be over by noontime, and everyone involved could then go and worship Jehovah. So they marched along the little path of their own regulations. When it was necessary they stepped out just enough to murder God. Then they stepped back in and went on with their formalism.

Let this horror teach us how terrible it is to have a religion of rules and ceremonies when the heart is far from the Savior. No horror is so great that it has not been practiced by someone at some time in the name of religion. And nothing is so bad as the tendency of the human heart to seize on some outward, useless, and hypocritical ceremony and follow it to the letter without turning at all to God.

In contrast to this deadly effect of formalism on the lives of the Jewish leaders, Jesus simply showed by his actions that people were far more important than rules and that the showing of mercy is a far higher obligation upon a follower of God than regulations. Thus, in Matthew, after Jesus' discussion with the leaders, he simply healed a man with a withered hand (Matt. 12:9-13), while in John he provoked the same issue by curing the disabled man (John 5:1-16). The Pharisees wanted to use these men to trap Jesus. Jesus, out of his great compassion, wanted to heal them.

These verses from Matthew also show a third principle. It brings us back to the account of the conflict in John. The third principle Jesus states is that whatever their little rules and regulations might be, he, rather than they, was the Lord of the sabbath. He established the sabbath. He was God. This was his claim. Thus, he could alter the sabbath, suspend it, or even remove it as the case would be. In the same way today, Jesus makes a claim to be the Lord of your sabbaths, your habits, your aspirations, your abilities, your life. We are faced with the same fact of human nature that the Pharisees faced; namely, that it is so much nicer to try to pile up a collection of human credits than to allow Jesus to manifest his lordship in our lives. The lordship of Jesus Christ? That is Christianity. The other is only religion.

The Committee

At this point the story in John's Gospel ends with a very dark sentence. It had begun on an ominous note—"the day on which this took place was a sabbath"—but by now the skies that were threatening had become so black with clouds that they contained murder. We are told, "So, because Jesus was doing these things on the Sabbath day, the Jews persecuted him" (v. 16).

What does this mean? Well, it means that the Jews of Christ's day did what organized religion often does. They formed a committee. The purpose of this committee was to find a way to trap Jesus. We would call it a lynching committee. We do not know exactly what was said, of course, for the hearings of this committee were conducted behind closed doors. Nevertheless, we have a pretty good idea from what happened afterward. One of the rabbis must have said, "Let's get him on the question of taxes. We'll ask if he considers it right to pay taxes to the Roman government. If he says yes, we'll laugh him to scorn. For we'll say, 'What kind of a Messiah is this who tells us to knuckle under to the Romans?' But if he says no, we'll have him then too. For we'll simply go to the Romans and say, 'You have an insurrectionist on your hands.'" They put the question to Jesus. But Jesus destroyed their arguments by replying, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's" (Matt. 22:21).

The Pharisees went back to their meeting. Someone else said, "Let's get Jesus on a moral issue. Let's find a woman who is committing adultery and then drag her off to Jesus. We'll say, 'What are you going to do about it?' If he says, 'Let her go free,' we'll accuse him of disregarding the law, for Moses said that an adulteress should be killed by stoning. But if he says, 'Do what Moses commanded; kill her,' then we will laugh in his face: 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you a brick.'"

"Why all this viciousness?" one commentator asks. "Why this desire to destroy the meek and lowly Jesus? Why this murderous attempt to do away with God? The answer is here in the sabbath question. They wanted rules, they did not want God's grace. They wanted human merit. They did not want the simplicity of divine pardon. They wanted to do something for themselves. They had it all worked out. They would make a show of keeping a day as sacred, while their hearts wallowed in lust and their minds conceived schemes of greed. Their avarice could swell to outrageous proportions, but the sabbath would be their cloak. Keeping a day would be their mask."

The Pharisees and scribes saw that Jesus was destroying this dream castle they had built. So they devised means to do him in. In a sense, of course, they succeeded. At least they put him to death. They killed him. But he rose from the dead and—think how ironic and significant this is—not on their useless sabbath of death, but on the first day of the week, soon to become the new day of joyous Christian celebration.

Chapter 60.
The History of the Sabbath

John 5:9-16

Many devout Christians would agree with everything I have said up to this point about the Jewish perversion of the sabbath in the time of Jesus Christ, but they would still insist that the seventh day of the week rather than the first day of the week is the proper day for Christian worship. In fact, whole denominations teach this doctrine. And in addition to those who belong to these denominations and believe this teaching, there are undoubtedly others who observe Sunday but who are nevertheless confused about the issue and sometimes wonder why they worship on Sunday.

This study will be far-ranging. For some it may appear too complex or detailed. I believe, however, that if we study these themes, we will profit immensely both in understanding the unique dealings of God with the Jewish people and in appreciating the special and God-given character of the Christian's Sunday.

No Sabbath before Moses

The earliest mention of any sabbath, either in the Bible or in secular writings, occurs early in Genesis. It is found there even before the fall of Adam. We are told that "by the seventh day God had finished the work he had been doing; so on the seventh day he rested from all his work. And God blessed the seventh day and made it holy, because on it he rested from all the work of creating that he had done" (Gen. 2:2-3). Obviously, this verse appeals to those who believe that everyone should worship on the seventh day, and I must admit frankly that this is a possible support for their argument. Certainly, if we had no other references to the sabbath in Scripture and found that men as a whole observed it, that would be a reasonable explanation for the practice and a basis for it. On the assumption that this basis exists, Sabbatarians claim that the setting apart of the sabbath day by God in the Garden of Eden established a law that is binding on every member of the human race.

The difficulty, however, is that Genesis 2:2-3 does not exactly say this and, what is more, there is ample evidence to the contrary both in secular records and in Scripture. What these verses say is that God blessed the seventh day because on it he ceased from the work of creation. But it does not say when he sanctified it; that could have occurred later. Nor is there any record either here or elsewhere of any actual sabbath observance by anyone before the time of Moses. There is evidence of the offering of sacrifices, of prayer, of circumcision by Jewish people before Moses' day—but not of sabbath keeping. Besides, there is no evidence that any nation other than Israel ever kept the sabbath at any time—either before Moses' day, after his day, or currently.

This argument from silence has its limitations, of course. An argument from silence always does.

Nevertheless, we cannot overlook the fact that the sabbath is not even mentioned in the Book of Job in spite of the fact that the whole discussion throughout the better part of forty-two chapters turns on the many details of human obligation toward God. Job is concerned with a historical period several hundred years before the exodus and thus throws additional light on our discussion relating to this period.

For Jews Only

Having looked at the major text cited in support of Sabbatarianism from the early history of the race, we must now turn to passages that tell us when the sabbath was instituted and for whom.

The first is in Nehemiah. Nehemiah had been instrumental in furthering a great revival among the Jews who had returned to Jerusalem after the Babylonian captivity, and in connection with this revival he had been active in encouraging a special service of worship and rededication. In this service the priests led the people in praising God. They said about God's relationship to Israel, "You came down on Mount Sinai; you spoke to them from heaven. You gave them regulations and laws that are just and right, and decrees and commands that are good. You made known to them your holy Sabbath and gave them commands, decrees and laws through your servant Moses" (Neh. 9:13-14). Here the establishing of the sabbath is linked to the giving of the law at Sinai. It is implied that the sabbath itself was not known or observed before that time.

The second passage is from Exodus, which takes us back to the time at which the law concerning the sabbath was first revealed to Israel. Exodus says: "Then the LORD said to Moses, 'Say to the Israelites, "You must observe my Sabbaths. This will be a sign between me and you for the generations to come, so you may know that I am the LORD, who makes you holy. Observe the Sabbath, because it is holy to you. Anyone who desecrates it must be put to death; whoever does any work on that day must be cut off from his people. For six days, work is to be done, but the seventh day is a Sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD. Whoever does any work on the Sabbath day must be put to death. The Israelites are to observe the Sabbath, celebrating it for the generations to come as a lasting covenant. It will be a sign between me and the Israelites forever, for in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, and on the seventh day he abstained from work and rested"" (Exod. 31:12-17).

In these verses the sabbath is described as a sign between God and Israel. The fact that it is between God and Israel is important; it is mentioned twice. Moreover, a direct address to Israel either by name or by second person pronouns occurs nine times. It is difficult to see how anything other than prejudice could apply these words to any nation other than Israel or miss the fact that the sabbath was a part of the law and as such was intended to distinguish the nation of Israel from others.

The third passage makes the same point. In Ezekiel God tells us of his special dealings with the Jewish people: "Therefore I led them out of Egypt and brought them into the desert. I gave them my decrees and made known to them my laws, for the man who obeys them will live by them. Also I gave them my Sabbaths as a sign between us, so they would know that I the LORD made them holy" (Ezek. 20:10-12). Once again the verses reiterate that the sabbath was made known by God at Sinai and that it was exclusively a sign for Israel.

We might add at this point that only a sabbath applied to Israel living within the fairly fixed geographical bounds of Palestine either makes sense or is possible. Why? Because the sabbath obviously begins at different times in different parts of the world due to the different time zones. Thus, it is impossible for people all over the earth to observe it simultaneously, as Sabbatarian theory would seem to require.

Perhaps the final and most conclusive evidence for this special giving of the law of sabbath observance to Israel lies in the interesting fact that the sabbath, if known, was not observed even by Israel before God's special revelation concerning it. The evidence for this is in the fact that on the way to Sinai God gave Israel a preview of what was coming concerning the sabbath by means of his instructions concerning the gathering of manna. It was the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure from Egypt, and the people were hungry. They complained to Moses. God told Moses that he would send bread from heaven in a form that was later called manna. They would receive it each day for six days; but then on the sixth day, they were to gather double, for on the next day, the seventh, there would be no provision. The people did this, not knowing precisely why there would be no bread on the seventh day. On the sixth day, therefore, after they had gathered double manna, Moses explained in full, saying, "This is what the LORD commanded: 'Tomorrow is to be a day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the Lord. So bake what you want to bake and boil what you want to boil. Save whatever is left and keep it until morning.' ... Bear in mind the the LORD has given you the Sabbath; that is why on the sixth day he gives you bread for two days. Everyone is to stay where he is on the seventh day; no one is to go out." We read, "So the people rested on the seventh day" (Exod. 16:23, 29, 30).

The point of all this is that the events of this chapter, which I have just summarized, cover eight days, ending with the first observance of the sabbath in history. And if someone should argue that the first day was also a sabbath, a close examination of the chapter will show that this was not so. For on that day, according to verse 1, the people journeyed from Elim to the wilderness of Sin, a distance of over twenty miles. Clearly this was a far cry from the sabbath day of rest that was given to the people a week later.

Perhaps it is also worth noting here that Lewis Sperry Chafer, who writes on the sabbath question in his book entitled Grace, wisely points out that even in Israel the sabbath was not always celebrated on the seventh day of the week and that, because of the Jewish calendar, it was often the case that certain kinds of work were done on all days, even on Saturdays. He writes: "The sabbath, but for necessary exceptions, was the seventh in a series of seven, whether of days or years. Of necessity it often fell on other days of the week as well as on Saturday. There were at least fifteen sabbaths which were fixed dates in their given month, and these sabbaths fell on those particular dates regardless of the day of the week.... Again, certain working days were established days.

The lamb must be taken on the tenth day of the first month and be killed, roasted with fire, and eaten on the fourteenth day of the month. Likewise, Abid sixteenth could in no wise have been a sabbath for that date was appointed as the beginning of harvest (Deut. 16:9; cf. Lev. 23:15). All these labors would have been direct violations of the sabbath law; yet these ceremonies were appointed for certain predetermined dates, and from time to time must inevitably have been in conflict with the predetermined sabbath."

We conclude that the sabbath was for Israel alone, that it was neither instituted nor observed before the exodus and the giving of the law at Sinai, and that even in Israel the sabbath itself was not always observed on the seventh day of the week. Even in Israel, God was not interested in the seventh day as an inflexibly recurring seven. For it was true then, as now, even though in that day Israel was under law and the sabbath was a divine regulation, it is useless to worship God by rules if the heart is far from him.

End of the Sabbath

Finally, I want you to see how completely and abruptly the practice of sabbath observance changed with the coming of the gospel of Christ. Some have objected that Jesus himself observed the sabbath, which is true. But the attempt to insist on the observance of Saturday because Jesus observed it comes from the failure to realize that the reign of law gave way to the reign of grace at his death. Jesus was born a Jew, born "under the law." During his lifetime he kept the sabbath, although, of course, in the way God intended it to be kept rather than in the way the scribes and Pharisees dictated. He was a Jew. Yet at his death law as a system binding upon God's people passed away. Paul declares that through his death God blotted out "the written code, with its regulations against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross" (Col. 2:14).

Did you know that in Acts the word "sabbath" is found only nine times and that not once is it spoken of as a day observed by Christians? The first chapter speaks of it in the phrase "a Sabbath day's walk" (v. 12). In chapter 13 the word occurs four times in describing how Paul used the sabbath day for his evangelistic ends, going into the synagogue to preach to the Jews who were assembled there (vv. 14, 27, 42, 44). Later chapters give similar references (15:21; 16:13; 17:2; 18:4). Nowhere is it even suggested that God's people met on the seventh day or even regarded it with any special affection or attention.

Finally, in the epistles we are told explicitly that believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are freed from all such observances. Thus, we find Paul writing, "Therefore do not let anyone judge you by what you eat or drink, or with regard to a religious festival, a New Moon celebration or a Sabbath day. These are a shadow of the things that were to come; the reality, however, is found in Christ" (Col. 2:16-17). Or again, writing to the Galatians, "But now that you know God—or rather are known by God—how is it that you are turning back to those weak and miserable principles? Do you wish to be enslaved by them all over again? You are observing special days and months and seasons and years! I fear for you, that somehow I have wasted my efforts on you" (Gal. 4:9-11).

"It is significant, then, that in all the Epistles, wherein the believer's obligation under grace is set forth," as Chafer says, "the only use of the word sabbath is under absolute prohibition concerning observance, and that it is there held to be in conflict with the most vital and superseding elements of grace."

God's Grace

We need to stop at this point. In the next chapter we are going to move in a freer and much more positive way to a discussion of why Christians worship on Sunday instead of on Saturday and what associations this day has for them. But before we do that we need to say one thing in reference to those who insist that God still requires a sabbath-day observance. It is true that we are told in Scripture that we are not to be bound by days. But it is also true that we are not to judge those who are so bound. Paul writes to the Romans, therefore, that although it is wrong to be bound by days, nevertheless, it is possible for an uninformed Christian to observe them even, from his point of view, to God's glory (Rom. 14:5-6). In dealing with our Christian brothers in such matters we are to deal in great love.

At the same time and without the least pride, we will be able to profit from our knowledge and so flee with horror from a legalism that would bind us to days. "When we are thus free," one writes, "the Lord will possess our Mondays and Tuesdays, our Wednesdays and Thursdays, our Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays, and all our days and weeks and months and years because he has bought us and possesses our hearts in simple grace."

Chapter 61.
The Day of the Resurrection

John 5:9-16

In my study at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia I have a volume called The American Book of Days. It is a compendium of information about America's holidays, festivals, and anniversaries arranged like a volume of daily readings—several anniversaries or holidays for each day of the year. It is hard to read it without getting the point that, no matter what the day of the year may be, that day is important for someone. We all have our special days—a birthday, the day we became engaged, our wedding day, the day of our promotion, even the anniversary of the death of some special friend.

In this chapter we want to deal with the most important day of all. It is a great day, and the best thing about it is that it does not occur merely once each year; it occurs weekly. That day is Sunday. It is important because it is the weekly remembrance of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ and because, for those who will have it so, it marks a new relationship between the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ and those who believe in him.

A New Day

I make the point that Sunday is a new and joyous day because there are some within the Christian church who try to make Sunday into something somber and serious, which it was never intended to be. They try to make it into a Christian duplication of the Jewish sabbath. In some cases these persons even go so far as to abandon the celebration of Sunday altogether and instead observe Saturday. This, according to the New Testament, is to fall from grace into law, which means falling into bondage to the observance of "days and months and seasons and years" (Gal. 4:10).

In speaking about this subject I have found that many persons are helped to see the difference between Saturday worship and Sunday worship by realizing that God never intended the observance of the Jewish sabbath to go on indefinitely. In fact, in the heart of the Old Testament, in the Book of Psalms, there is a prophecy concerning the time at which the sabbath observance would end and actually give way to the entirely different Christian celebration. In Psalm 118 we are told: "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone; the LORD has done this, and it is marvelous in our eyes. This is the day the LORD has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it" (vv. 22-24).

There is nothing in the Bible itself to explain the image—"the stone the builders rejected"—but there is an explanation of it in Jewish tradition. At the time of the building of Solomon's temple all the stones for the temple were cut to shape at the quarry and were then transported to the temple site where they were assembled without the sound of metallic tools. The achievement of this goal required great care in the cutting of the stones, and the architect's plans were closely followed. One day a stone that did not seem to fit the building arrived at the construction site. The builders laid it aside, and it was soon forgotten. Some time later the builders came to a place in the building where a special stone, a keystone or cornerstone, was required. They sent down to request it from the stonecutters in the quarry, but they were told that the stone they requested had already been sent up. After a while the old, rejected stone was found. This was the one that was missing. So the proverb,

"The stone the builders rejected became the capstone," passed into the language.

In Psalm 118 this proverb is quoted, but it is quoted with a prophetic cast. It is used as an image to picture Christ's coming death and resurrection. Jesus is the stone that the leaders of Israel refused. Yet he has become the cornerstone of God's righteous dealings with mankind. The day of the recovery of the stone is the day of the resurrection. Thus, this day, the day of the resurrection, is the new day that the Lord made and in which all who know him as Savior shall be glad.

We know that this is a proper interpretation of Psalm 118:22-24 because it was the interpretation given to it by Peter when he spoke before the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem after the Lord's resurrection. He said of Jesus: "He is 'the stone you builders rejected, which has become the capstone.' Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:11-12).

The conclusion is that the Christian Sunday, the Lord's Day, has no relationship whatever to the Jewish sabbath. We do not celebrate Sunday because God once set aside the seventh-day observance for Israel. We celebrate Sunday because on that day God did a marvelous new thing in raising the Lord Jesus Christ from the dead.

Eleven Important Events

I wonder if you have ever noticed that beginning with the resurrection, every event recorded in the New Testament that had important religious significance fell on the first day of the week, the Lord's Day. This has been pointed out by Lewis Sperry Chafer in his book Grace. There are eleven events.

1. The first and most important of these eleven events is that on the first day of the week Jesus Christ arose from the dead. This great fact is mentioned in all the Gospels and is referred to constantly throughout the rest of the New Testament.

I often have said in speaking about the resurrection of Christ that the celebration of the first day of the week by the earliest Christians, rather than the observance of the Jewish sabbath, is itself one of the great proofs that the resurrection occurred. It is a remarkable fact that although most of the early believers were Jews and although they had long been in the habit of worshiping on Saturday, nevertheless another day was chosen as the day of Christian gathering. This could not come about either by whim or by chance. Only the actual, historical resurrection of Jesus Christ can account for it. It is one of the great evidences for the resurrection. On the other hand, the fact that there was a Sunday resurrection is in its turn evidence of the new character of the age in which we live. Thus, we pattern our lives on the resurrection life of Christ and not on the principles of Mosaic legislation.

Chafer writes, "When Christ arose from the dead, Christianity was born, and the new creation was brought into existence. There is nothing in the old order for the believer. He stands on resurrection ground. He belongs only to the new creation. God is faithful to all that He has wrought in Christ and He, according to His Word, will not suffer the child of the new creation to go back and celebrate the beginning of the old and fallen creation from which His child has been saved through infinite riches of grace. If the children of grace persist in relating themselves to the old creation by the observance of the sabbath, it is evidence of their limitations in the knowledge of the Word and will of God; it is to fall from grace."

2. On the first day of the week the Lord Jesus Christ ascended into heaven for the first time after his earthly life. We find a record of this in John 20:17, in which Jesus says to Mary Magdalene, "Go... to my brothers and tell them 'I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God.'"

Where did Jesus spend the forty days between the events of this Easter morning and his final ascension into heaven nearly seven weeks later? We must not think of him as darting around the countryside trying to hide behind rocks or trees and then appearing suddenly for a few moments in what are the recorded appearances of the Lord to his disciples. During those days Jesus passed freely between earth and heaven, the first time being early on the first Easter morning. Do you remember how he said to Mary, "Do not hold on to me, for I have not yet returned to the Father," but then a very short time later allowed the other women to touch him and that evening invited the disciples to do so also (Matt. 28:9; Luke 24:39)? It is an apparent contradiction, but the answer that seems right to me is that between the two occurrences Jesus did ascend to the Father. This was the fulfillment of the Old Testament illustration of the wavesheaf that was brought to the Lord before the harvest. Jesus had to ascend to present the value of his atoning death before the Father in fulfillment of Leviticus 16 (cf. Hebrews 9). Thus, the announcement of a completed atonement is also a part of the resurrection day's significance.

3. On the first day of the week Jesus appeared to the disciples for the first time while they were in the upper room and there bestowed peace upon them. Peace is one of the three results of justification that are listed by the apostle Paul in the fifth chapter of Romans. He speaks of peace, access to God, and rejoicing. All these Christ gave to the disciples. They had not been at peace. They were not aware of God's presence. They certainly were not rejoicing, for we are told that they were gathered together in secret for fear of the Jews. Jesus changed each one of these states of mind by his presence.

4. On the first day of the week Jesus Christ first broke bread with the disciples. This happened twice, once in the presence of the two disciples, whom he had overtaken on the road to Emmaus, and once in the upper room with all the disciples at the end of the first Lord's Day. These were the first postresurrection observances of the communion service.

5. On the first day of the week Jesus opened the understanding of his disciples so that they might understand all that the Scriptures had taught concerning him.

We read in that magnificent twenty-fourth chapter of Luke that on that first resurrection day, when the Lord met the Emmaus disciples who were on the way home, he began to "open the scriptures." Later, when they were eating together and he began to break bread, they understood who he was. Finally, in the upper room Jesus "opened their minds so they could understand the Scriptures." He told them, "This is what is written: 'The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, and repentance and forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem'" (Luke 24:45-47). We follow Christ's lead when we read and interpret the Scripture on Sunday.

6. On the first day of the week Jesus commissioned the disciples to the task of world evangelism. He said in John 20:21, "As the Father sends me, I am sending you." We read in Luke 24:48 that he said, "You are witnesses of these things." We are commissioned to go into this world with the gospel, even as Jesus was commissioned.

7. On the first day of the week Jesus breathed on the disciples, imparting the Holy Spirit to them (John 20:22).

8. On the first day of the week, seven weeks after the resurrection, the Holy Spirit descended from heaven at Pentecost and began his ministry for the entire age of the Christian church. Today we look to the Spirit for the imparting of spiritual gifts and skills and for the work of correction, reproof, and conversion as he works through the preaching and teaching of the Bible.

9. On the first day of the week the Holy Spirit directed Paul to gather the believers together and preach to them. The account is found in Acts 20 and concerns a period of Paul's life when Paul was pursuing missionary work at Troas. It is an interesting chapter. In the sixth verse of the chapter we are told that Paul spent seven days in the city; that is, he was there for each of the seven days of the week, including a seventh day and a first day (this is, a Saturday and a Sunday). There was obviously an opportunity to choose between either of the two days, but we are told, "On the first day of the week we came together to break bread. Paul spoke to the people" (v. 7). This is another indication of the normal pattern of the early Christian observance.

10. The first day of the week was established by Paul as the day on which the Corinthian believers were to "set aside in keeping with [their] income" (1 Cor. 16:2). In other words, it was the day on which offerings were to be taken and dedicated to the Lord's work.

11. Finally, on the first day of the week the Lord Jesus Christ appeared to the apostle John on the island of Patmos and gave him that great revelation of himself in all his present heavenly glory. The same... revelation also outlined his plans for the future, for the church age and for that which will follow his coming again.

A Present Pattern

These eleven important events, all of which occurred on the Lord's Day rather than on the Jewish sabbath, show us the importance of the day of the resurrection for the church in this age. Not only do they show us the importance of this day and indicate that this is the proper day for Christian worship, but they also give us our pattern for the present Christian celebration. Everything that we do in church on this day is based on these eleven great events. These are: the gathering of ourselves together, the reading and interpretation of the Scriptures, the preaching and teaching of the Word of God, the collecting of offerings, the observance of communion, and above all the remembrance and worship of the One who died for us and rose again. We do not do these things by accident or by whim. This is God's pattern. We follow it out of thanksgiving for what God has done for us through the Lord Jesus Christ, our Savior.

Finally, we observe the Lord's Day as God's great weekly reminder that we are not under law in our relationship to the Lord. We are under grace. When a Christian falls from grace, what happens to the Christian? He does not lose his salvation. That is not what the phrase means. To fall from grace is to fall into law. To fall from grace is to fall into bondage to man-made regulations.

Let us live in the full sunshine of God's grace, which is our right as members of God's new creation. We have been called by grace. We have been redeemed by grace. We are justified by grace. We are sanctified by grace. God operates constantly by grace. He is our gracious God.

Chapter 62.
How to Celebrate Sunday

John 5:9-16

How should a Christian celebrate Sunday? This is the question to which the three preceding studies on the sabbath and the Lord's Day have been heading and for which we have now laid sufficient groundwork. How should a Christian celebrate Sunday? The simplest answer to that question is indicated in the very name that is given to it in the Bible. It is the Lord's Day. Hence, it is to be lived in whatever manner will most honor and glorify the Lord Jesus Christ.

One commentator has written, "The conscious effort to promote God's honor is more important than the forms by which we try to do so. Some will use one method, some another; but in either case it is the Godward intention that matters. And whatever means we adopt, the test of our genuineness will be the measure in which gratitude and praise are the distinguishing marks of our lives.... We may not all confess our faith in the same terms, or worship according to the same rites, or govern ourselves according to the same discipline; we may not find it easy to cooperate in common tasks: but age after age men who could not agree in other things have united to praise God with a single voice. Our hymnbooks are still the greatest manuals of Christian unity."

It does not follow from this, however, that all forms of worship or all attitudes toward the Lord's Day are equally valid or even equally useful in promoting God's honor. Consequently, it is worthwhile asking in a slightly more specific way: Just how can a Christian best and properly celebrate the Lord's Day? The answers to this question obviously must be far from any form of rules or legalism and must clearly recognize that in any individual case the Christian is ultimately answerable to God alone for how he or she celebrates it.

Only for Christians

First, however, we must make it clear that the day of the resurrection, no matter how it is celebrated, is for believers only. As the sabbath under the law belonged to the nation Israel and not to any other of the gentile nations, so, in the same way, the new day of the resurrection belongs in grace only to those who are regenerated by the Holy Spirit. We must not force those who are not yet Christians to observe it.

I am aware as I say this that this principle cuts across an attitude that has long prevailed in English-speaking countries and that many will wish to defend it. But I want to say as kindly as I can that in my opinion the desire of many Christians to force non-Christians to keep Sunday is misdirected and in some cases quite harmful. From my own selfish point of view I am quite glad that there are Sunday "bluelaws" in some parts of America. In fact, when I see the harm that is done in some areas of Philadelphia as the result of the liquor traffic, I could wish that the bars were closed permanently and that the money wasted in drinking was used for the family involved or in the education of young children. Still, this does not have anything to do with the Christian Sunday, and any attempt to force non-Christians to observe it in a Christian way is unbiblical and harmful.

Why? Lewis Sperry Chafer, whom I have quoted frequently in these studies, provides the explanation in these words: "The unsaved sustain no relation to the Lord's Day, since that day belongs only to the new creation, and therefore the pressing of the observance of a religious day upon the individual who is unsaved, is misleading in the extreme; for it tends to the utter confusion of the gospel of grace. God is not calling on the unsaved to keep a day to which they could in no way be related. The issue between God and the sinner is the one issue which the new gospel of grace has raised and imposed. It is a question as to whether he will believe on the Lord Jesus Christ unto forgiveness and eternal life. The person who observes a day while rejecting Christ as Savior, is no nearer salvation or acceptance with God than he would be otherwise. That supposed merit, gained by keeping a day, may be the one thing that hinders him from discovering Christ as the Savior for a meritless sinner. Men are not saved by any works whatsoever, and any teaching which misdirects them at this point is 'another gospel' and subject to the anathema of God (Gal. 1:8)."

None of us would think of forcing baptism or communion upon a person who has not trusted in the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation. In the same way, the celebration of the first day of the week is given to help a person remember the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ from the dead, and the only person who can keep that day in a way acceptable to God is the person who believes that Jesus died for his sin and that he has been raised from the death of his old self into newness of life through Christ Jesus.

Joy

How then should a Christian observe Sunday? Or, more correctly, how should a Christian celebrate Sunday? The first answer comes in one form from that famous first question of the Westminister Shorter Catechism. The question asks: "What is the chief end of man?" The answer given to it by the Old Scotch Covenanters was this: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever." Joy is to be the first characteristic of the Lord's Day.

Like everything else associated with the Lord's Day this too has a foundation in the events of that first resurrection Sunday. In Matthew's Gospel, in its account of Christ's resurrection appearances, the first word on the lips of the risen Lord as he greeted the women who were returning from the tomb was, "Greetings" (28:9). The word is chairo, which literally means "Rejoice!" Jesus told the women to be glad. They were to be happy. This was the day that the Lord had made and they were to rejoice and be glad in it.

If this is so—and it is—then let us be done with the long faces and solemn demeanors that so often characterize the people of God on the Lord's Day. And let us be done also with the type of worshiper who comes to church only to go home. Do not come if you do not enjoy the preaching of the Word and the response of the congregation in word and in song. In the early days of the church the apostles did not have to go around ringing doorbells to get people to come out to the service. They did not have to maintain everymember visitation plans to renew flagging interest in the worship. In fact, the opposite was true. We read in the second chapter of Acts that at this period at least all the Christians "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship, the breaking of bread and to prayer. ... Every day they continued to meet together in the temple courts. They broke bread in their homes and ate together with glad and sincere hearts, praising God and enjoying the favor of all the people. And the Lord added to their number daily those who were being saved" (Act 2:42, 46-47).

These were happy Christians. Other people liked to be with them, perhaps most of all because they were happy. Friendships developed. Then, on the basis of these friendships, the Lord moved and added to the church daily such as should be saved.

Have you ever thought that your attendance at church on Sunday and your conduct while there are important in the conversion of non-Christians? Look at it like this. Imagine a man—or woman—who is alone in the city and who drops by your church some morning or evening. He has a problem and it seems that there is no one to help him. Suppose he goes in out of desperation and finds only a handful of miserable people who mumble the hymns and then begin to look at their watches as the minister preaches. What will he think? He will think that there is nothing to interest him there. There is no life, no answer to problems. He will conclude, rightly, that those who are present are present only out of a sense of duty or routine. On the other hand, if he enters to find the church packed with people who obviously enjoy the worship, who sing as well as they can and take notes on the sermon, he will conclude that even if he may not understand what it is all about, still there is something to it. He begins to pay attention. And God uses his heightened awareness to lead him to the conviction of sin and conversion. This has happened many times, and there are people in my own church today for whom this is a testimony.

May I suggest that you are not really celebrating Sunday at all if you do not enjoy it.

Activity

The second important characteristic of the Lord's Day should be activity. Think of the first Lord's Day. It was clearly a day of activity: the women on the way to the tomb, the appearances of Jesus, the return to Jerusalem of the Emmaus disciples, the sharing of experiences, communion, the Lord's commission. It is possible, if you have been working hard for the other six days of the week, that Sunday might have to have the characteristic of a "day of rest" for you. But this is not an integral part of the Lord's Day. The sabbath was the day of rest. If you need to rest, try resting on Saturday. The Lord's Day should rightly be a day of activity.

Note what Chafer says: "The Lord's Day is not a day for selfish entertainment or amusement. It is not a day for idleness and rest. Its privileges should be, and will be, preserved by all who delight to do His will. It becomes an opportunity for many who are held by secular work during the days of the week, to offer the fullest service of prayer, worship, and testimony which belongs to their Lord. The instructed Christian no longer labors to be accepted of God, which was the obligation under the law; but he, being accepted in grace, labors to glorify his Lord who saves him. He has ceased from his own works, and though ceaselessly active, is working in the power and energy of the Spirit."

This does not mean, of course, that any old activity will reflect the fullest significance of the day. You may mow your grass, if you wish. You are not under law. But this does not have very much to do with Christ, nor does it help to express your joy in his resurrection. Other types of activity are significant.

The first is worship. I know it may strike some persons as strange to speak of worship as an activity; for many people conceive of worship in a passive sense, that is, sitting in a pew and letting the words of the day run through one's head like water. But this is a travesty of real worship. Jesus Christ said that real worship is done "in spirit and in truth" (John 4:24). Truth involves content. Thus, worship is above all else an active, rational activity. It must engage the mind.

Why do we have Scripture readings in the speech of the people instead of in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin? Why are the words of the music in common speech? Why does a sermon stand at the heart of each service? The answer is, to engage our minds.

"We must therefore beware of all forms of emotional, aesthetic or ecstatic worship in which the mind is not fully engaged, and especially of those which even claim that they are superior forms of worship," writes John R. W. Stott. "The only worship pleasing to God is heart-worship, and heart-worship is rational worship. It is the worship of a rational God who has made us rational beings and given us a rational revelation so that we may worship him rationally, even 'with all our mind.'"

The second highly significant activity that ought to characterize the Lord's Day is our witness. Jesus Christ revealed this characteristic of the day when he instructed the women, "Go to my brothers," and later informed the disciples that they were to carry the good news of his life, death, and resurrection into all the world. Do you do that on Sunday? You can do it on any day, of course. It is of the essence of our day that anything done on Sunday can also be done (and should be done) on other days also. But do you at least bear a witness on Sunday? This is a day to invite your friends to go with you to hear God's Word proclaimed. At the least it is a day on which you should teach your children what you know about Christ.

Expectation

I have already said a good bit about the proper Christian celebration of the Lord's Day. It is for Christians only. It is to be characterized by joy. It is to be filled with activity. There is one thing more: it also should be characterized by a great spiritual expectation.

I love Sunday. And one of the reasons why I love Sunday is that I never know in advance what will happen. As I leave my house on the way to the church I never know precisely whom I will meet or what will take place. I do not know who will be present or who will respond to the preaching. I never plan messages to preach at problems that I imagine to be present in the congregation, and yet it is often the case that what I say is used of the Lord to speak precisely to some problem. Lives are changed. What is more, not infrequently that day is the turning point in someone's entire spiritual experience.

Do you go to the company of God's people with such expectation? If you do, it will increase your joy and cause you to work even harder. You will thrill to God's grace. And you will know in a personal way the burden of these words that summarize most of our Sunday activity: "So whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31); "be prepared in season and out of season; correct, rebuke and encourage—with great patience and careful instruction" (2 Tim. 4:2); "pray continually" (1 Thess. 5:17); "be joyful always" (1 Thess. 5:16); "stand firm. Let nothing move you. Always give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord, because you know that your labor in the Lord is not in vain" (1 Cor. 15:58).

Chapter 63.
Is God Silent?

John 5:17-23

In our study of John's Gospel, we come to the first of a series of discourses by Jesus, recorded in John 5:17-47. It is rightly first, for it deals with that problem in religious thought that is itself rightly first in theological thinking. How can a person know God? And, supposing that it is possible to know him, how can the things said about God by those who claim to possess such knowledge be verified?

A Contemporary Question

These are very important questions, particularly in the intellectual climate of the twentieth century. In our century many thinkers are saying that the questions of how one can know God and how that which is said about him can be verified have no answer.

Some maintain that there is no answer because God himself never speaks to answer them. This is the position of a man like Ingmar Bergman, the filmmaker, for instance. Sometime ago I heard this story about him told by Os Guinness, a brilliant young intellectual formerly associated with the work of L'Abri Fellowship in Switzerland. According to Guinness, Bergman had been listening to some music by Stravinsky and while listening to it had a vision. He imagined that he was in a great nineteenth-century cathedral. He was wandering around and came to a portrait of Christ. Suddenly Bergman realized the importance of this painting. So he went up to it and shouted, "Speak to me! I will not leave this cathedral until you speak to me!" There was no answer, of course. Christ said nothing. So the film that Bergman produced that same year, in which a number of characters despair of ever finding God, is called The Silence.

The silence of God is a problem, however, even for committed Christians. Take the example of suffering. The world is filled with suffering, but generally God does not seem to hear men's cries in suffering or alleviate their anguish. Thus, one writer who addresses the problem from a Christian perspective writes questioningly, "Earnest and thoughtful men face these realities, and have ears to hear that cry; and their indignant wonder finds utterance at times in some such words as those of the old Hebrew prophet and bard, 'Doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High?'"

The other way in which our contemporaries argue that the questions about knowing God have no answers is in the view that religious language is mere symbolism. It is "God Talk," as they say in many of our seminaries today. It is meaningless. This attitude differs from the first one in that, while the first says that God is present or may be present but is silent, the second attitude affirms that even the idea of God is meaningless. God is not there, and so religious terms have no rational value.

We can illustrate what this means by the ways in which a little phrase such as "God bless you" is used by non-Christians. On the lips of a Christian the sentence has meaning. It is a prayer that the God who created the world and the individual and who died to redeem him in Christ will keep and enrich his life. But what meaning can the phrase possibly have on the lips of a non-Christian newscaster, for instance, a man who merely ends his program with the quip, "Well, good night, everybody. See you tomorrow night at 6:00 p.m., and God bless"? In this form the phrase does not have rational content. It is used only for its emotional or psychological value. In other words, it is used only because it creates a good feeling in the listener. Many are claiming that this is all that is accomplished by any religious talk. It has manipulative value, but there is no real meaning to it.

Another way of expressing this same thought is in the words of Edward Gibbon, author of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Gibbon wrote of the first Christian century that all the religions of the world were regarded by the common people as "equally true," by the philosophers as "equally false," and by the magistrates as "equally useful." In this system, a system that, incidentally, seems to be reproduced in our day, all truth is relative and religious statements in particular are meaningless.

Against these views Christianity holds a unique position. Christians believe that God has spoken, that he has spoken clearly, and that what he has said is true. This is the point of Christ's first discourse in John's Gospel. It has two main parts. In the first part (vv. 17-30) Jesus teaches that a man can know God because God the Father is revealed in God the Son. In the second part of the discourse (vv. 31-47) Jesus gives evidence for this claim, pointing out that his testimony is substantiated by a series of other God-given witnesses. We want to begin to look at the opening part of the discourse in this study.

Father and Son

The first statement that Jesus makes is that he is one with the Father in all the Father's actions. He says it negatively and then positively. First, "I tell you the truth, the Son can do nothing by himself; he can only do what he sees his Father doing" then, "because whatever the Father does the Son also does" (v. 19). This is a claim to divinity, to identity with God. It is an assertion that everything God the Father does, Jesus does; and everything Jesus does is also done by the Father. The conclusion of the matter is that Jesus is God.

But there is more to the statement than this. For when Jesus began his discourse with the claim "My Father is always at his work to this very day, and I, too, am working," he was not only suggesting that the Father was working with him in all the actions performed during his earthly life, he was also saying that the Father had been working with him and he with the Father in all their actions previously. In other words, Jesus was turning the minds of his Jewish listeners back to God's work from the beginning of creation, and he was claiming to have been a part of that work also.

This is an important point in our understanding of who Jesus is, for it is not just enough to think of him in the particular time period in which he lived on this earth. In one of my earlier writings I told a story that illustrates what we need to do if we are to understand him properly. In the summer of 1962, a friend and I made a trip around the Mediterranean Sea that eventually brought us to Luxor, in upper Egypt. We were there to see several of the ruins, particularly the great temple of Luxor, built more than 3,000 years ago by Amenophis III. There are great columns in this temple, all about a dozen feet in diameter and reaching sixty to eighty feet into the sky. Our attention was attracted to one column near the edge of the excavations on the top of which there was a small house. We asked our guide how it got there. The old man answered that before the excavations had reached this area, there was a farmer living on the outskirts of the modern city of Luxor who had been looking for a solid foundation on which to build his house. He scratched about in the sand and eventually came upon what he believed was bedrock. He built his house there. In time, as the wind began to blow around the sides of the house and push the sand away, which it does in the desert, the farmer found that he had built his house not upon bedrock, as he had supposed, but upon a piece of hand-hewn rock. Later he realized that the rock was part of a column, and still later he discovered that it was a standing column. By this time the excavations had reached his area, the ground was taken away, and eventually his house was left standing on the top of the column where we saw it.

This is an illustration of some people's misunderstanding of the Lord Jesus Christ. They will acknowledge that he was a great man and will even claim that their lives are built upon him to some degree. To them he is a great teacher. This is true, of course. But although it is true, by itself this view is as misleading as the view of the Egyptian farmer who thought that he was building his house on bedrock. To have a true understanding of Jesus Christ a person must push aside the thousands of years of human history and catch a picture of him existing with God the Father and working with God the Father from eternity.

Obedience

The second point that Jesus makes concerning his relationship to the Father is that his identity with the Father also involves obedience. It is a matter of the will, which means that the mind of the Father and the mind of the Son are united. We must not think that when Jesus claimed to be able to do nothing, except what he saw the Father doing, he was saying that he was something like a robot, a zombi, who carried out the directives of the Father without thinking. This is not at all what he was saying. Christ is a person. He has a personality, including an intellect and feelings. He faced temptations, real temptations. There were discouragements. Nevertheless, in nothing did he ever disobey his Father. He obeyed him, and he obeyed willingly.

This is what he wants you to do, in one sense, or rather what he enables you to do when he saves you. The trouble with us is that we are the opposite of Jesus Christ at this point. We are not interested in obeying God. We are interested in doing our own thing. We want to run our own lives. We want to be "god" to ourselves. Jesus was not like that, for everything he did he did out of love for God and out of obedience to him.

Christ's third claim was that he was one with the Father in love. Jesus had said that everything he did he did in unity with the Father. He showed that this unity of action was based on obedience. But then, as a third claim, he also went on to show that this was a unity based on love: "For the Father loves the Son and shows him all he does" (v. 20).

Is it not wonderful to know that at the heart of God's nature there is love? How do we know that the nature of God is love? I know that the Bible teaches this. It says so explicitly in 1 John 4:8, 16. But how do we know, apart from the Bible? The answer is: We know that God is love only because of the nature and actions of the Lord Jesus Christ who is both God and love. Someone will point to the beauty of creation. But if you do that, you are only proving that God is a God of order. The creation reveals nothing about love. If you argue that some of the things God has created are useful to men and, therefore, reveal God's concern for them, I will point out that other parts of creation are not useful and are even destructive. Love has to do with a personality. It is a characteristic of persons. So how do we know that God has a personality and that his personality is characterized by love? Only through Christ. Jesus Christ loved us and gave himself for us.

Life and Judgment

Finally, there are two more statements that Jesus makes regarding his relationship to the Father. He says in verse 20, "For the Father loves the Son and shows him all he does. Yes, to your amazement he will show him even greater things than these." The "greater things" are those that are described in the next verses. They are, first, that the Son gives life to whom he pleases and, second, that the Son will be the judge of men on the Father's behalf. He states the first claim by saying, "For just as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, even so the Son gives life to whom he is pleased to give it" (v. 21).

This was an appeal to the Old Testament that any knowledgeable Jew would have recognized.

The Old Testament taught that only God could give life or raise the dead to new life. In Deuteronomy 32:39 God says, "I myself am He! There is no god beside me. I put to death and I bring to life." First Samuel 2:6 says, "The LORD brings death and makes alive; he brings down to the grave and raises up." When the Syrian general Naaman came to the king of Israel seeking a cure for his leprosy because he had heard that Elijah could cure him, the king of Israel thought that Naaman was seeking cause for a quarrel and replied in despair, "Am I God? Can I kill and bring back to life?" (2 Kings 5:7). Throughout the Old Testament it is the same. The giving of life—whether life in physical birth, spiritual life, or the life of the resurrection—is God's prerogative. Consequently, when Jesus claimed to be able to give life he was also clearly claiming to be God.

The same thing is true about judgment. Every Jew knew that one day God would unleash his final judgment. Deuteronomy 1:17 declares that "judgment belongs to God." This too was God's prerogative. So when Jesus claimed to be the One who would actually carry out the judgment of the Father, he was claiming (no less certainly than in his other statements) that he was God.

Put together, these statements set forth Christ's claim that Jesus is God and acts with God from the beginning of all things to the end, from creation to the final judgment, from eternity to eternity.

The Way

The final verse in this section tells us that God the Father has committed judgment to Jesus so "that all may honor the Son just as they honor the Father" (v. 23). How do we honor the Son? Above all by acknowledging that he is who he says he is and submitting to him and to his teaching. John R. W. Stott has written on this point, "If Jesus who thus taught with authority was the Son of God made flesh, we must bow to his authority and accept his teaching. We must allow our opinions to be moulded by his opinions, our views to be conditioned by his views. And this includes his uncomfortable and unfashionable teaching."

This also includes Jesus' teaching about salvation. Sometime after the events recorded in John 5,
Jesus said that he was going to the cross in order to give his life "a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). He said toward the end of his life, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6). Are these things true? They are if Jesus is who he said he is. If he is God, they have to be true. He is the way, the only way, to the Father. Do you believe it? Do you honor him in his teaching about salvation?

Finally, do you honor him in his teaching about the Christian life? He taught you how to live. The Bible is full of his teaching. Do you attempt to follow it? It is not only your duty if you are a Christian; it is the only sensible course for any man or woman.

Chapter 64.
Possessing Eternity in Time

John 5:24-27

If we are to judge by television shows today—which, incidentally, is not a bad way of judging what is on most people's minds most of the time—then certainly many people are concerned about life. One of the most popular programs ever to appear on television is This Is Your Life. One of the great afternoon moneymakers is Love of Life. Even the commercials get into the act when they argue, "You've got a lot to live," and then offer something to help you live it better.

A concern with life and its qualities is basic to men. Unfortunately, the promises being offered in our day for an abundance of life are inadequate, and even the best of these solutions fades into insignificance when compared to the great offer of life that is presented to us by the Lord Jesus Christ.

Apparently matters were not so different in the past either, for men and women were just as concerned with life then as now. This state of affairs undoubtedly led John, the author of the fourth Gospel, to speak of life and of Jesus as the source of life many times. For instance, in the opening verses of the letter he wrote, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men" (1:4). In the third chapter he records the conversation with Nicodemus about the new birth. This is a discussion of life. In speaking to the Samaritan woman Jesus offers "living water." The theme occurs again and again in each of the great discourses. Finally, in the first of the two conclusions to John's Gospel, occurring in chapter 20, the author of the Gospel writes, "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (vv. 30-31). According to this last verse, the desire to see all men enter into the life of God was one of John's main purposes in writing. It is also one aspect—and from one point of view even the major aspect—of Christ's coming to earth to save men.

This theme is discussed at some length in the verses that are now before us, verses 24-29 from the fifth chapter of John. In discussing life these verses take us through the entire scope of the believer's experience with the Lord. First, in verse 24, Jesus is quoted as saying that God gives life initially; that is, God acts first in placing spiritual life within the individual whom he is drawing to himself. Second, verses 25 and 26 say that in this present time, after we have become Christians, God gives abundance of life through Christ Jesus. Third, verses 28 and 29 speak of a special manifestation of that life in the resurrection of our bodies. These verses deal with a divine life that God gives freely, and they teach that it is possible to live that life now.

The Gift of Life

The first point of these verses, then, is that the possession of divine life begins with God's action rather than man's. In other words, life is not a reward for believing. It is the other way around. Life comes first; a person believes afterward. He believes because God has first placed his life within him. The verse says, "I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life" (v. 24).

I must admit, of course, that many preachers have taken this verse in the other sense. They have taught that the phrases represent a temporal sequence so that a person must first hear and believe, then, as a result of his believing, come into the possession of life. This is not right. In the first place, no sequence is involved at all. In John's vocabulary "hearing" is the same thing as "believing." It means to hear with the heart. The point of these two phrases is that hearing the words of Christ and believing God are identical. This is even the main point of the discourse.

Second, the tense of the verb "have" is present rather than future. If the possession of eternal life were the result of believing, then the verse should have a future verb. It should say, "Whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me will have eternal life." Actually, the present tense of the verb is used to indicate that the one who believes does so because he already has the life of God within him.

A chapter later Jesus expresses precisely the same teaching negatively when he says, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (6:44).

The third and conclusive reason for taking John 5:24 in the sense I have been indicating is that this is the teaching of the Word of God as a whole. Take the case of Abraham, as an example. What did God do when he called Abraham? Did he look down from heaven and say, "Let's see now, perhaps I can find a man who has a little bit of goodness in him, perhaps a little bit of faith. Can I find something to work with? Ah, yes, there's a person who has something. Abraham! He has faith. I'll start with him." Not at all! The Word of God tells us that Abraham was no different from the rest of his contemporaries (Josh. 24:2). They were devil worshipers. So it was an act of pure grace when God called one man out of the rest. Not one of the people then living in Ur of the Chaldees knew anything about the true God. But God came to Abraham in such a blaze of glory, as Stephen relates (Acts 7:2), that Abraham immediately obeyed the divine call. God always comes first, and when he comes to a person, that person follows.

Abraham's Descendants

Unfortunately, while it is true that many persons will admit this in the case of others, there will always be some who will seek an exception for themselves. This was true in Jesus' day, as in ours. In Jesus' day the argument went like this. "Granted," his opponents would say, "that Abraham was called when he was a devil worshiper and had nothing in himself to commend him to God! Granted that truth. But how does it follow from this that the same is true for those of us who are Abraham's descendants? Certainly our descent counts for something." When this objection was raised, Jesus answered it by pointing out that God is concerned with spiritual rather than physical descent. Thus, while it is true that those who argued this way may have been descendants of Abraham physically, it was just as obvious that they had not descended from him spiritually, for all of Abraham's spiritual children would believe in Jesus. He concluded, "If God were your Father, you would love me, for I came from God and now am here.... You belong to your father, the devil" (8:42, 44). Where does spiritual descent come from? The only answer is that it comes directly from God.

We see this in the case of Abraham's immediate descendants. The Jews were claiming to have a special position with God because they were descended from Abraham, but they had overlooked the fact that Abraham had given life to more than one son. Isaac was the child of promise. But before Isaac there had been Ishmael. What about him? Clearly God had chosen Isaac, thereby demonstrating that he is the sole source of life and that he does not choose to impart that life to everyone.

There might have been some—there undoubtedly were in Paul's day—who would have argued that God made his choice on the basis of the worthiness or unworthiness of the mother. They would have pointed out with great glee that although both Isaac and Ishmael were sons of Abraham, only Isaac was Abraham's son by Sarah. The other—they would have said it with contempt—was the son of the Egyptian slave girl Hagar.

Is that the reason for God's choice? We have only to pass down to the next generation to see the answer, for when God makes his next choice he makes it between two brothers, born of the same Jewish mother. And, lest anyone try to introduce the question of age as a factor, he sees to it that the two boys are twins. Moreover, just to make sure that no one can argue that the choice was made on the basis of the moral character of the sons, God announces his choice when they are still in the womb; in other words, before either Esau or Jacob had a chance to do anything that was good or evil.

Once again the choice lay entirely in the heart of God. God gives blessing to whom he chooses. He gives life to whom he chooses. There is just no possible human way of accounting for his ways.

Here is the way Paul presents the argument in Romans 9:

It is not as though God's word had failed. For not all who are descended from Israel are Israel. Nor because they are his descendants are they all Abraham's children. On the contrary, "It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned." In other words, it is not the natural children who are God's children, but it is the children of the promise who are regarded as Abraham's offspring. For this was how the promise was stated: "At the appointed time I will return, and Sarah will have a son."

Not only that, but Rebekah's children had one and the same father, our father Isaac. Yet, before the twins were born or had done anything good or bad—in order that God's purpose in election might stand: not by works but by him who calls—she was told, "The older will serve the younger." Just as it is written: "Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated."

verses 6-13

Moreover, this is the way God always works. When did God call Moses? The answer is, when Moses was merely a baby floating in a basket on the waters of the Nile. When did God choose John the Baptist to have faith in himself and eventually to be the forerunner of the Messiah? The answer is, before he was born, as was announced both to his mother Elizabeth and to Mary, the mother of the Lord. When did Christ call most of his disciples? When they had first come seeking him? No, rather when they were fishermen practicing their trade. That is the way he calls you. God calls through different means, of course. It is often through preaching. Sometimes it is through the life or witness of a Christian friend. Sometimes he uses a radio program or a book. But whatever the means, the point is that God calls first. What is more, he places the new spiritual life within the individual so that, being awakened to the call of eternity, the one who is the object of that call can hear him and respond, believing.

Life Abundant

We must not think, of course, that this initial call of God is the whole story. There is also the present life of the believer and the life of the resurrection, which is future. Jesus goes on to speak of these two further aspects of life in the verse following the one we have been studying.

Verses 25 and 26 declare, "I tell you the truth, a time is coming and has now come when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God and those who hear will live. For as the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son to have life in himself." Here the reference to the "dead" is to those who are spiritually dead, as in the verse that goes before. But the verb that introduces the word "life" is future, rather than present. This means that in this verse Jesus has in view the increasingly abundant present life of the one who believes in him. The order is this. First, God plants his life within the one whom he desires to become his child. Second, because of the new life within, the child now hears the Word of God and believes. Third, the child increasingly enters into the experience of that life by believing. So Jesus is saying, "The one whom I have called is to live now in an abundant way."

Is your life abundant? It is possible to be a Christian and miss the abundant life; many do. Still, it is your privilege to enter into it increasingly as you permit Jesus to change your life daily.

Resurrection Life

Finally, in verses that we are going to return to more extensively in our next study, Jesus also speaks of future life, referring to the resurrection. He has spoken of the initial gift of life, in which a person becomes a believer.

He has spoken of life in the present. Now he turns to the future. "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation" (vv. 28-29). According to these verses, the life that is given in the mo- ment of spiritual regeneration will have its true end only in the total entrance into life through the resurrection.

What is the life that we who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ possess? It is the life of God himself. Peter tells us that we may "participate in the divine nature"

(2 Peter 1:4). Therefore, that life is as eternal and indestructible as God himself. It will go on forever; and it will not be an eternally wretched and debased existence, as our lives would be if we were left to ourselves, but rather the continually entering into that life that possesses all the qualities of God.

Some have imagined that this life is not everlasting. Some have imagined that it is not eternal. But if that can be so, then words have no meaning and the Word of God is meaningless. If eternal life can be lost, it is not eternal. If it can be taken from us, it is not eternal. If we can renounce it so that it no longer belongs to us, it is not eternal. Is God changeable? Certainly not! Then his gifts cannot be withdrawn. The Bible says, "God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (Rom. 11:29). If God had given us ten years' life, then that life could not be lost before the end of the ten years. If he had given us one thousand years' life, then that life could not be lost before the end of the one thousand years. In the same way, if he has given us eternal life, then that life is eternal life. We can be certain that it will lead straight on to the moment of our own physical resurrection... and beyond.

Chapter 65.
A Matter of Life or Death

John 5:28-30

Do you know the difference between "temporary" and "permanent"? Temporary refers to something that can be changed; permanent refers to something that cannot be changed. This is important for understanding our present subject. For the subject is God's judgment, and the central point is that God's judgment will establish a permanent distinction between men, some entering into the fullness of life and some into what the Bible calls death or damnation.

The day of God's judgment is spoken of in many places in the Bible. For instance, to the Romans Paul wrote of "the day when God will judge men's secrets through Jesus Christ, as my gospel declares" (Rom. 2:16). He preached to the Greeks in Athens, saying that the times of their ignorance God had formerly overlooked "but now he commands all people everywhere to repent. For he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice" (Acts 17:30-31). The Book of Revelation describes this judgment in the twentieth chapter. Jesus also spoke of this judgment, saying, "Do not be amazed at this, for a time is coming when all who are in their graves will hear his voice [he meant his own] and come out—those who have done good will rise to live, and those who have done evil will rise to be condemned. By myself I can do nothing; I judge only as I hear, and my judgment is just, for I seek not to please myself but him who sent me" (John 5:2830).

These verses present three doctrines. First, death is not the end of existence. Second, there are two forms of existence beyond the grave, one good and one terrible. Third, the particular kind of existence to be entered into depends upon the individual's relationship to the Lord Jesus Christ. The obvious conclusion is that each person ought to examine himself in regard to this relationship.

More Beyond

The first point of Christ's teaching is that physical death is not the end of existence. It was not the end, either for himself or for others. Quite clearly he expected to die. He once said that he was going to give his life as a ransom for many. He told his disciples that he was going up to Jerusalem where he would be arrested, beaten, and then killed because of the hatred of the religious leaders toward him. All this happened. Yet Jesus also spoke of the fact that he would rise again after three days and return to the disciples.

We see from this text that Jesus expected others, both good and evil persons, to live on. Life is not the proper word to describe it, of course. Existence is a better term. Nevertheless, whatever term we use, it is obvious that according to Jesus the grave is not the end for anyone.

In this he was at one with Old Testament teaching. It often is said that ideas of the afterlife are not fully developed in the Old Testament, and this is true to a degree. Still, the great assumption of the Old Testament is that life does continue beyond the grave. For instance, it lies behind the descriptions of the death of the patriarchs that tell us that they were gathered in death to those who had gone before. Abraham is said to have "breathed his last and died at a good old age, an old man and full of years; and he was gathered to his people" (Gen. 25:8). We are told that Isaac "died and was gathered to his people" (Gen. 35:29). Jacob nourished the same expectation when he was told of the apparent death of his favorite son, Joseph. We read that "he refused to be comforted. 'No,' he said, 'in mourning will I go down to the grave to my son'" (Gen. 37:35).

The King James Version uses the word "sheol" in this last verse as another indication of the Old Testament faith in a life to come. "Sheol" has been translated as "hell" or "death" as well as the "grave" in other versions of the Old Testament. But we should never exclude the fact that in the Old Testament Sheol is a place name. It is the name of the place to which the dead go, much as "hades" or "limbo" designated the abode of the dead for the Greeks. On the one hand, those who die in faith go there. This is proved by Jacob's statement. On the other hand, it also is the destination of adulterers, sinners, and the heathen (Num. 16:33; Prov. 7:27; Isa. 14:9-15).

The existence of Sheol is a great testimony to the fact of life after death, and Jesus in his turn endorsed it. One commentator has written, "While opinions may well differ on the interpretation of what the Old Testament tells about the nature of life in Sheol, there can be no disputing its insistence on the fact of life in Sheol. Life here on earth is not the complete span for man; beyond it there is another and different existence which he cannot avoid, for 'what man is he that shall live and not see death, that shall deliver his soul from the power of Sheol?'"

It is possible that in the years before Christ's coming, devout men and women might have disputed whether these things were actually so. But whatever the case then, there can be no doubt of the truth that there is life beyond the grave now. Why can there be no doubt? There can be no doubt because of Christ's resurrection. Before 1492 Spanish coins often showed the Straits of Gibraltar with the Latin inscription neplus ultra. It meant "no more beyond." So far as men knew, the western end of the Mediterranean Sea, marked by the Straits of Gibraltar, was the end of land. In that year, however, Columbus discovered the coast of America across the great sea. When he returned from his voyages the coins that had been in circulation were reissued, but now they bore the inscription plus ultra, "more beyond." This became the motto of the Spanish crown. In the same way, the Lord Jesus Christ once passed through the straits of death and returned, bringing abundant evidence that the Old Testament hope was well grounded.

Two Destinies

Likewise, we must note that Jesus did not merely reinforce what the Old Testament characters believed. He went on to show that beyond the grave there was to be a resurrection, that there would be a resurrection unto life for believers and a resurrection unto condemnation for unbelievers, and finally that these resurrections would forever establish the different destinies for these two groups.

It is true, of course, that in a few instances there may have been partial anticipation of this hope in the Old Testament also. Job was testifying of this faith when he said, "I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth. And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God" (Job 19:25-26). David was certainly expressing this hope when he declared, "But God will redeem my life from the grave; he will surely take me to himself (Ps. 49:15). Still it is true that the full doctrine regarding a resurrection of the just to life and a resurrection of the wicked to punishment came in its fullness only through Christ's teaching. In fact, our text (from the early public ministry of Jesus) may be the earliest complete statement of this truth in history.

It is a glorious statement, at least for believers. Why? Because it refers to the consummation of our great salvation.

Perhaps I can best explain what this means by pointing out that when God determines to save a man he determines to save all of him. When man was created he was created a trinity, possessing a body, soul, and spirit. Man sinned; when he sinned each part of his being came under the curse of sin and God's wrath. God had said to Adam in regard to the tree of knowledge, "When you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). When man sinned he died. His spirit died immediately— which he demonstrated by hiding from God. His soul began to die. His body died eventually and returned to the ground. Now, what happens when God saves a man? When God saves a man he replaces each part of man's being with a new part and, what is more, he does so in the order in which they were lost. First, he gives the person a new spirit. This is the life of God within him. During this life God begins to form a new soul as the individual is transformed after the image of Christ. This soul is called the "new man," which is placed in the individual by God and which exists there alongside the old man that is destined to perish. Finally, God creates a new body that will be united to the soul and spirit at the resurrection.

It is this uniting of our new souls and spirits with our new body for which we long. Now we have our old bodies. In death they will be gone, and our souls and spirits (which are the Lord's) will go to be with Jesus. When he returns we will receive our new bodies, and our salvation will be complete. Those who believe in Jesus wait expectantly for that day.

Damnation

On the other hand, in all honesty we must point out that, according to these same words, Jesus spoke of a resurrection not only unto life, as I have just described it, but also unto condemnation. At this point the King James Version reads "damnation," but the word is the same one that occurs in John 3:18: "He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already" (KJV). It means that he is condemned to an eternity without God. God is the source of all good. Consequently, this existence is bad and is therefore properly described as being filled with terrors, woes, misery, wailing, and deep cries.

Let this thought grip your mind. God has appointed a day in which all men and women who have ever lived will be brought before him and judged. Death is not the end. Therefore you and I— whoever we may be—must stand before him. Will your judgment be "unto life" because of your relationship to Jesus Christ? Or will your judgment be "unto condemnation"? Will the judgment unite you to God or be the means of your separation from him forever?

Mercy or God's Justice?

If you are asking yourself this question and are concerned about the answer, I now have the privilege of showing you that you can know the answer and can know it beyond any questioning. It all depends upon your relationship to Jesus Christ. If you come to the point of standing before God just as you are—without ever having benefited from Christ's death on your behalf or from his offer of righteousness and new life—then God will have no alternative but to banish you from his sight. You are sinful, no matter how good you may seem in your own eyes, and God cannot condone sin. What is more, you will find yourself the object of his fierce wrath. You are his creature. He has made you. Yet, you have rejected his way and spurned his Son, who came to earth and suffered to save people from their sin.

On the other hand, if you will come as one who has believed on the Lord Jesus Christ and in what he has done for you, then God promises to receive you as he receives Jesus. In fact, since Jesus is himself the Judge, it is Jesus who will receive you; and he will take you into heaven as one whose sin has already been punished and who now stands, not in his own soiled character but in that new life of the body, soul, and spirit that is given by God. How then can he fail to receive you? How can he reject you when you come not as the old creation, ruined by sin, but as his new creation made perfect in the life of the Savior?

It has always been my experience that those who have not yet believed in Christ react in one of two ways at the thought of God's judgment. Some simply refuse to believe it. They think quite wrongly, I believe, that judgment is inconsistent with God's character. "God is love," they argue; "how can a loving God condemn anyone?" The answer to this view is that God's love is not inconsistent with his judgment and that, whatever we may think about the matter, the Bible quite obviously speaks of these two themes as compatible.

The other objection is more dangerous. These persons believe that it is somehow ignoble of themselves to receive salvation through Christ. To receive salvation in this way is to depend on God's mercy or grace, and they would far rather deal with God's justice. "I don't want mercy from God," they will say. "All I want is a fair shake. I just want justice."

I pity the person who wants nothing from God but justice. The justice of God? The justice of God will send a person to hell; the justice of God will never save him. Justice condemns! It is only the grace of God in Jesus Christ that pardons and makes alive.

The result of seeking nothing from God but justice is illustrated vividly by an incident from the life of the patriarch Abraham. Abraham had separated from his nephew Lot and had gone to live in the hill country of Palestine, while Lot had gone to live in the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. The sin of the cities called for judgment, and God came to Abraham to tell him that he was about to destroy them. Immediately Abraham began to think of his nephew. He, too, would be destroyed if God acted as he had said. So Abraham began to reason with God. "If you destroy Sodom and Gomorrah as they are," he argued, "You will end up destroying the righteous along with the wicked. Suppose there are fifty righteous persons in the city? Won't you preserve the city for the sake of the fifty righteous? Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "I will not destroy Sodom if fifty righteous persons can be found there," said God.

At this point Abraham began to worry that there might, in fact, not be fifty righteous people in Sodom. He could think only of four himself—Lot, Lot's wife, and Lot's two daughters. Besides, Lot might not have been very much of an evangelist. So Abraham continued, "Suppose five of those fifty persons are lacking. Will you destroy the city for the lack of the five?" "No," said God. "I will not destroy it if forty-five righteous persons are found there."

"Suppose there are only forty," said Abraham. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" God said that he would not destroy it for forty.

"Suppose there are thirty?"

"No, not for thirty."

"Twenty?"

"No, not for twenty." Finally Abraham reduced the number of righteous persons required for the salvation of the city to ten, and God promised not to destroy the city for ten. But even then Abraham had not reduced the number far enough. So, after God had removed the reluctant Lot, his wife, and his daughters from the city, judgment fell and the cities of the Dead Sea plain were eradicated.

That is what happens when the Judge of all the earth does right. Men are condemned by God's rightness. God's justice sends sinners to hell. Do you want justice? How foolish! On the other hand, how wonderful that the one who has been given new life in Christ need never confront that justice but instead will enter by the portal of physical death and resurrection into the fullness of life eternal! Do you trust the Lord Jesus Christ for your salvation? You must decide. The decisions of this life affect the issues of eternity.

Chapter 66.
The Witnesses to Christ

John 5:31-47

The fifth chapter of John is concerned almost entirely with the question of how an individual can know God. In the language of theology this is the question of epistemology, and it has two parts.

The first part deals with means. By what means can we know God? What is the channel by which God reveals himself? The second part deals with verification. Once we are aware of the channel by which we can know God, by what means can the channel itself be verified? In other words, how can we know that this means of knowing God can be trusted?

Fortunately, both parts of this question are discussed in John 5. We have looked at the first part already. The chapter has now brought us to the second part. In the first part of the speech recorded here, Jesus has declared himself to be equal with God and, consequently, the only one through whom God can be known. He has claimed to be the giver of life as well as the one who is entrusted with the final judgment. Put in the terms I have just used, this means that Jesus is himself the channel by which we can know God and that this is true because he is God. At this point one might naturally raise the second part of the question. "You say that Jesus is God. Well, then, upon what evidence is such a claim grounded?" In the context of Christ's speech itself one might ask, "Why should Christ's hearers, the Jews, believe such testimony? Why should they consider Jesus reliable?"

In answer to these questions and in deference to the procedure of Jewish law, which required two or three witnesses for the establishment of any fact, Jesus now cites three independent testimonies that reinforce and corroborate his own. They are the testimony of John the Baptist, the witness of Jesus' miracles, and the witness of the Old Testament Scriptures. These supportive witnesses are important for us simply because they are still valid. They require belief in Christ's claims.

The Father's Testimony

Before we begin to look at the witness of John the Baptist, the miracles, and the Scriptures in detail, we need to see something about their nature and therefore why Jesus appeals to them.

The central point is simply that when Jesus appeals to these supplementary witnesses to his claims, he does not appeal just to facts or circumstances, even less to what just might happen to be the opinion of some person concerning himself. He actually appeals to the witness of the Father that is made on his behalf. In other words, just as Jesus is content to seek the will of God in all his acts and sayings (vv. 19-20), so is he content to let God bear witness to his claims. This is why the testimonies of John the Baptist, Jesus' miracles, and the Old Testament Scriptures are important.

We can see this principle clearly by imagining that a person has come to see us at our home with the news that our boss has given us a big promotion to that of a vice president in the firm. It is good news, of course, but it is meaningless unless the messenger has really come from the boss. If we call the firm and find that they have never heard of this person, then we can dismiss the visit as some strange practical joke. However, if the messenger really was sent by the boss, then we know that his offer is genuine. In the same way, the question of whether the supplementary witnesses to Jesus are really from God or not is important.

This is the point of the verses that begin this section of Christ's teaching. These verses say, "If I testify about myself, my testimony is not valid [that is, my witness does not meet the requirements of the law regarding the two or three witnesses]. There is another who testifies in my favor, and I know that his testimony about me is valid" (vv. 31-32).

Who is the "other" witness? Some scholars have thought that this person is John the Baptist, primarily because a discussion of his witness follows immediately. This is possible, of course. Yet everything in the context points to a different conclusion. In the first place, the witness of this verse is described in the present tense—"There is another who testifies in my favor"—while the witness of John the Baptist is described as being past. Second, the full form of the expression —"testimony about me"—has the effect of setting the first testimony aside for special notice, while in this passage John's testimony is actually placed on a lesser footing. Third, the first two verses seem to be introductory. For these reasons, it seems wise to view the "other witness" as God the Father and to find the witness of the Father expressed in the testimony of John, in the miracles, and in Scripture.

The witness of the Father is referred to explicitly in the citation of each one (vv. 36-38).

The point of this is simply that the value of such testimony is to be traced precisely to the fact that it is the testimony of God. In other words, God the Father has not only sent God the Son, through whom he may be known. He has, in addition and at the same time, provided other supplemental witnesses so that people may both know that he has spoken in Christ and have no excuse for neglecting to put their trust in him.

John the Baptist

The first of the supplemental witnesses cited by Jesus in John 5 is John the Baptist. We have already looked at John in some detail in previous studies, particularly in relation to his character as a witness. John was a great witness. He is a pattern for our own witness. Yet he is brought forward here not simply because he is a witness (in the same way that Christians today might be witnesses) but because he is a particular type of witness, a prophet.

It might be assumed from John's rejection of any claim to be identified with the Messiah, with Elijah, or with "the prophet" mentioned in John 1:20-21 that John the Baptist was also rejecting the prophetic role itself. But this is unwarranted. It is true that John refused to claim that he was "the prophet" of Deuteronomy 18:15, but this is not the same thing as rejecting a prophetic function entirely. In these denials John was denying any importance of his own. However, it is precisely in pointing away from himself and to Christ that he emerges most strongly in the prophetic role.

We should note in the first place that as a priest and a Nazarite John was the perfect figure of the prophet. He was a priest by descent from Zacharias, his father; and he was a Nazarite by choice, as Samson, Samuel, and many others had been before him (cf. Luke 1:15). It is against the background of a common recognition of John as a prophet that one can understand the questions of the delegation that came to him from Jerusalem.

The prophetic nature of John's mission is indicated also by the statement that John did not speak on his own accord but rather as one who had been sent by God. This statement is repeated twice in the fourth Gospel. It is found first in the prologue, where we are told, "There was a man who was sent from God; his name was John" (1:6). Later it is found on the lips of John himself in the statement, "I am not the Christ but am sent ahead of him" (3:28). This latter statement has its origins in the Old Testament in the words of Malachi: "See, I will send my messenger, who will prepare the way before me" (Mal. 3:1; cf. Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2; and Luke 7:27).

A third indication of John's prophetic role is found in Jesus' reference to John as a "lamp that burned and gave light" (v. 35). This lamp is not a light that shines in its own right (like the sun) but a lamp that has been kindled from a source outside itself, a "kindled light." John is not the light. Only Jesus is the light. Nevertheless, John is important because he has been kindled by that light. Having been set on fire by God, he bears witness to Jesus.

What should we make of John the Baptist? He lived long ago. He was just one man. Still, Jesus says that John lived to verify his claim to be God, that this was his message. Was John right? Is Jesus God? In answering this question Jesus himself asks you to reckon with John's testimony.

Miracles

The second supplemental witness appealed to by Jesus is that of his signs or miracles. He calls them his "work." He says, "I have a testimony weightier than that of John. For the very work that the Father has given me to finish, and which I am doing testifies that the Father has sent me" (v. 36).

What is this work? How are we to think of it as a witness to Jesus Christ? The best answer to these questions, which we will see in greater detail in the next study, is found in the term that John most characteristically uses in speaking of Christ's miracles. He calls them "signs." A sign is a symbol, a pointer to something signified. It is apparent that a miracle may be a sign by pointing to the presence of God or to a prophetic figure who has been authorized by God. The miracles do this in the case of Jesus.

The miracles reveal God. God is seen in the miracles. Thus, the miracles of healing show that Jesus is the Lord and giver of life. The multiplication of the loaves shows that he is the sustainer of life. The healing of the blind man shows that he grants physical and spiritual sight. The list can be extended. Jesus refers to the evidential value of the miracles when he cries, "Do not believe me unless I do what my Father does. But if I do it, even though you do not believe me, believe the miracles, that you may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (10:37-38).

The Scriptures

The third supplemental witness that Jesus appealed to in support of his claims is the witness of the Old Testament Scriptures. This is the most important of the three. For of the three witnesses (the witness of John the Baptist, the signs, and the Scriptures), it is the evidence of the Scriptures upon which Jesus most fully dwells and in connection with which he most clearly links the witness of the Father. This witness is not referred to in passing, as is the witness of the signs. Nor is it overshadowed by others, as is the case with the witness of John the Baptist. Instead, Jesus concentrates upon this testimony, so much that the verses that deal with it (vv. 37-47) emerge as one of the most significant summaries of the importance of Scripture in the Gospel.

Jesus declares, "The Father who sent me has himself testified concerning me. You have never heard his voice nor seen his form, nor does his word dwell in you, for you do not believe the one he sent. You diligently study the Scriptures because you think that by them you possess eternal life. These are the Scriptures that testify about me, yet you refuse to come to me to have life.... But do not think I will accuse you before the Father. Your accuser is Moses, on whom your hopes are set. If you believed Moses, you would believe me, for he wrote about me. But since you do not believe what he wrote, how are you going to believe what I say?" (vv. 37-40, 45-47).

In this teaching Jesus claims that the Old Testament Scriptures are from God and are fulfilled in him, that the unbelieving Jews have perverted the Old Testament and misunderstood it (just as many do today), and that the Old Testament itself will accuse those who refuse to believe in it.

God's Signpost

We are going to come back to this subject in a subsequent study, but before we do we need to see one important point of Christ's teaching that bears directly upon the subject we are considering. What is the primary purpose of Scripture? Is it to record the history of God's dealings with men? It does record such history, but that is not its primary function. Is it to reveal certain truths to men? Does the word "truth" seem to make this the right answer? Although it does reveal truths, this is not its primary function either. The primary purpose of Scripture is to point men and women to Christ. It is true that it uses a variety of means to do this. History is one of them; the communication of truth, particularly about God's nature and about man's sin, is another. But the primary purpose is to point men to Christ.

Have the Scriptures done that for you? Have you given them a chance? I can tell you on the authority of the Word of God that there will be no real knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ without them. And without him there will be no real knowledge of the Father.

The Scriptures, too, are a signpost. Suppose, as John Stott suggests in one of his books, that you and your family are determined to go on a picnic. You pick your spot and start driving toward it.

At last you come to a sign that contains the name of the picnic grounds. What do you do now? Do you immediately stop the car and get out and have your picnic around the signpost? Of course not! You follow the sign to the grounds themselves and have your picnic there. In the same way, God gave the Scriptures so that you and I, sinners that we are, might come to Christ in whom we have a true knowledge of the Father.

A Demanding Revelation

The divine testimony to the person of Jesus Christ is centered upon three great supplementary witnesses: the witness of John the Baptist, the witness of the signs, and the witness of the Scriptures. The Baptist's witness is that of a prophet and thus of the prophetic word. The witness of the signs is that of the acted word. The final and most important witness is that of the Scriptures, which are the written word. All three witnesses involve the direct and supernatural activity of God and hence may be described as aspects of the Father's own testimony to the person and teaching of the Son.

But where does that leave us? Can we look at these witnesses to Jesus Christ and then simply disregard them, as though they had nothing to say to us personally? Or will we listen to them and heed them as that evidence of God's testimony in history that has permanent validity? Clearly, if the witnesses are what Jesus declares them to be, then they must be heeded and we must commit our lives to Jesus. What will you say to God in that day when you stand before him? Will you say, "I did not know about Jesus"? What nonsense! Will you say, "I did know about him, but I was not convinced by the evidence"? How shallow! Have you ever examined it? Is it not better to say, "I have examined the witnesses and have believed all that they have told me about him; therefore, I come to you not on my own merits but on the merits of Christ, my Savior"?

Chapter 67.

Why Miracles?

John 5:36

In all my life I have never met anyone who has seen a ghost. But in the opening chapters of his book on Miracles, C. S. Lewis speaks of the one person whom he had met who had. "The interesting thing about the story," he writes, "is that that person disbelieved in the immortal soul before she saw the ghost and still disbelieves after seeing it. She says that what she saw must have been an illusion or a trick of the nerves." According to Lewis—and I believe him—the person may be right. For since a miracle must always be presented to our senses in order for us to become aware of it—either to our sight, sound, hearing, or feeling—and since our senses are not infallible, anything that appears to be miraculous may well be only an illusion. In life seeing is clearly not believing. It is rather the other way around.

Here, of course, we come to our first difficulty in our study of the fifth chapter of John. For here Jesus appeals to miracles in defense of his extraordinary claims. He says, "I have a testimony weightier than that of John. For the very work that the Father has given me to finish, and which I am doing, testifies that the Father has sent me" (5:36). But is this appeal valid? We are right to ask: How do Christ's works bear witness to him? And besides, if the evidence of miracles is valid (as we have some reason to believe), what are we to say about Christ and his appeal to them?

The problem becomes even more acute and complex when we remember the story which Jesus told concerning the rich man and Lazarus. The rich man wanted God to send Lazarus back from the grave so that his brothers might repent. But Abraham, who spoke on this occasion, replied, "If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead" (Luke 16:31). Apparently Jesus taught that even so great a miracle as a resurrection would not persuade the unrighteous. Moreover, if we want proof that this is so, we need only to turn to the story of that other Lazarus who was raised by Jesus but who thereby provoked not faith but hatred from the Jewish leaders. We are told that the leaders actually consulted how they might kill Lazarus because of the influence that his resurrection was having on the masses.

The question is clearly: What place does an appeal to miracles have in Christianity? Or, to put it another way, why and in what sense did Jesus himself appeal to them?

Christ's Signs

The best answer to these questions begins with the term "signs" or "signs and wonders." These words occur throughout the New Testament and mean "miracles." But the word "sign" does not always mean "miracle," and even in the cases where it refers to a miracle it always means more. Originally the word "sign" (semeia in Greek) meant "a distinguishing mark" or "token." Thus, in the Old Testament, circumcision is called a sign or token of the covenant that God made with Israel (Gen. 17:11). Paul repeats the same usage of the word in Romans 4:11. In the same way, the finding of the baby in the manger becomes a sign to the shepherds who were seeking the infant Jesus (Luke 2:12), and the "sign of Jonah" becomes a token of Christ's death and resurrection for the Jews (Luke 11:29-30). A sign is a symbol. It is a pointer to something signified. It is obvious that a miracle may become a sign by pointing to the unusual ability or character of the one performing it.

But what do the miracles point to in John? The answer is that they point to Christ's glory, which is only another way of saying that they reveal his divine worth or character. This is clear in the case of the changing of water into wine at Cana of Galilee, for John concludes that account by telling us that this was the beginning of miracles (the word is actually "signs") in which Jesus "revealed his glory" and on the basis of which "his disciples believed on him" (2:11). In every instance the sign draws attention to Jesus himself and in particular to his divine nature revealed in his works. Jesus taught this by saying, "The... work which I am doing testifies that the Father has sent me."

Incidentally—and we need to see this aspect of Christ's teaching too—the works that Christians do also bear witness to Jesus. Pink, one of the great commentators on John, has written, "If our works are 'dead works,' wood, hay, and stubble which shall be burned up in the coming day, that proves we are carnal, walking after the flesh; and such a witness will dishonor and grieve Him whose name we bear. But if we abound in 'good works,' this will show that we are walking after the spirit, and men (our fellow-believers) seeing our good works will glorify our Father which is in heaven."

The signs are also more than mere symbols. In some cases—above all in the miracles recorded by John—they actually contain Christ, are a part of him, just as his words are a part of himself. This means that they are actually part of the revelation.

Moreover, Christ's words and works belong together. This is made clear in two important texts. First, in John 15:22-24 Jesus speaks of his words and works together, showing that they are one in regard to their source and their effects. We can see the point best if the verses are printed as follows:

> If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin.
>
> > Now, however, they have no excuse for their sin. He who hates me hates my Father as well.
>
> If I had not done among them what no one else did, They would not be guilty of sin.

But now they have seen these miracles, and yet they have hated both me and my Father.

The second text is John 14:10, in which "words" and "works" appear as interchangeable concepts: "The words I say to you are not just my own. Rather, it is the Father, living in me, who is doing his work."

The Major Signs

Christ's works are signs, not just his miracles, and so are his words. Everything he does is done to reveal God. In the nature of the case, however, some of the things that Jesus says and some of the things he does are more significant than others, with the result that John is compelled to choose from the many works at his disposal those that are most helpful for the church and that are most central to a true understanding of Christ's person. This, incidentally, is the true meaning of the concluding verses of chapter 20, which say, "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (vv. 30-31).

What are the signs that John chooses? Among the many that reveal Christ's nature and character, John pays particular attention to the following:

1. The transformation of the water into wine (2:1-11). John tells us that this was the first of Christ's signs, and he uses it naturally to pass from the witness of John the Baptist, which occupies most of the first chapter of the Gospel, to the section of the Gospel that deals with the signs (chs. 2-11). The motive for this miracle cannot really be found in Christ's compassion for human suffering or in the conquest of evil, as is most often the case with the miracles recorded for us by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. The motive is solely that the "glory" of Christ might be revealed and that the disciples might believe as a result of that revelation.

What did this sign reveal? For one thing, it revealed Christ's unity with God the Father in creative power. This is an illustration of John 1:3 that says that "through him all things were made." For another, it shows Jesus to be the bringer of Christian joy. John's point is that Jesus alone makes life joyous and abundant.

2. The healing of the nobleman's son (4:46-54). We have already studied this sign, which John calls the second of Christ's miracles.

It is a sign of healing, and thus shows the power of the Lord Jesus Christ to overcome sin and heal illness.

Even more significant than this is the fact that it also shows Jesus' ability to calm a troubled spirit and instill faith. We remember that the nobleman who came to Jesus did not have a strong faith originally. He was fearful, anxious, afraid that his son would die. Jesus led him to stronger faith, so much so that when the man left Jesus he actually went on calmly about his business and did not check on his son's condition until the next day.

3. The healing of the disabled man (5:1-18). John calls this the third sign, and it follows in his narrative closely upon the healing of the nobleman's son. What is the point of this miracle? Certainly it was not to provoke faith on the part of those who witnessed it. John tells us that it actually made the Jews angry, for they tried to persecute Jesus and kill him. It did not even provoke faith on the part of the man who was healed. For nothing is said about his faith at all, and his greatest loyalty seems to have been to the Jewish leaders rather than Christ even after his healing. Then what was the purpose? The point of the miracle is that we are like the disabled man spiritually. We have sinned, and spiritual inability to seek Christ has come from our sin. We cannot rise to meet him. We cannot even believe on him. Nevertheless, it is when we are disabled spiritually—blind, lame, and paralyzed—that Jesus comes to us to save us and to free us from sin's bondage. The miracle reveals God to be a God of great grace.

4. The feeding of the five thousand (6:1-14). This miracle is the first of three miracles whose significance is explained by Christ himself, in two cases by means of a long interlocking discourse. In this story, Jesus feeds five thousand people by means of a few small loaves and fish. The point is not just that Jesus is able to multiple bread. The point is that he can satisfy the hunger of the soul. Jesus says, "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" (6:35).

Have you found that Jesus is able to satisfy your hunger, that He is able to quench your thirst? He can. I do not care what your need may be. You may have a thirst for companionship. Do you feel that no one understands you, that no one cares? Jesus cares. You may feel unloved. Do you have a hunger for love? Do you feel that no one loves you, that no one ever will, perhaps even that you are unlovely? Jesus loves you. He proved that by dying in your place. Do you have a thirst for direction and meaning in your life? Jesus has a plan for your life, designed before the foundation of this universe. The person who has found Jesus to be the perfect provider for these needs has already been convinced by the miracle.

5. The walking upon the water (6:16-21). John does not call attention to this miracle, and it is possible that it is included mostly because it was attached historically to the previous miracle of the multiplication of the loaves. It is in each of the other Gospels. The point of the miracle, if John intends it to make a point, is that Jesus obviously possesses power over the laws of nature.

6. The healing of the man born blind (9:1-41). This healing is actually a double miracle, involving the restoration of both physical and spiritual sight to one who had been born both physically and spiritually blind. The two parts of the miracle presuppose and reinforce each other. What is the point? Jesus tell us when he describes himself as the "light of the world." In the same story the faith of the man who had been born blind but who had come to both physical and spiritual sight is contrasted with the unbelief of the authorities who, although confronted with the true spiritual light, prefer to live in darkness.

7. The raising of Lazarus from the dead (11:1-46). In the last of the public signs Christ's progressive display of power over nature, sin, and sickness comes to a climax in the total victory of life over death. In this case the discourse is mingled with the narrative, but the key statement is outstanding: "I am the resurrection and the life" (v. 25). The miracle shows that Jesus is the source of eternal life, that it may be enjoyed here and now, and that the same power that assures it now will also, after the death of the body, raise the dead to a new and better existence beyond. It is significant that the Gospel specifically points to the raising of Lazarus as a sign (12:18), for this supreme manifestation of the glory of Jesus leads, not only to belief on the part of many from among the people but also to the most extreme and virulent hatred on the part of the authorities.

Taste and See

We come, then, to a summation of our answer to the question, What is the purpose of the miracles? The answer, on the negative side, is simply that the supernatural in itself does not prove the divine origin of the one performing it. Presumably even the devils can do miraculous things. The value of the miracles consists in their nature; that is, in what they reveal about God the Father and the Lord Jesus. This is the answer on its positive side. The miracles of Christ, as indeed all his works, both miraculous and nonmiraculous alike, show us his nature. They disclose his ability to fill the vacuum of the heart.

Let me state it in slightly different language. In John the signs are not occasioned by faith. They are occasions for faith. They are given to provoke faith and strengthen it.

Have they done that for you? If the miracles are true, then there has never been and doubtless will never be a person like this amazing Nazarene. Is this not provoking? Does it not demand that you investigate him personally to see whether the things written about him and claimed by him are valid? If you will not do this, then you demonstrate by your actions that the difficulties you have with belief are not rational. It is not as though God has not provided enough evidence for a thinking person to evaluate Christ's claims. Your difficulties are moral. The problem is sin. On the other hand, if you will investigate Christ's worth and character, you will find him to be what countless others have also found him to be—the Son of God and your Savior.

Chapter 68.
The Witness of the Scriptures

John 5:37-38

The fifth chapter of John's Gospel contains the evidences that the Lord Jesus Christ gives for his claims—the witness of John the Baptist, the witness of Christ's miracles, and the witness of the Scriptures. The first two have already been discussed. The third is discussed in the verses beginning with verse 37 and continuing to the end of the chapter.

To understand the importance of these verses, one needs to recognize that they come at the end of Christ's discourse and therefore are in a position of prominence. To give an illustration, they stand at the end of this discourse much the way a star witness might be introduced at the end of a trial to nail down the case for the prosecution. Suppose a man is on trial for murder and the evidence for his conviction is being presented by the district attorney. The first witness comes forward and demonstrates that the accused had an opportunity to commit the crime. He was present in the area of the crime at the time it was committed. The second witness shows that he had a motive for committing the crime. He would have profited by the victim's death.

The third witness proves that the accused had access to the murder weapon. Finally, the fourth witness was an eye witness of the murder itself and can identify the murderer.

This is an illustration, in part, of the way in which the Lord Jesus Christ built up the witnesses for his claims as they are recorded in this chapter. The witness of John was a real witness. It was the witness of a prophet. God spoke through John, and the leaders of Christ's day even acknowledged the importance of John's witness by appointing a delegation to visit John and question him. Still, in one sense, John's was but the witness of a man and only one man at that. It could be discounted. The witness of Christ's miracles follows. This is more important, for the miracles were evidence of God the Father working in Christ. The miracles revealed Christ's nature. Taken with the witness of the Baptist, they are quite important. Yet both fade into relative unimportance in light of the final witness, which is the witness of the Word of God.

So Jesus Christ begins to speak about the witness of the Bible to himself, stressing two points. The first is the divine origin of the Scriptures. The second is their primary purpose, which is to point to him. He is speaking of the first of these when he says, "And the Father who sent me has himself testified concerning me. You have never heard his voice nor seen his form, nor does his word dwell in you, for you do not believe the one he sent" (vv. 37-38).

Age of Decline

It is unfortunate that we need to stress the divine origin of the Scriptures as much as we do in our day. But it is necessary due to the fact that this truth is so widely contested, not only by scholars (from whom, of course, most of the doubts originate) but also by many regular church members. Doubt as to the divine origin of the Scriptures is so widespread in some quarters that many have even come to think that the situation is normal.

Actually nothing could be farther from the truth. The low view of the Bible that prevails in our day is a fairly recent development in light of the broad flow of church history. It goes back no more than two hundred years. A student of church history knows that up to the time of the Reformation (in some ways even for two hundred years beyond that) almost no one within the church doubted that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are uniquely the Word of God. Even heretics accepted this principle. Thus, all who claimed to be Christians recognized that the Bible is a divine authority binding upon all men and that it contains objective truths that transcend human understanding.

Unfortunately, in the post-Reformation period the orthodox view of Scripture came under increasingly devastating attacks. Already weakened by centuries of appealing to the Fathers rather than to the Scripture in defense of a point of doctrine and in violent reaction to the Protestant Reformation, the Roman Catholic church in 1546 took the step of officially placing the tradition of the church alongside Scripture as an equally valid form and source of Christian doctrine. The full significance of this decision was no doubt overlooked at the time of the Council of Trent, but it was monumental. The act had tragic consequences for the Church of Rome as the continuing development of debilitating doctrines, such as Mariology and the veneration of the saints, indicates.

The Protestant church, as the result of its heritage and its sharp polemic against Catholicism, held on longer—for two hundred years. But then in the eighteenth century and particularly in the nineteenth century a critical appraisal of the Scriptures, backed by a naturalistic rationalism, succeeded in dislodging the Bible from the place it had previously held. For the church of the age of rationalism the Bible became man's word about God rather than God's word to man. And when people rejected the unique, divine character of the Bible, they rejected its authority also.

The Catholic church weakened the orthodox view of the Bible by exalting human traditions to the stature of Scripture. The Protestant Church weakened the orthodox view of Scripture by lowering the Bible to the level of traditions. The differences are great, but the results are similar. In both cases the unique character of the Scripture has been lost, its divine authority forfeited, and the function of the Bible as the reforming voice of God within the church forgotten for the majority of people.

Fortunately, neither position is tenable, and the confusion that haunts today's religious scene easily demonstrates this fact. The Protestant church is finding that without a valid basis for religious authority, theology withers and the church becomes increasingly powerless to preach the gospel. Thus, in an amazing milestone address to delegates to the Consultation on Church Union, meeting in Denver in the fall of 1971, Peter L. Berger of Rutgers University called for a return to "authority in the Christian community" and bemoaned its loss. And in a most fascinating book published the following year, Dean M. Kelley, Director for Civil and Religious Liberty for the National Council of Churches, documented the inevitable decline of churches that lose a high degree of commitment and the corresponding growth of those who do not.

The Roman community, on its part, is discovering that although two sources of authority are better than none, Scripture and tradition often conflict and the deep human preference for traditions rather than Scripture inevitably shifts the balance of authority away from the written Word of God. Many Catholics, including Monsignor George G. Higgins, a top executive of the U.S. Catholic Conference and author, are beginning to deplore preaching that omits the gospel and bypasses biblical authority. Says another executive, "The church is trying to pick up the ways of the world instead of preaching Christ crucified." In such a time there is a challenge for those who still adhere to the view of Scripture that the Lord Jesus Christ taught and who boldly exalt the Word as the final revelation of the Father and the final arbiter of human thought and conduct.

God's Word

We recognize, of course, even as we refer to the divine origin of the Scriptures, that in one sense all the biblical books have been written by men. That is, men did the actual writing. At the same time we also affirm that there is a great difference between the Bible and any other book that has ever been written by any man or woman. Men wrote, but God stood behind the writing. Men used their own vocabulary and literary style, but God nevertheless guided them in the choice of the words and guaranteed the outcome.

This point—which would have been heartily endorsed by the Lord Jesus Christ himself—is stated in a memorable way by Peter. Peter wrote, "No prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (2 Peter 1:21 RSV). In this verse the Greek word translated "moved" is the word used by Luke in the second chapter of Acts to compare the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost to "the blowing of a violent wind" (Acts 2:2). Again, in the twenty-seventh chapter it is used to describe the force of the wind upon the ship that was carrying Paul to Rome. Luke notes that the ship was carried along by the wind. He says, "The ship was caught by the storm and could not head into the wind; so we gave way to it and were driven along" (v. 15). Again, "they... let the ship be driven along" (v. 17). Clearly, Luke wished to say that the ship was at the mercy of the storm. It did not cease to be a ship, but it did cease to have control over its course and destination.

In the same way, we are told through Peter that the writers of the Bible were borne along in their writing to produce the words that God intended to be recorded. They wrote as men, but as men moved by the Holy Spirit. The result was the revelation of God.

Someone might object at this point that if men had anything at all to do with the writing of the Bible, the results must at some point or other be filled with error. But this does not follow. An analogy can help. The analogy is one between the conception and birth of the Lord Jesus and the coming of our Bible. What happened when the Lord Jesus Christ was conceived in the womb of the virgin Mary? We read that the Holy Spirit overshadowed her so that the child that was born of her was called "the Son of God" (Luke 1:35). In this conception there was a touching of the divine and the human, and the result was also in its turn both human and divine. Christ was a real man. He was a particular man, a Jew, who had a certain measurable weight and a recognizable appearance. You could have taken a picture of him. Yet he was also God almighty and without sin.

In the same way, just as the Holy Spirit came upon the virgin Mary so that she conceived the human Son of God in her womb, so also did the Holy Spirit come upon the brain cells of Moses, David, the prophets, the evangelists, Paul, and the other biblical writers, so that they brought forth from their minds those books that constitute our Bible. All their writings bear the marks of human personality. They differ in style. At the same time, the ultimate source is divine, and the touch of the human did not stamp them with weakness or error any more than the womb of Mary imparted sin to the Savior.

Archaeological Evidence

We are going to go on from this point to see how this remarkable book with its divine authorship bears witness to Jesus Christ, how it can be misused, and why it will eventually condemn those who reject it. But before we do we need to answer the objections of someone who may have heard stories of how scholarship has supposedly disproved the reliability of the Bible and who are therefore inclined on those grounds to reject all that has been said about the divine origin of the Scriptures. Has scholarship demonstrated that the books of the Bible are fallible and therefore merely written by men after all? Is the Bible disproved?

There was a time not long ago when claims such as these were made by many influential spokesmen, and were made openly. In past years almost every biblical theologian and scholar spoke of so-called "certain results" or "assured findings" that were imagined to have laid the orthodox conception of the Bible to rest forever. Today, however, as anyone who had the opportunity to delve deeply into such questions knows, these phrases no longer occur with such frequency. In fact, they hardly occur at all. Why? Simply because, as the result of the continuing march of biblical and archaeological investigations, many of these so-called "assured results" have simply blown up in the faces of those who propounded them.

Here is an example. In 2 Kings 15:29 there is a reference to a king of Assyria named Tiglathpileser. He is spoken of as having conquered the Israelites of the northern kingdom and as having taken many of them into captivity. A generation ago scholars were saying—their books are still in our libraries—that this king never existed and that the account of the fall of Israel to Assyria is something akin to mythology. Now however, archaeologists have excavated Tiglath-pileser's capital city and can give his whole history. They have even found his name pressed into bricks that read: "I Tiglath-pileser, king of the west lands, king of the earth, whose kingdom extends to the great sea...." The English reader can find accounts of his battles with Israel in James B. Pritchard's Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament.

About the same time that some scholars were denying the existence of Tiglath-pileser, others were denying that Moses could have written the first five books of the Bible on the ground, which seemed irrefutable enough, that writing had not been invented in his day. Since that time, however, archaeologists have unearthed tablets and inscriptions that were written several hundreds of years before Moses and, ironically enough, in the very Sinai peninsula where Moses led the people of Israel for forty years.

In even more recent days, many scholars have denied that the historical books of the New Testament were written close enough to the events they purport to relate to be reliable. The synoptic Gospels in particular were dated late; and John, which seemed to have the greatest degree of Greek flavoring, was pushed back well into the second Christian century—and by some scholars into the third. In time, however, a piece of papyrus was uncovered in Egypt, on the basis of which it was necessary to date John no later than A.D. 125 and presumably much before that time. In other words, the results of scholarship in our day increasingly validate the biblical claims.

They do not prove infallibility—nothing can do that—but they do lead in the direction of reliability and reveal nothing that is not compatible with the highest view of the Scriptures.

Waiting on the Rock

The Christian need never fear to stand upon the Word of God, recognizing its full authority, as the Lord Jesus Christ did. At times there will be critical theories that run against it. The arguments may seem unanswerable, so much so that the one who tries to stand against them may well be dismissed as an obscurantist. The wise of this world will say, "You can believe that if you want to, but the results of scientific criticism teach us better." These things have happened before and will happen again. But the Christian who will stand upon Scripture will find even within his lifetime that, as the so-called "assured results" begin to crumble about the scholars, the view of the Bible held by the Lord Jesus Christ, the historical view of the church, will prevail.

Many years ago a former leader of the Church of England, Bishop Ryle of Liverpool, wrote wisely, "Give me the plenary, verbal theory of biblical inspiration with all its difficulties, rather than the doubt. I accept the difficulties and humbly wait for their solution. But while I wait, I am standing on the rock."

Chapter 69.
The Purpose of the Scriptures

John 5:39

It is not unusual in our day for men and women to have a low view of the Bible. Many persons, including professors of theology and ministers, feel that the Bible is man's word about God rather than God's word about man and so devalue it. Therefore, it is necessary to speak as Christ did, stressing the divine origin of the Bible and pointing out its supernatural characteristics. At the same time, possessing a low view of Scripture is not the only error embraced by people today. Many misunderstand it. They do not know what it says or why it is written. As a result of this it is necessary also to speak of its purpose, which is, above all else, to reveal Christ Jesus.

What is the purpose of Scripture? According to Jesus Christ the purpose of the Scripture is to point to him and reveal him. Thus, in the verses we are studying, he said, "You search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life; and it is they that bear witness to me" (5:39 RSV).

Have you seen this truth? Martin Luther is one who saw it clearly. In a sermon on this text preached only months before his death he argued, "Here Christ would indicate the principal reason why the Scripture was given by God. Men are to study and search in it and to learn that He, He, Mary's Son, is the one who is able to give eternal life to all who come to Him and believe on Him. Therefore he who would correctly and profitably read Scripture should see to it that he finds Christ in it; then he finds life eternal without fail. On the other hand, if I do not so study and understand Moses and the prophets as to find that Christ came from Heaven for the sake of my salvation, became man, suffered, died, was buried, rose, and ascended to Heaven so that through Him I enjoy reconciliation with God, forgiveness of all my sins, grace, righteousness, and life eternal, then my reading in Scripture is of no help whatsoever to my salvation. I may, of course, become a learned man by reading and studying Scripture and may preach what I have acquired; yet all this would do me no good whatsoever. For if I do not know and do not find the Christ, neither do I find salvation and life eternal. In fact, I actually find bitter death; for our good God has decreed that no other name is given among men whereby they may be saved except the name of Jesus (Acts 4:12)."

One Author

If you will think about this purpose of Scripture for a moment, I am sure you will see that it is an additional reason why the Bible must be divine in origin. The Bible was written over a period of several thousand years by more than thirty human authors. If the product of these men was no more than a human product, it is inconceivable that they could have agreed even on an outlook on life, let alone on the grand overriding purposes of God in history as disclosed in their book. Yet this agreement is precisely what we find. The only explanation is that, although the human writers did write out of their own perspective and out of their own historical environments, nevertheless, the God who stands behind the Bible so inspired their writings that the resulting words were inerrant and consistent. What is more, the combined result was in an important sense one book.

It is no accident in this connection that in the verses we are studying, although Jesus does speak of Moses as having been responsible for part of the Bible (vv. 45-47), he nevertheless begins with the statement that the Scriptures in their entirety are God's witness to his messianic claims. This is the course of the argument in the fifth chapter. God bears witness to Jesus (vv. 30-32). He does so through the witness of John the Baptist (vv. 33-35). He does so through Christ's miracles (v. 36). Above all, however, he does so through the Bible (vv. 37-47).

We may sum up Christ's teaching in this chapter by saying that according to Jesus: 1) the Bible is given by God, 2) the purpose of the Bible is to point to himself, and 3) to use the Bible in any other way is ultimately to misunderstand it and pervert its intention.

One Subject

At this point someone might find himself thinking along these lines: "Granted that the purpose of the Bible (a Bible, I will admit, that is given by God) is to point to Jesus Christ. But how does it point to him? Is not the Bible mostly history? In the Old Testament, at least, does it not talk about anything but Jesus? How then can we say that it points to him? How can he be its subject?" The answer to that question is that Jesus becomes the subject of the Old Testament in two ways: (1) by fitting in with its general themes and (2) by fulfilling the specific prophecies to be found there. He becomes the subject of the New Testament in a far more obvious way, for the New Testament tells his story and is almost exclusively about him.

Think, for instance, about the great themes of the Old Testament. One theme is the sin of man and man's need. The Bible begins with the story of the creation. But no sooner is this story told (in the first two chapters of Genesis) than we also are told of man's fall. Instead of being humbly and gratefully dependent upon his Creator, as he should have been, man was soon in a state of rebellion against God. He went his way instead of God's. So the consequences of sin, including death, passed upon the race.

In the rest of the Old Testament we see these consequences unfolding. Thus we have the murder of Abel, the corruption leading up to the flood, demonism, sexual perversions, eventually even great tragedy for the chosen nation of Israel in spite of great blessings. Israel is carried off in slavery. Although some eventually return to the land of blessing, they return to a much less glorious existence. The Old Testament story is best summarized in David's great psalm of repentance, which ought properly to be the psalm of the whole human race: "Have mercy on me, O God, according to your unfailing love; according to your great compassion blot out my transgressions. Wash away all my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin. For I know my transgressions, and my sin is always before me.... Surely I was sinful at birth, sinful from the time my mother conceived me" (Ps. 51:1-3, 5).

Here is one great biblical doctrine. But if we understand it rightly, even this doctrine is not an end in itself. It is true. The heart of man acknowledges it to be true. But the truth of our sin and need is expounded in the Bible not merely for the sake of expounding a truth but rather because at the same time it is able to point to Christ as the solution to the dilemma.

We get some idea of this aspect of the Bible's witness by thinking of it as a doctor's diagnosis. Here is a man who goes to the doctor complaining of nausea and abdominal pain. The doctor notes an area of tenderness in the groin, does a blood test, and diagnoses appendicitis. What is the purpose of the doctor's diagnosis? Is telling the truth the purpose? Well, yes, in a sense. That is one purpose, but it is not the ultimate purpose. The ultimate purpose is to get the man with the pain to the surgeon so that the threat of death may be averted. In the same way, the Bible diagnoses the spiritual condition of the race so that individual men, women, and children might turn to the Lord Jesus Christ, since he is the only one who can cure their condition and bring healing. This is one way in which Jesus becomes the theme of the Old Testament.

We might add that all who really believed during the Old Testament age saw this. Thus we have stories of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, the prophets, Anna, Simeon, John the Baptist, and others, all of whom placed their trust in the coming Redeemer and waited for him.

This leads us to the second great Old Testament theme: the existence of a God who acts in love to redeem sinners. This God the Father did himself in partial ways throughout the Old Testament period. At the same time, even as he did it he pointed to the coming of his Son who would redeem his people perfectly and forever.

Take the dealings of God with Adam and Eve on the occasion of their having sinned in the garden. Sin had separated the man and woman from the Creator. They tried to hide. God, however, came to them in the cool of the evening, calling. It is true that God spoke in judgment, as he had to do. He revealed the consequences of their sin. Still, at the same time that he spoke in judgment, he killed animals. He clothed the man and woman with skins, covering their shame. Thus he began his teaching of the way of salvation through sacrifice. In the same story he spoke to Satan, revealing the coming of One who would one day defeat him forever. "He will crush your head, and you will strike his heel" (Gen 3:15).

Nine chapters later we find another, somewhat veiled, reference to the "seed" who shall crush Satan. This is God's first great promise to Abraham stressing that in him all men would be blessed (12:3). In chapter 22 it is restated like this, "And through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed" (22:18). The blessing referred to here certainly is not a blessing to come to all people through Abraham personally. It is not a blessing to come through all Jews indiscriminately, for all Jews are not even theists. It is not even a blessing to come through believing Jews. The blessing foretold is that which was to come through the seed of Abraham, the promised seed, the Messiah. Thus, years later the apostle Paul, who knew this text, used it to show that (1) the seed was the Lord Jesus, (2) the promise to Abraham was one of blessing through him, and (3) the blessing was to come through Christ's great work of redemption (Gal. 3:13-16).

In the Book of Numbers there is an interesting prophecy spoken by the Lord through Balaam, that shifty, halfhearted prophet of Moses' day. Balak, a king who was hostile to Israel, had hired Balaam to curse the Jewish people. But every time Balaam opened his mouth to curse, blessings on the people came out instead. On one occasion he said, "A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel.... A ruler will come out of Jacob and destroy the survivors of the city" (Num. 24:17, 19). This was a prophecy of Christ's coming. In the same way the patriarch Jacob spoke of him while he was dying, saying, "The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs and the obedience of the nations if his" (Gen 49:10).

Moses also spoke of the One who would come. Speaking for God he declared, "The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among your own brothers. You must listen to him" (Deut. 18:15). Again, with God speaking, "I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him" (v. 18).

The Psalms contain great prophecies. The second psalm tells of Christ's eventual victory and rule over the nations of this earth. This psalm was a popular one with the early Christians who used it in reference to Christ, as is apparent from Acts 4. Psalm 16 foretells the resurrection (v. 10; cf. Acts 2:31). In the twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth psalms are three portraits of the Lord Jesus: the suffering Savior, the compassionate shepherd, and the King. Other psalms speak of other aspects of his life and ministry. At last Psalm 110 returns to the theme of his rule, looking for the day when Jesus shall take his seat at the right hand of the Father when all his enemies shall be made his footstool (v. 1).

Dozens of prophecies concern details of Christ's life, death, and resurrection. They occur in the prophetic books—especially Isaiah, Daniel, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, and Zechariah—but also elsewhere. Jesus deliberately submitted his life to the outline for it as revealed in such prophecies, and he fulfilled them in careful and specific detail. That he did do this is evidenced by his rebuke to Peter after Peter had tried to prevent his arrest in Gethsemane. Jesus said, "Put your sword back in its place.... Do you think I cannot call on my Father, and he will at once put at my disposal more than twelve legions of angels? But how then would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen in this way?" (Matt. 26:52-54).

Open Book, Open Mind

After his resurrection the Lord Jesus Christ appeared to two of his disciples, a man and his wife, who were on their way home from Jerusalem following the Passover during which he had been killed. The disciples were Cleopas and Mary. They were dejected. Mary at least had seen the crucifixion, and when Jesus had died her faith in him and her hope had died also. Neither of them had any understanding that Christ needed to die and rise. Thus, even when reports of the empty tomb reached them early on that first Easter morning neither of them was able to take in the news.

As they went on their way Jesus appeared to them, but he had changed himself so that they could not recognize him. He could have revealed himself to them at once. Instead he revealed the purpose of the Scriptures and so taught both this couple and ourselves a great lesson.

The Bible says that he "opened" the Scriptures to them. The opening itself takes place in the midst of the story, but the phrase does not occur until the end. In reporting their encounter with Jesus they said, "Were not our hearts burning within us while he talked with us on the road and opened the Scriptures to us?" (Luke 24:32). As we read on in the story, however, we soon find that this initial "opening," the opening of the Scriptures, is followed by another "opening." This is the opening of their eyes. We read that as a consequence of his teaching and as he sat with them and broke bread in their home, "Then their eyes were opened and they recognized him" (v. 31). Finally, at the end of the story we read that Jesus again appeared to them in the presence of the other disciples and "opened their minds so they could understand the Scriptures" (v. 45).

Here are three great openings—the opening of the Scriptures, the opening of the eyes, and the opening of the mind. All three need to be reproduced in the life of every growing Christian. To have the Scriptures opened in the right way is to open the eyes to Christ. This in turn opens eyes in a new way to the Scriptures.

Has much of the Word of God been a mystery to you? Have you failed to see its purpose? If this has been the case, try reading the Bible to find Christ. Find him as the seed of the woman and of Abraham. Discover him prefigured in the life of Joseph. Recognize him as the Passover Lamb. See him as the rock in the wilderness. Learn about him as the cloud who guides his people in the years of their wandering. Perceive him as the Righteous One of Deuteronomy. Carry through the pages of the Old Testament to Malachi where he is portrayed as the Sun of righteousness risen with healing in his wings. If this happens for you, the Bible will cease to be a book to be handled only and instead will become a tool to be looked through. It will become a telescope that will bring you close to Jesus.

Chapter 70.
The Misuse of the Scriptures

John 5:39-44

In the controversy the Lord Jesus Christ had with the Jewish leaders of his day concerning the Scriptures, there was at least one point of agreement and two points of disagreement. The point on which both Jesus and the Jewish rulers agreed was that the Scriptures had a divine origin. Many would disagree today, of course. But in Christ's day all recognized that the Scriptures of the Old Testament came from God. The points on which they disagreed were these: first, the purpose of the Scriptures and, second, the use of the Scriptures. All but the last of these points have already been considered. So in this study, we want to look at the ways in which the Bible can be misused.

Jesus spoke of this error when he said, "You diligently study the Scriptures because you think that by them you possess eternal life. These are the Scriptures that testify about me, yet you refuse to come to me to have life. I do not accept praise from men, but I know you. I know that you do not have the love of God in your hearts.... How can you believe if you accept praise from one another, yet make no effort to obtain the praise that comes from the only God?" (John 5:3742, 44).

An End in Themselves

We must begin by asking the questions: How did the Jews misuse the Scriptures? Can we misuse them in the same way? The first answer, according to these words of Jesus, is obviously that the Jews misused Scripture by treating the words of Scripture as an end in themselves rather than allowing them to do their primary work, which is to point to Jesus. They searched the Scriptures, but they did not come to Christ. We err along the same lines whenever we allow Bible study to become academic and, as a result, do not allow ourselves to be drawn closer to God because of it.

No one could really fault the Jews of Christ's day for their meticulous study of the Scriptures. This was an acknowledged fact. The Jews did study the Scriptures. For this reason, I believe that verse 39 must be translated using the indicative mood ("You study the Scriptures") as many modern translations do, rather than using the imperative ("Study the Scriptures") as the Authorized Version does. The Jews prized the Scriptures. The difficulty did not lie there. The difficulty lay in the fact that in their high regard for the Bible they easily passed over its intention.

As a result, although they gained honor from men for their detailed knowledge of the Bible, they did not gain salvation.

We find an example of this just a few chapters farther on in John's Gospel. In chapter 9 John tells the story of the healing of a man who had been born blind. He was physically blind, of course. But the meat of the story lies in the fact that, like all men, he also was spiritually blind before Christ touched him. Afterward he came to spiritual sight. The man born blind began with the confession that, so far as he knew, he was healed only by a "man" named Jesus. He ended with the confession that Jesus is the "Lord," and worshiped him.

When the man was healed, he came into conflict with the Jewish rulers. They knew of Jesus, but they did not believe in him. In fact, they did not believe in him precisely because of their attitude to the Scriptures. For them the revelation recorded in the Old Testament was an end in itself. Nothing could be added. Nothing more, in fact, could be desired. They said, "We know that God spoke to Moses, but as for this fellow, we don't even know where he comes from" (9:29). The man who had been born blind did not try to compete with them in their acknowledged mastery of the Old Testament, but he pointed to the unquestioned fact of his healing. He concluded, "If this man were not from God, he could do nothing" (v. 33). In treating the Old Testament as an end in itself the Jews, therefore, actually perverted it and missed its true meaning. They failed to see that it is precisely of Jesus that the Old Testament testifies.

Let me bring this down to a very practical level—to our own day. Does anyone pervert the Bible by considering it an end in itself in our day? I believe that this happens frequently. Let me give some examples.

First, it happens in the world of biblical scholarship. Take the "historical Jesus" movement, which dates from 1768, the year in which the noted German scholar Hermann Samuel Reimarus died. Reimarus was not really a New Testament scholar, but at his death he left behind a manuscript that had far-reaching implications for those in the New Testament field. Reimarus argued that historians must distinguish between the "aim" of Jesus and the "aim" of his disciples. By this he meant that scholars should distinguish between the historical Jesus, who actually lived, and the Jesus of the New Testament, who was largely a product either of the faith or imagination of his followers. Faced with this choice, which he regarded as a choice between mutually exclusive alternatives, Reimarus chose the Jesus of history stripped of all supernatural elements. In his reconstruction Jesus then became one who went about preaching the kingdom of God but who died forsaken by God and disillusioned. Reimarus thought that Christianity was the product of the disciples who stole the corpse, proclaimed a bodily resurrection, and gathered followers.

It was obvious to many that Reimarus's views were extreme and his work polemical.
Nevertheless, it turned out that his manuscript set the pattern for a whole century of historicalJesus research. Scholars began to react against the supernatural element in the Gospels and cast about for a natural, alternative Jesus. Unfortunately, each scholar only succeeded in producing a Jesus in his own image. Rationalists saw him as the great teacher of morality. Socialists viewed him as a friend of the poor and a revolutionary. The most popular "lives of Jesus" volumes, those of David Friedrich Strauss, rejected most of the gospel as mythology, and Bruno Bauer ended his quest by denying that there ever was a historical Jesus. Bauer explained all the stories about Jesus as the products of the imagination of the primitive Christian community.

One can hardly fail to be impressed even today at the immense energy and talent that German scholars poured into this so-called "quest" for the historical Jesus, but the results were meager and the conclusions wrong. Scholarship had made the Gospels an end in themselves, so that the Bible became a book to be weighed and manipulated rather than believed and obeyed. What was the result? The result was that the Jesus produced was neither the historical Jesus nor the Christ of Scripture. Christ was the casualty. Here, then, was the error of Judaism, repeated on western soil and in recent history.

Let me give another example. Is it not true that the same thing happens in another way when a person buys a beautiful Bible to place in an important position in his or her home but fails to read it? Why do people do this? The answer is that in their minds the Bible is something special. They have a superstitious reverence for it. But their belief does not go beyond superstition. As a result, they never read it and, therefore, never come into contact with its author.

Third, the evangelical world may be in danger of doing almost the same thing with translations. I am for the use of any translations that actually help the user get into the Scriptures and obey them. I recommend the use of contemporary versions of the Bible along with more standard texts such as that of the Authorized, the Revised Standard, and the New American Standard versions. But alongside this legitimate use of translations there also is unfortunately an unhealthy preoccupation with the "best" and "latest" or most "contemporary" translation that I at least am convinced is harmful. Among those who get their minds fixed on the translations, it is the small variations between different texts that prove most interesting, rather than the teaching. Thus, obedience to Christ and a desire to know him better evaporates.

Personally I believe that there is absolutely no need for another English translation in our day. We have all varieties. Any taste can be satisfied. Perhaps much of our current interest in translations is traceable to the publishers who encourage our interest in them for commercial purposes. At any rate, I believe that the immense amounts of effort expended on producing such translations would be far better spent in getting the Bible into the languages of people who have not yet seen even one translation of the Scriptures.

Details Only

However, we must stop with these observations and go on. The first error that the Jews of Christ's day made, then, was the error of regarding Scripture as an end in itself. But this was not their only error. There was a second error also—that of becoming so preoccupied with the details of Scripture that they missed the truths contained there. For instance, the scribes, whose work it was to copy the Scriptures, subjected the pages of the Bible to the closest scrutiny. They gave attention to every syllable. They even counted up the words and letters so that they knew which of them came in the middle of the page and how many of each a given page should have. We can be thankful for this great care in one sense, for the accuracy of our present Old Testament texts is the result of it. Nevertheless, in the case of most scribes the reaction of the copier with the Word of God stopped with the copying. The words were accurate, but what is the value of accurate words without meanings? Or what is the value of letters if these are not inscribed on the fleshly tables of the heart?

We have a contemporary example of this error in those who have a high degree of biblical knowledge—those who can name the twelve apostles, all the cities Paul visited, the list of the Hebrew kings, and so on—but who have missed what the Scriptures have to teach about sin, justification, the Christian life, and obedience. Many others make this mistake in a preoccupation with prophecy.

Finally, the Jews also erred in considering the Scriptures rather than God as the source of life. This is easy to document. One Jewish writing, the Siphre on Deuteronomy 32:2, says, "As rain is life for the world, so also are the words of Torah life for the world." First Baruch 4:1-2 says, "This is the book of the commandments of God and the Law that endureth forever. All they that hold it fast are appointed to life; but such as leave it shall die." Hillel's words to the same effect are proverbial: "More flesh more worms; more wealth more care; more maidservants more lewdness; more menservants more thieving; more women more witchcraft; more Torah more life.... Whoso has gained a good name has gained it for himself; whoso has gained for himself words of Torah has gained for himself the life of the world to come" (Pirke Aboth 2:8). Quite clearly, this was believed literally. The important thing was the memorization of Scripture; this in itself won salvation. Against this view Jesus wished to point out that formal study of the Bible was not a guarantee of life to come, as the rabbis believed. Christ is the life, not the Scriptures considered in themselves. Only Christ can guarantee salvation.

What is needed then? The answer is that men and women need the new birth found in a new relationship to Jesus. The important story here is the conversation between Jesus and Nicodemus recorded earlier in the Gospel. Nicodemus was a Pharisee. He was a representative figure of the Jews. In this context a Jewish reader would expect a rabbinical debate, a discussion of the specific promises concerning a messiah, or something similar. Instead, the situation is no sooner introduced than Jesus moves the discussion to a higher and more spiritual plane. Jesus answers Nicodemus, "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again" (3:3).

We may summarize this by saying that the Bible was given by God to point a man to the Savior and that he must come to the Savior if he is to find life. This is necessary, for unless the life of God takes possession of our hearts even the Word of God will be incomprehensible.

Those Who Find Jesus

Has the Word of God done that for you? Has it pointed you to the Savior? Let me give you one last story. One time in preparing a Christmas message I became impressed with the large number of men who missed Christmas even though there was no real need for them to have missed it. The innkeeper was one. He was too busy. Herod was another. But by far the most interesting of all those who missed the birth of Jesus were the religious leaders, the chief priests and the scribes, who missed it even though they had the Old Testament and knew where Christ should be born. You remember the story. The wise men had come to Jerusalem. Herod inquired of the scribes. The scribes said that the Christ was to be born in Bethlehem. It was on their word that the wise men started out to Bethlehem where they found him. These men had the Scriptures. They knew them well enough to have the right answers. But they did not leave their own homes or the palace to investigate the Savior's arrival.

On the other hand, the Christmas story also tells of some who did find Christmas. They were not the kings of this world. They were not the religious leaders. They were not the thousands who were entirely engrossed in the countless minutia of materialistic lives. They were just poor folk who were looking to God and to whom God came.

Who were they? Some were shepherds. They were not important in the social structure of the ancient east. Yet they saw the angels. The wise men also found Christmas. They were not even Jews. Yet they saw the star. Finally, there were the poor but saintly folk like Simeon and Anna. These could well have been discounted either because of their means or social position or age. Some would dismiss them. Yet they saw and even held God's treasure. Why did these people find Jesus when the important of the world, as the world judges importance, so clearly missed him? There are two answers. First, they were honest enough to admit their need of a Savior. Second, they were humble enough to receive him personally when he came.

The Bible calls for this honest confession of sin and this humble commitment to the Lord Jesus Christ. You can read the Bible as the leaders of Israel did. You can misuse it out of pride. Or you can use it properly and come yourself to the Savior. Will you come in a spirit of humility?

Chapter 71.
The Accusation of the Scriptures

John 5:45-47

Do you remember the Titanic, that giant luxury liner built for passage of the North Atlantic sea lanes? The Titanic had been designed according to the latest of the scientific methods of its day and was supposed to be incapable of sinking. But she did sink. She hit an iceberg that ripped through nine of her watertight compartments. The resulting pressure was enough to burst through the rest of the ship. She went down, taking to the bottom many who were convinced that it could not happen. The Titanic disaster was a classic case of misplaced confidence.

We also discover a case of misplaced confidence in the three verses that close the important fifth chapter of John's Gospel. However, in this case the tragedy involves not merely the loss of life in this world. It also involves loss of life in the world to come. The Jewish leaders with whom Christ was speaking were not at all worried about salvation. They had the law of Moses, and they trusted their knowledge of it. It was evident from all that Jesus had to say, however, that a mere knowledge of the law was inadequate. The law was useful, but in itself it could not save; it was powerless. In fact, said Jesus, the law will actually condemn those who are trusting it. "But do not think I will accuse you before the Father. Your accuser is Moses on whom your hopes are set. If you believed Moses, you would believe me, for he wrote about me. But since you do not believe what he wrote, how are you going to believe what I say?" (John 5:45-47).

God's Standards

At this point the account that John gives of the conversation between Jesus and the Jews breaks off. But I suppose that if it were continued, the Jews would have been reported as asking the question we all want to ask when told that God's law condemns us. We ask it in different forms. Some ask, "If the law condemns us, then why did God give it?" Others say, "Why bother to keep the law, if this is the outcome?" Some ask, "What is the purpose of the law?" At the heart of these questions is the basic human objection that instead of pointing us to Jesus as the Savior God should take account of our nature and good works.

This is what the Pharisees had under the religious system that they had constructed. Jesus had said that these religious leaders desired the honor that comes from men (v. 44), and this was quite accurate. It was characteristic of them that they sought praise. They dressed so that everyone would recognize them. They prayed in a loud voice, publicly, so that everyone would observe what they were doing. They made sure that everyone knew what they were giving to the temple. In short, under this system people had taken their minds off God and were comparing themselves with others. They did quite well by this comparison, at least in their own eyes. So when Jesus came they obviously saw no need for a Savior.

Here, however, they missed the major point of the law, for the law was not given to help them do better than others but to show them that no matter how well they did they could not do well enough to satisfy God.

William Barclay says quite accurately, "The point is not: 'Am I as good as my neighbor?' The point is: 'Am I as good as God?' The point is not: 'Is my scholarship and is my piety greater than that of other people whom I could name?' The point is: 'What do I look like to God?' So long as we judge ourselves by human comparisons there is plenty of room for self-satisfaction, and selfsatisfaction kills faith, for faith is born of the sense of need. But when we compare ourselves with Jesus Christ, and through Him, with God, we are humbled to the dust, and then faith is born, for there is nothing left to do but to trust to the mercy of God."

It is only when we compare ourselves with God that we realize the need for a work of redemption accomplished by a Savior who comes from God to lift us up to himself.

Perfection

All this falls into an even clearer light when we go on to ask what God's standard is and find out, on the basis of the law, that this is perfection. I sometimes say in teaching on this subject, "Suppose that God were to come to you right now as you are and immediately take you as you are into heaven." If this should happen, heaven would not be heaven anymore. Heaven would be a little bit dirty. And it would be very dirty if God were to do this with us all. No, God's standard must be perfection. Nothing else can satisfy him. This is the message of the law. Thus, the law itself says, "Cursed is everyone who does not continue to do everything written in the Book of the Law" (Gal. 3:10; cf. Deut. 27:26).

This is the accusation of Moses, about which Christ was speaking. We hear it and tremble, for this is a terrible verdict. At the same time we need not tremble for long, for at the same time that God sets forth his standard he also sets forth the means by which that standard may be met. Instead of striving on our part, God tells us to rest on what he has done for us and to present it back to himself as he desires.

But before we go on to see what this means more precisely, we must deal more with this idea of perfection. Perfection is the standard, but what is perfection? One answer to that question comes from the law of the Old Testament. The Ten Commandments are the heart of the Old Testament law, and Deuteronomy 6:5 is the summation of the Ten Commandments. So we may deal with just this verse. It says, "Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength." This is the verse by which Jesus summed up the law in response to the question of the rich young ruler.

The point is that no one has ever done this. Moreover, it necessarily follows that if no one has been able to live up to it, and if this is the standard God gave, then there has never been anyone who has ever been saved by the law. One commentator has written, "I do not expect to meet anyone in Heaven who is there because of the Ten Commandments. Oh, I will meet men there who have measured themselves by the law and found that they had fallen short and therefore have learned they must run to the grace of God to be saved through the blood sacrifice He had provided, but no one will be there through the commandments themselves."

Not a few men and women try to take comfort in the fact that although they are condemned by a verse like Deuteronomy 6:5, nevertheless there are some commandments that they seem capable of fulfilling. But this is misplaced confidence also. James 2:10 tells us, "For whoever keeps the whole law and yet stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it." This means that perfection is not to be measured by how well one can keep one particular commandment but by how well he keeps them all. By this measure a person is as imperfect by breaking one law as by breaking all ten. Suppose you had a boat that is fastened to a dock above a waterfall by a chain of ten links. How many do you have to break to set the boat adrift? The answer is: Just one. In the same way, men are adrift and condemned by the law no matter which one or how many of the commandments have been broken.

Another important expression of God's standard of perfection is found in the Sermon on the Mount. The entire sermon is an expression of it, of course. But again, we may take that one verse that is a summary. This is the Golden Rule. The Golden Rule says, "So in everything, do to others what you would have them do to you, for this sums up the Law and the Prophets" (Matt. 7:12). Who does this? The only honest answer is: No one. There are times when we try to please others. But we do not do it in all things or all the time any more than we love God with all our hearts, souls, and minds at all times. Again, no one will ever be in heaven as a result of the Golden Rule, except insofar as God has used it to reveal the person's own lack of perfection and turn him away from his own human goodness to the Savior.

An Internal Standard

There is another point that is obvious from these two great verses that summarize God's standards. Not only is God's standard perfection. Not only is this to be judged by the whole of God's laws, rather than just a part. This standard is also an internal standard, as well as an external one. Thus, it deals with thoughts, motivations, and desires, as well as with actions.

Think for a moment of how Jesus looked at the Pharisees. When other people looked at the Pharisees they saw only what was visible from the outside, for that is all that human beings ever see. From that perspective the Pharisees were not too bad. At least they appeared better than others. Jesus, on the other hand, being God, was able to look at what was going on within, and he saw their motivations. They were striving for righteousness all right, at least as they conceived it, but they were doing it to outdo other people. It was not to please God. Moreover, in spite of their efforts to clean up the outside of their lives the Pharisees were as incapable as anyone else of cleaning up what was inside. On one occasion Jesus expressed this quite pointedly by saying, "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You are like whitewashed tombs, which look beautiful on the outside but on the inside are full of dead men's bones and everything unclean" (Matt. 23:27).

These words are true of anyone. To a certain extent you and I can pull ourselves up by our bootstraps morally. A thief can reform himself and stop stealing. Having worked off a debt to society, he can even recapture a certain measure of respect and trust from his fellowmen. An alcoholic can overcome his weakness for drink. He can regain useful employment and again become a credit and asset to his family. We admire those who are able to do this. But the truth of the matter is that although we are able to do this outwardly so that people may admire us, as they did the Pharisees, we are nevertheless unable to do anything about the state of our hearts. Thus, we cannot make ourselves loving if we are not loving. We cannot make ourselves humble if we are not humble. Above all, we cannot make ourselves righteous (as God counts righteousness) if we are not.

The Scales of God

We sum it all up, then, and we find that the demand of the law is perfection. This is a perfection in all the law's requirements, and it is an internal perfection as well as an external one. Moreover, we see that all are condemned by this standard. Jesus was right. The law can do only two things, and the bringing of salvation is not one of them. The law can either condemn, or it can point to the Savior.

Has it done that for you? Perhaps I can help you to see this and make a commitment to Christ by an illustration that I first heard from Donald Grey Barnhouse. Sometime ago in a friend's house I came across an old balancing scale, the kind that was once used to measure out most dry goods and produce. It was a large one because my friend's family had been in the bakery business and had used this scale to measure flour and sugar for large recipes. In this type of scale a weight of fixed measure is placed on one side of the balance arm and the item to be weighed on the other. When there is enough flour or sugar or whatever it may be on the side opposite the weight, the arm balances.

Imagine now that you have before you that type of scale and that God has placed the pound measure of his perfection on the one arm. This is the perfection that the law portrays and that God must demand of you on the basis of his nature. Nothing less than perfection—in word, thought, and deed—can satisfy him. What can you furnish to meet his demands?

Here is a criminal, perhaps a thief or a murderer, who comes to present his goodness to God. He is not much by our standards, but even the most critical among us would not deny that he has some goodness. We acknowledge this when we say that there is honor even among thieves. The criminal comes; he places his goodness upon the scale. It is an ounce or two. But an ounce is not a pound, and the scales are unmoved. We set the criminal aside and write over him the words of God's judgment.

The average person now comes forward and places his good works on God's scale. He does much better than the criminal. The average person presents seven or eight ounces. This is three or four times better than the man who has gone before. Still it is not a pound. So the law accuses him also, and he too receives God's judgment.

Finally, the best men and women come forward. These are the acknowledged leaders of our society, just as the scribes and Pharisees were the acknowledged leaders of theirs. They may be social workers, ministers, professors, philanthropists. They are better than the average man. They present eleven or twelve ounces of attainment. Still their eleven or twelve ounces will not budge the scale of God's righteousness, and so they too join the rest of the race and are set aside. The Bible says, "For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23).

Will a man live by law? Then the law will condemn him. But just here God comes in with his message of free salvation. Notice that he does not change his standard. The law is a good standard. It is the only possible standard. It is just that it cannot save people who have broken it. But God can! The efforts of men cannot move God's balance, but now God is going to move it for us. Jesus comes. He is the Son of God, our Savior. He is the embodiment of that total, internal, and external perfection of mind, soul, and body about which the law has been talking. He had the right to avoid us all. Yet he comes and is put to death for our sins. Since Jesus is the infinite God, his death is sufficient for any number of finite creatures. He was able to take the punishment of the law for an infinite weight of sin and cancel it for us in the hour of his death, so that now sin may be removed and righteousness be made available for all who trust him. God comes to us with the offer of salvation. He tells us that he wants us to be in heaven with him and that he has made the way. "I love you," God says. "I do not care on what level your life has been lived. I only want you to look to my Son who died for you. Do you see him dying there? He died for you. Do you see Christ rising from the tomb? This too is for you, for it is the evidence that I am forever satisfied with his sacrifice. If you will believe in him and commit yourself to him, I will take that death for your side of the scale. The standard is the same, but I will give my righteousness for your side of the balance." We take that righteousness, the righteousness given to us, and go (some boldly and others falteringly) to God's balance. We place Jesus' righteousness on our side of the scale, and immediately the balance is made. We are justified. We are accepted in the Beloved. God has nothing more against us forever.

Have you done that? Remember, it is not enough to be like the Pharisees. It is not enough to possess the Bible. It is not enough to read the Bible. It is not even enough to study the Bible or memorize the Bible. You must obey the Bible. And it is the Bible that points you away from your own efforts to earn salvation, which you can never do, and instead directs you toward the Lord Jesus Christ, who is our Savior.

Chapter 72.
The Fourth Miracle

John 6:1-4

There is only one miracle performed by the Lord Jesus Christ that is recorded by each of the four evangelists—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. It is the miracle in which he used only five small barley loaves and two fish to feed over five thousand people in Galilee just before the annual Jewish feast of Passover. It is important, moreover, not just because it is recorded in each of the Gospels but because of all that it signifies. Fortunately, the significance of the feeding of the multitude is spelled out far more clearly by John than by any of the other writers.

Each of the Gospel writers brings out of the story that which spoke to him personally. Matthew and Luke were most interested in the miracle itself, for they tell it without much embellishment. Mark stresses the loving compassion of Jesus; it was out of Jesus' compassion for the multitude, Mark tells us, that Christ fed them. In John the interest revolves around the historical significance of the event—it was a time of testing and a turning point in Christ's ministry—and around the fact that Jesus is himself the bread that satisfies men spiritually. Only in John do we learn that the miracle took place at the time of the Passover, that the loaves of the young lad were barley loaves (the poorest kind), the reason for gathering up the fragments that remained, and the effect of the miracle on the masses.

Incidentally, the difference in emphasis in the midst of an obvious agreement on all the details of the story by the four writers is evidence of the reliability of these men as historians. The agreements are such that the story could not have been made up by each man separately. The differences are such that they obviously were not collaborating. Thus, if they were not made up separately and if they were not made up in collaboration, the only remaining possibility is that they were not made up at all. They are true. In other words, we have in these accounts (Matt. 14:15-21; Mark 6:32-44; Luke 9:12-17; and John 6:1-15) the record of a true though supernatural event recorded accurately by four witnesses.

Anyone who wishes to dispute the factualness of the miracle must deal with such evidence.

A Needy People

The story is not recorded by the Gospel writers as evidence of their reliability, however, but rather to teach Christian truth. So it is to this that we must now turn. John tells us that sometime after the events recorded in the fifth chapter, Jesus, who was now in the north, crossed over to the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee where he was followed by a great multitude of people. It was the time of the Passover. Perhaps many of these people were on their way to Jerusalem to observe it, though we do not know this for sure. What we do know is that they were following Jesus because they had seen the miracles he did. Evening had come on as they had been listening to his teaching, and they were hungry.

Jesus anticipated the situation. He turned to Philip and asked a question that, together with the answer, is recorded by John to bring out the first important point in the story. Jesus asked, "Where shall we buy bread for these people to eat?" Philip answered to the effect that there was no place to buy it, that even if there were a place the disciples did not have enough money to pay for it, and furthermore that even if they had two hundred denarii (the normal wages of a laborer for six months), even this would not buy enough bread so that each one could have a little. In Philip's reply we have a confession of the failure of human resources in the situation. By extention, we also have an illustration of the failure of human resources in many circumstances of our own.

I do not doubt for a minute that this is one of John's main reasons for recording the story. It is obvious from a doctrinal point of view, of course. For John is soon going to show Jesus to be the One who can meet all needs, and there must always be a recognition of need before there can be a real turning to Jesus for help. But, more than this, the point is evident from John's passing reference to the Passover.

No alert Jewish mind would come to a word like this without thinking somewhat of the significance of the Passover. And it would be hard to miss the fact that the Passover marked the beginning of that period when Israel left the seeming security of Egypt and entered the wilderness where they were entirely dependent upon God. Things had been bad in Egypt, certainly. The people were slaves. They had been treated cruelly. Still, with grit and a little bit of humor a person could get by. In the desert it was different. In the desert there were vast extremes of temperature (from 140 to 160 degrees Fahrenheit in the daytime to below freezing at night). There were no towns and therefore no shops in which to buy food. Above all, there was no water, and without water a man cannot survive. This is the picture that John is setting before us in the opening verses of this chapter and that he is reinforcing specifically by reference to the desert wandering later. It is a picture of the failure of human resources—not only in a physical sense but also in the attempts of a person to please God.

On the physical level we do not need a great deal of reinforcement for this truth. We speak today of the eventual failure of natural resources such as fresh water, soil, natural gas, oil, and so on, due to the rate at which men and women of our century are consuming them. We speak of the failure of emotional resources, such as we find in nervous breakdowns, despair, uncontrolled temper, and such things. These failures are obvious. What is not so obvious is the failure of men and women to please God or to experience the life of God. This failure is invisible, yet it exists also.

You have failed to please God. You have failed to find the life of God by your own efforts. Do you not find that all you are able to do for yourself personally—whether it is in the area of success, wealth, fame, or sex—fails to bring happiness? I hope you have found this to be true, because it is true. Besides, it is only when you or I begin to acknowledge these things to be true that we begin to see and accept the solution.

The Sufficiency of Jesus Christ

The second point of this story, which is also the second reason why John tells it, is that Jesus Christ is all-sufficient. This is important particularly where human resources fail.

The matter of eating assumed a far greater importance in an ancient culture than it does for most of us who are living today. When we want something we merely go to the store for it, and it is rare when we cannot buy all we want. In ancient times it was different. Harvests were uncertain. There was not always enough to eat. As a result, to have enough food was considered a great blessing, and food itself became a symbol of prosperity. This is seen all through the Old Testament. For instance, at the beginning of Isaiah we read, "If you are willing and obedient, you will eat the best from the land" (1:19). Isaiah later said, "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat! Come, buy wine and milk without money and without cost. Why spend money on what is not bread, and your labor on what does not satisfy? Listen, listen to me, and eat what is good, and your soul will delight in the richest of fare" (55:1-2). David wrote, "The poor will eat and be satisfied; they who seek the LORD will praise him" (Ps. 22:26). We can see that this was also an important idea in Christ's time, for later on in this same chapter the Lord declared to his hearers, "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" (John 6:35).

Men and women find their real spiritual prosperity in God. We cannot find it on the human level. We cannot find the abundant life by indulging ourselves in all that life has to offer. We cannot find happiness by pursuing it. We cannot create satisfaction. These great blessings come from God. So we must feed on God as he is presented to us in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Do you feed upon him? Do you come to him expecting to be fed?

There is a point here that becomes quite interesting in the actual working out of the story. In everyday business terms we would say that the supply outstripped the demand. We know it because, after the miracle had taken place and everyone eating had been filled, there were still twelve baskets of food left over. Food in abundance! It is always like that with God. In his valuable commentary Arthur W. Pink observes that when Abraham went up to intercede with God on behalf of the righteous in Sodom, God never ceased granting until Abraham had ceased asking. So also in the case of Elisha's oil. So long as there were empty vessels to be found in the land, the vessel of the widow who was helped by Elisha did not cease its supply. Pink writes, "This is what Jesus does to all His people. He comes to the poor bankrupt believer, and, placing in his hand a draft on the resources of heaven, says to him, 'Write on it what thou wilt.' Such is our precious Lord still. If we are straightened, it is not in Him, but in ourselves. If we are poor and weak, or tried and tempted, it is not that we cannot help ourselves—it is because we do not.... We have so little faith in things unseen and eternal. We draw so little on the resources of Christ. We come not to Him with our spiritual wants—our empty vessels—and draw from the ocean of His grace."

There is a hymn that acknowledges this beautifully, though it is not widely known in America. It was written by Mary Shekleton.

I am an empty vessel—not one thought
Or look of love, I ever to Thee brought;
Yet I may come, and come again to Thee
With this, the empty sinner's only plea— Thou lovest me.
Oh, fill me, Jesus Savior, with Thy love!
Lead, lead me to the living fount above;
Thither may I, in simple faith, draw nigh,
And never to another fountain fly, But unto Thee.

Have you asked God to do that, to supply what you need? Have you asked him really? God says that he is more than willing to fill the empty vessel of your life, in fact, that he is urging you to let him fill it. The Bible says, "And my God will supply all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

How about you who are running away from God? You are unhappy, but you have never come to the point where you are willing to say, "Lord God, I have been running away from you and I have failed to recognize your claim on my life." You are unhappy. In some cases you are miserable. Why do you not stop running? Turn to Jesus and see if he is not able to satisfy you completely. You may be one who is tempted—perhaps in your home, perhaps out of your home.

It may be a small thing; it may be a very great thing. Whatever it is, Jesus is sufficient for it. The Book of Hebrews says that Jesus was tempted as we are and is therefore able to help us in temptations (Heb. 4:15-16). Paul writes that God provides a way of escape in all temptations (1 Cor. 10:13). Perhaps your need is for comfort. You have lost a friend or relative, a wife, a husband. You are alone. Human resources have failed. Turn to the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the source of all comfort. He will provide it. Ask him. You are wise if you ask him for everything for which you stand in need.

Has God Forgotten?

This story contains a lesson for anyone who feels that God has forgotten him or her. Do you feel that way? If you do, notice that long before the disciples had expressed any interest in the welfare of the people, Jesus had initiated the matter of feeding them. He had spoken of it to Philip, knowing in advance what he was going to do. The disciples were interested—to a degree. They probably were hungry, too, so their concern would have been spurred on by self-interest. Still, whatever interest they may have had, the interest of the Lord Jesus Christ in the people was greater.

That is an encouragement for us, both if we fail to show concern for others—the multitudes about ourselves—or if we are one of the multitude and so feel forgotten. Let us take our attitude toward others first. We often fail to see human need. We miss the cry of loneliness, despair, or frustration expressed by some poor soul. Jesus hears it. Our hearts may be cold, but the heart of Jesus is warm with compassion.

Or suppose you are one of the lonely ones. Even when there are other people who are interested in you, that interest still is always imperfect and partial. There are people in your home, office, or church who care for you, particularly if they are Christian people. But they are beset by all the sin and failure that is common to men and women. Only One will not fail you. There is only One whose interest does not waver. Jesus is eternal. He existed before the worlds began. He created you. He planned the circumstances of your life. He knows your situation. It is this One who desires to supply all your need according to his abundant resources.

Do you say that you cannot see it? There is no reason why you should. Just trust him. The patriarch Jacob, Abraham's grandson, was in his old age and was complaining about the harsh blows that life had dealt him. Years before, his son Joseph had been killed by wild animals, so he thought. Then famine had come, and he had sent ten of his remaining sons to Egypt to buy food. He had kept Benjamin, the youngest, at home. The sons came back, but without Simeon, who had been left as a hostage. When the famine continued it became necessary to send the sons back to Egypt for more food, but they refused to go, saying they could not return without Benjamin. The man in charge in Egypt had told them that if they did not return with Benjamin he would consider them liars about their family and would treat them as spies. Jacob was greatly distressed. He fought the inevitable. All things seemed against him. But it was at this moment that God was planning his greatest blessing for him. God knew the end from the beginning, and he cared about Jacob. He had actually sent Joseph to Egypt years in advance to prepare for this moment. Joseph was the man in charge. It was only when Jacob gave in to the situation that God brought to completion the blessing of a full reunion of all the brothers and their father in their new land.

Maybe you are going through a situation like that in your own life. Do not wring your hands and say, "God has forgotten." Trust him. He knows your need and where he is leading you.

Chapter 73.
Three and the Master

John 6:5-9

Not long ago I had an opportunity to attend a seminar on management skills conducted by the Servicemaster Industries Corporation. Many parts of the seminar were useful and instructive, but one part in particular impressed me as being of value in understanding this part of John's Gospel. There was an attempt to define management. The definition given was: "Management is getting the right things done through other people." This definition relates to Christ's miracle of feeding the five thousand people in Galilee because, among other things, the story gives us a splendid example of good management.

What did Jesus do on this occasion? He fed a great company of people, of course. But what precisely did he do? Or, we might ask, how did he do it? He could have lifted up his hands and have demanded that manna come down from heaven. It would have come. He could have created a loaf of bread in each man's pocket. But Jesus did not do these things. Instead, he began to work through others—Philip, the lad, and Andrew. They helped. Thus, Jesus managed to get the job done through other people.

Philip

The first person the Lord turned to was Philip. Philip was from Bethsaida, and Bethsaida was in that area. It was natural that Jesus should turn to Philip, therefore, for Philip more than anyone else knew what food was available. The difficulty was that Philip got all caught up in his knowledge—perhaps he was proud that he knew that area of the country and could tell that there was no place to buy anything—and so forgot to turn the matter over to Jesus. In simple language, John tells us that Jesus asked Philip about food to test him and implies that Philip failed the test.

Philip had been confronted with a trying situation, much as we often are confronted. But his response was that which far too often is our own. A bill comes in the mail, and it is larger than the balance remaining in your checking account. What do you do? Do you wring your hands and say, "How in the world am I ever going to pay this bill?" Or do you take it to the Lord? You have a problem in your home, perhaps with your children or with your husband or wife. Do you say, "What is happening? How will I ever survive?" Or do you take it to the Lord? There is a problem at work. Do you say, "I don't know the answer; I'll just have to work weekends and work it out somehow"? Or do you take it to the Lord? You and I will have learned a great deal about walking with the Lord when we have learned to spread each difficulty before him as it comes along.

One hindrance to doing this is sometimes pride in our knowledge, the same hindrance that faced Philip. Philip was so flattered at being asked this question that he began to show off his knowledge and, in showing off his knowledge, actually revealed his ignorance. Knowledge can be a blessing, but it can also be a handicap to trusting the Lord. When placed in Christ's hands, it is valuable. When trusted in itself, it is not.

There was a second reason why Philip failed the test Jesus gave him. Philip not only had knowledge of the area where the miracle took place. He also had a head for figures, and this in turn led him to trust money. He began to calculate. He said to himself, "Let's see now, there are about a hundred people in that little group... there are about two hundred over there... two hundred... six hundred... Now if we gave everyone just a little bit, that would be so many times a few cents and...." Then he gave Jesus the result of his calculations. He said, "Eight months' wages would not buy enough bread for each one to have a bite" (v. 7). Philip calculated, but he calculated without Christ.

I am convinced that if there is any one thing that most plagues Christian organizations in our day it is the thought that we can figure out the situation and then accomplish God's work primarily by means of money. I must not be misunderstood at this point, however. I said a moment ago that knowledge is a good thing if it is placed in Christ's hands. This is true also of money. Money can be well used. But to think that the needs of men and women can be met merely by collecting funds, even for an evangelical cause—it is this that is debilitating.

Moreover, it limits our vision. We think that when we are talking money and raising money we are thinking big, but actually, compared with God's plans for us, the opposite is generally the case. Think of Philip. He said, "Eight months' wages would not buy enough bread for each one to have a bite." Imagine even talking about "a little" in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ! Yet we do that also. We have seen God work, as Philip had seen him work. But we come to him and say, "Oh, God, if you would just do so and so—it's just a little thing—if you would just do it, I believe I could get by." Actually, Christ's desire is to bless us abundantly.

Let us use our knowledge. Let us use our money. Let us use anything else God gives to us. But above all, let us look to God himself. Let us have that kind of vision for our own lives, our church, and our communities that stretches our minds and causes us to throw ourselves upon God. Let us say, "It is not just a little bit that we desire, our Father. We are not praying to have a little but to have much."

Someone might say, "But Philip had an excuse, didn't he? After all, he didn't know what Christ could do." I am not sure that this is a valid excuse. John has recorded several miracles that had taken place already. At the beginning of chapters 5 and 6 he has indicated a lapse of time in which, according to the other evangelists, other miracles had been performed also. Philip had been with Christ. He had seen these things. But when the question was put to him for this new situation his faith was inadequate. He said, "Yes, I know that you changed the water into wine at Cana. I know that you healed the son of the nobleman. I know that you made the paralyzed man walk. But I am not sure that you can do it for me." We say that. We see God working with others, but we do not allow that knowledge to carry over into our own lives.

There is nothing that God has done in the life of any other Christian at any period of history that he is not able to do in you if that is his plan for your life. You can know this. Moreover, you can know that if he has placed something in your life for a test, he has done it in order that you and others might see him bring blessing.

The Lad

The second person Jesus dealt with in this story was the lad. It is interesting to think about him for a moment. What do we know about him? For one thing, we know that he was poor. We know this because we are told by John that his lunch was composed largely of barley bread. Barley bread was the cheapest of all bread and was held in contempt. Thus, as William Barclay notes, barley bread was the kind of bread prescribed by the Mishnah as a meal offering for the sin of adultery because, says the Mishnah, adultery is the sin of a beast and barley is the food of beasts.

This kind of contempt is similar to that which Samuel Johnson had for Scotland when, in his famous dictionary, he defined oats as "a grain which in England is fed to horses and in Scotland is fed to people." The lad had this bread and with it two small, pickled fish to help make the dry, coarse bread go down.

Moreover, we know that the boy was insignificant. Someone has said, "There is nothing in this world so insignificant as a boy." From a human point of view this often is true. Here was a small boy, poor and insignificant. Yet that boy did something that set him apart from all the other boys who may have been in the crowd that day. That boy gave his lunch, poor as it was, to the Lord Jesus. That lunch was as insignificant as it could be. It was as insignificant as the boy was. But the point of the story is that the insufficient from the hands of the insignificant became sufficient and significant when placed in the hands of Jesus.

It is true through the whole of biblical history. What is as insignificant as dust? Nothing! You cannot even plant crops in it. Yet the dust became man when molded by the hands of the Creator. The jawbone of an ass is insignificant. But God used a jawbone in the hands of Samson to kill one thousand of the enemies of Israel. A shepherd's rod is insignificant, but it became powerful when God placed it in the hands of Moses. A sling is unimportant, but God used it in the hands of David to kill Goliath. And what is as insignificant as a poor girl, a virgin, in a distant town of the Roman empire? Yet God took one such girl, a girl named Mary, and used her to bring forth the Redeemer.

Do not make the mistake of thinking that what you have is insignificant and therefore useless. You may compare your gift with all the great talents of this world—at least, those you think to be great—and imagine that your gift is worthless. But if you do that you are forgetting to figure on God and God's desires. What is it after all that makes a gift great in God's service? It is not the magnitude of the gift. It is into whose hands it is given. If you will take what you have, no matter how small or how great it may be, and place it in the hands of the Master, you will find that it is more than sufficient for whatever task he sets before you.

What is your gift? Are you one who because of your age or your circumstances simply has time on your hands that many others, who are already engaged in work or projects, do not have? If so, that is a gift. Ask God to show you how you can use your time in his service. Perhaps you have money? I spoke earlier of the danger of trusting money rather than God, but that does not mean for a moment that you cannot place your money in Christ's hands to be used by him, if you have it. Recently a man who had joined our church, and has since helped us in many ways, told me that one of the reasons why he joined was that he realized our need for money and wished to help out where he was able. He recognized that much of our work is with students who contribute little toward our expenses. Perhaps God has given you abilities in administration, understanding the thoughts and problems of others, communicating the gospel.

If you think you may have any of these raw materials, you need to do two things. First, you need to ask God to clarify your gift so you will understand what it is exactly that he has given you. Second, you need to place it in his wonderful hands.

Andrew

We have considered already two important people in this story—Philip and the lad. There is a wonderful contrast between them, and much more could be said. But I do not want to end this study without looking at one more person. That person is Andrew, another of Christ's disciples.

I have learned over the years in which I have been preaching that some persons have a disposition for sermon outlines. They can figure them out almost as fast as the preacher. If you are one of these people, you probably have been wondering for some time why I did not mention Andrew sooner. The normal course of a study such as this would have been to speak of Philip and Andrew—they were disciples—and then the lad who had lunch. I have done it this way for a special reason. Philip was the first who was approached; he had the wrong answer. He was so caught up in his knowledge and in his ability with figures that he forgot

Jesus. The lad was the one who responded, for he had something to give and was not too sophisticated or self-conscious to give it. But Andrew —Andrew was in Philip's position entirely so far as having anything to give was concerned. He had no food, just as Philip had no food. But Andrew went and got the lad.

Do you see what I am saying? I spoke in the beginning of how Jesus Christ was a good manager, according to the definition: "Management is getting the right things done through other people." By this definition Jesus was a first-rate manager in approaching Philip. But that is only what we might expect. The additional interesting and exciting point is that Andrew in imitation of Christ learned to be a good manager also. He said, "I do not have anything to offer, but I will go and see who does." It may be that you can be an Andrew. You yourself may not have the gift that is needed, but you can see what is needed and recruit someone who has it.

Moreover, I sometimes think as I read this story of the profound effect Andrew's approach must have had on the boy. Apart from what Andrew did that day in Galilee that boy was just like any other boy. He would have come and heard Jesus. But he would have been back on the far edge of the crowd somewhere, and the next day (after the people had gone) he would have been back home playing with his marbles. But Andrew got him. Andrew brought him into contact with the Lord Jesus and expanded his horizons. What is more, I am convinced that as the result of what Andrew did that boy went away remembering the day for as long as he lived. It will not surprise me in the slightest to find that boy in heaven someday, having later (as a result of this day's experience coupled with the preaching of Christ's death and resurrection) come to receive the Lord Jesus Christ as his Savior.

I thank God for those who did the work of Andrew for me. One of those was Donald Grey Barnhouse, the founder of the Bible Study Hour and a former pastor of the church I now serve. I was just a boy in the western part of Pennsylvania. So far as I knew, nothing of great importance ever happened in our town. But Barnhouse came there one year. Someone forgot to meet him at the airport, so he ended up in our house. He had known my parents from the years they had spent in Philadelphia. He stayed not only for that night but for each night of a ten-week series, and then for another ten-week series a couple of years later. During those weeks I had the privilege of sitting at the dining room table after school and listening to him as he talked about the state of the world and of what God was doing in various parts of it. He talked about the Bible, of what he was going to preach that evening, of what he was writing. All of this expanded my horizons, and I began to think of the day when I would preach, even though I did not know then that it would eventually be from the pulpit he was then occupying.

Where Is the Man?

Each of us has ways of measuring the importance of things in this world. Often we measure things by success. We look at this world and we consider those with power and wealth and extra intelligence to be important. God never measures things in this way. God tells us that the principal characters on the world stage generally are not those whom the world thinks prominent, but rather those who have surrendered whatever they have been given into his hands.

Will you do that? You may be looking only at your littleness, instead of looking at God's greatness. You may be complaining that your talents or opportunities are not great. You may be discouraged because your talents do not seem up to the tasks set before you. If any of these things are true, you need to remember that God used a little slave girl to bring the leper Naaman in touch with his healing power. He used a widow to provide the necessities of life for the prophet Elisha. Joseph was only a slave, but God used him to save both Egypt and Israel. We have already seen in this Gospel how God used the woman of Samaria, a prostitute, to save a whole town.

One day Dwight L. Moody overheard a man say, "The world has yet to see what God will do through one man who is fully surrendered to him." Moody answered—will you say it also?— "By the grace of God I am going to be that man."

Chapter 74.
Who's in Charge?

John 6:10-15

There is a very old proverb that says, "Nothing succeeds like success." The only difficulty is that the proverb does not say what success helps us succeed in doing.

In chapter 1 at the beginning of our study of the fifth chapter of John, I pointed out that there are two dangers that come to anyone who is seeking to please the Lord and walk in his way. They are: the danger of success and the danger of hostility. In John's Gospel the danger of hostility comes first, so we discussed that in connection with our study of Jesus's reaction to the hostility of the Jewish leaders in chapter 5. When a person determines to live as Jesus has called him to live, that person can be certain that there will be some measure of hostility from the world, even at times from his Christian friends. This causes some followers of the Lord to become discouraged and to pull back from a full commitment. We have seen in our earlier studies that this did not happen to Jesus, and we saw why.

The second danger is the danger of success. This is no less frightening. Something can take place in the Christian's life that is so encouraging spiritually that the Christian becomes enamored with his success and comes to depend upon himself spiritually. He then goes off under his own wisdom, building a superstructure that is not of God's design. It is one rather of his own making. Those who gain reputations for themselves as Christian crusaders often provide us with examples of this, and the ends to which they go and the non-Christian means they employ to get there are disheartening. Fortunately, Jesus faced this danger also and was victorious.

Little Knowledge

In the sixth chapter of John we are told that after Jesus had used the five barley loaves and the two fish provided by the lad to feed five thousand people, the people who had witnessed the miracle determined to make him their king. In other words, they wanted to make him a political Messiah who would drive out the Romans.

This was wrong, of course, but the people for all their selfishness were not entirely unperceptive about what Jesus had done. For one thing, they were Jews and so possessed a religious heritage in which the idea of a Messiah was prominent. For another, they knew that in the law God had promised Moses that one day he would raise up a leader like himself. God had said, "I will raise up for them a prophet like you from among their brothers; I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him" (Deut. 18:18). Knowledge of this promise explains the reaction of the people in saying, "Surely this is the Prophet who is to come into the world" (John 6:14). It also explains two other references in John in which the people wonder if some prominent figure might not be that "prophet" (1:21; 7:40).

Moreover, the people who had witnessed the miracle also knew of other verses that promised a certain measure of material prosperity to be provided by the Messiah during the days of his earthly rule. In fact, in Psalm 132:15 there is a promise that the Messiah would provide bread for the hungry. It says, "I will bless her with abundant provisions; her poor will I satisfy with food."

The people looked at these promises, filtering them through their own desires and prejudices, and then concluded, "Jesus is the Messiah. He is the One whom we should make king." The only difficulty was that they did not know the Scriptures as well as they should have known them and so made a big mistake. They knew that the Messiah was to be a great prophet. They knew that he was to be a great king. But they had failed to see that in between being a great prophet and a great king Jesus also had to be a great priest. In this role he was to offer up himself for the sins of the people. Jesus was a prophet, of course. He was speaking for God the Father. He would one day be king. We rightly sing:

> Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
> Does his successive journeys run;

His kingdom stretch from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more.

But before Jesus could be king he had to die. It was necessary for him to give his life "a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45).

Jesus knew these truths. He knew the Scriptures. Therefore, he did not allow the enthusiasm of the people based on the physical miracle to deter him from the proper path. We can apply this by saying that you and I must know Scripture well also if we are not to allow spiritual success to succeed in turning us away from God to our own plans and devices.

A Selfish Reaction

We need to say, too, that the reaction of the people to Christ's miracle was not altogether noble, even though it was partially scriptural. In fact, the more one thinks of the motives of the mob in wanting to make Jesus king, the less altruistic the reaction seems to be.

For one thing, the crowd was willing to support Jesus only so long as he gave them what they wanted. This means that their support was for selfish reasons. We see proof of this in their concern for more bread expressed later. We also see proof of it in the fact that within a short while another group of people just like this (perhaps even containing some of the same individuals, for these may have been on their way to the Passover) were crying out, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" There is such a thing as bought loyalty, and these people were expressing it.
They were grateful for the meal. But their gratitude was that kind of gratitude referred to by Samuel Johnson, who defined it as "a lively sense of favours still to come."

When we begin to think along these lines the attitude of the mob repels us. But are we so very different? William Barclay writes at this point in his commentary, "When we want comfort in sorrow, when we want strength in difficulty, when we want peace in turmoil, when we want help when life has got us down, there is no one so wonderful as Jesus. Then we talk to Him and walk with Him and open our hearts to Him.

But when He comes to us with some stern demand for sacrifice, with some challenge to effort, with the offer of some cross, then we will have nothing to do with Him. When we examine our hearts, it may be that we will find that we too love Jesus for what we can get out of Him, and when He comes to us with His great challenges and demands we too grow lukewarm, and even resentful and hostile to this disturbing and demanding Christ."

This is one reason why the Bible speaks so plainly of the need to deny self and selfish desires as a Christian. Many verses speak along these lines, often using the ideas of death, crucifixion with Christ, and denial. For instance, Romans 6:4 says that we are to be "buried with him through baptism into death." Two verses farther on we read, "For we know that our old self was crucified with him so that the body of sin might be rendered powerless, that we should no longer be slaves to sin" (v. 6). The first part of Galatians 2:20 declares, "I have been crucified with Christ." In Galatians 6:14 Paul writes, "May I never boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world." Along with the message of death and denial there is also the message of resurrection and fulfillment. But, still, denial comes first. There must be a death to self before there can be an abundance of spiritual blessing.

What does it mean that we are to die to self? What does it mean that we are to be crucified with Jesus? Simply put, it means that we are to say no to anything that lies outside the will of God for our lives. This is true before conversion. We must say no to any plans we may have for earning God's favor and instead receive God's gift of eternal life in Christ. It also is true after our conversion, for the same principles that operated in our coming to Christ continue in the Christian life. We must say no to all our plans and personal desires (or at least be willing to say no) so that God's will rather than our own may be accomplished.

Here is an important question. I have said that we must say no or at least be willing to say no to anything that is contrary to the will of God in our lives. But how do we know when we have really said no? Our hearts and minds are subtle. It is easy to fool ourselves. How do we know when we have really said no to that which is contrary to the will of God in our lives? The answer is: When we have stopped complaining.

The Word of God has a good word for what we do when we really have not stopped complaining. It is the word "murmur." This is what the people of Israel did when they were in the wilderness and did not like what God was doing with them. It also is the word used by the ungrateful servants in Christ's parable about the householder. What is murmuring? Murmuring is expressing rebellion against something by mumbling under one's breath. It is called murmuring because that is what murmuring sounds like to anyone who is listening.

That is what we do with God. God tells us to do something, and the first thing we do is attempt to stare him down. We want to see if he really means it. After we find that he really does mean it, we murmur. And the reason we murmur is that we really do not want to do what he wants us to do. If you do that, then you are in the company of the great crowd who only supported Jesus when he gave them what they wanted. Grow up! Come to the point where you no longer murmur but say instead, "Yes, Lord, you know best." When you do that you will go away happy and fulfilled, because he does know best.

The Roman Yoke

There is also a second reason why the people were wrong in the particular kind of support they gave to Jesus: they wanted to use him. They wanted to use him instead of allowing him to use them and mold them into the kind of people he wanted them to be.

This is understandable, of course. The people had a great problem in their day. It was the occupation of their country by the Roman forces. Actually, this was not as bad as they probably imagined it was. For one thing, the Romans brought a measure of law and civilization. They built good roads and buildings. There really was such a thing as the Roman peace, and many of the conquered nations recognized this. However, the Jews did not. They were a fiercely independent people. Jews chaffed under this Roman yoke, and that which they most desired to have happen in their lifetime was to have the Roman yoke thrown off. Suddenly there was this unusual man Jesus. He had miraculous power. So they must have said something like this to themselves, "Wouldn't it be wonderful if we could get him on our side and get him to help us drive out the Romans?"

It is clear that the desire of this crowd was to make use of Jesus, far more than to be used by him. But again, are we really very different, many of us?

I think there are several ways in which we try to use the Lord Jesus Christ. One obvious example is the attempt to justify prejudice by appealing to the Scriptures. At times this has taken the totally unsupportable position that the African American race is descended from Ham, that Ham was placed under a curse by God, and that this therefore justifies any attempts to subject the African American to slavery. This is unbiblical, dishonest, and mean. Yet it has been done. It is a clear case of attempting to use Christ or use the Bible for wicked ends.

A second example is in the area of politics. Politicians love to quote the Bible. They quote it in support of any program they desire. Probably it is not even too cynical to suggest that as a rule they develop their programs first and get their supporting quotations second. There is no political program so ill-conceived that it cannot be justified by someone at some point by an appeal to Jesus Christ or biblical authority.

Finally, we use the Lord Jesus Christ to justify the American way of life. Do not misunderstand me here. I do not want to downplay America. We have been greatly blessed by God in this land. We probably have had a higher percentage of Christian people in America than in any other land at any period of history, with the possible exception of England under Cromwell or during the Wesleyan revivals. This has produced real advantages. Yet it also is true that today there is much that is not only non-Christian but even anti-Christian at all levels of our society and national life. The Lord Jesus Christ cannot be used to justify these things. He does not justify all that big business or labor does. He does not lend his support to Madison Avenue. You cannot quote Jesus in your pursuit of the second car, the second home, the lavish vacation, the indulgence of yourself in leisure time, and many other things that some consider their right. Some of these things may be God's gift to you. But if you are pursuing these things rather than pursuing God, spiritual growth, and advance in his plan for your life, if you are quoting the Bible as support of your inverted value system, then you are merely doing what the people who were fed by Jesus did. You are using him rather than allowing him to use you and mold you into the kind of person he would have you be.

Billions of Christs

What does Jesus want you to be? One answer to that question is from the eighth chapter of Romans in which God's purpose in calling an individual to himself is spelled out. It says, "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers" (8:29). What is the purpose? It is that each one who has been called by God to faith in Jesus Christ might become like Christ so that—I say it reverently—eventually there might be many billions of Christs where there was only one before. The wonderful thing is that this can be done in us whatever our situation in life, whether we are rich or poor, educated or uneducated, black or white, male or female, or whatever it may be.

Moreover, it is only when we allow Jesus Christ to do that in us that we achieve any importance. If we take God and attempt to use him to justify what we want to do, all we succeed in doing is making Christianity petty. It becomes bounded by our own limited horizons. But if we allow God to use us, then no matter how insignificant we may seem as the world looks at things, we become important spiritually. For the Lord Jesus Christ himself is seen in the conduct of his followers.

Chapter 75.
The Fifth Miracle

John 6:16-21

If you have ever been to the Near East—to Turkey, Egypt, Lebanon, or Syria—you may have seen the oriental silversmiths working in the great bazaars. They work with coins that have been given to them by Western tourists, melting them down, and then forming them into small pieces of jewelry. Eventually they sell them back to any of the tourists who will buy them. This is done in a primitive way. Generally there is a small furnace over which sits a pot containing the molten silver. The coin is dropped in and melted. Every so often the silversmith goes over to the pot of silver, looks into it, scrapes off a bit of the dross that has collected, and then returns to his work. After a while he looks in, finds that the silver is ready, and begins to form it.

"Why do you constantly look into the silver?" we might ask.

The silversmith would answer, "I look into the silver until I find that the dross is all gone and the silver purified; I know when the dross is gone, because I can see myself reflected in the silver as in a fine mirror."

Here is the explanation of that wonderful passage in Malachi in which God tells us that he shall sit like a "refiner and purifier of silver," and of why Christians are so often called upon to go through the fires and testings of this life. God wants to make us like the Lord Jesus Christ. He does it by working to remove the dross of our lives, until his image is reflected in us for the world to see. The Bible tells us, "The Lord disciplines those he loves, and he punishes everyone he accepts as a son" (Heb. 12:6). This principle is illustrated in the story now before us.

The Storm

In the sixth chapter of John we are told that after the multitude who had been fed with the loaves and fish in Galilee had tried to make Jesus king, Jesus slipped away from them. He went up into a mountain alone to pray. We do not know how long he was gone. But the day wore on, and the disciples eventually went down to the Sea of Galilee and got into a boat in order to sail back to Capernaum. We must not think that they were rude in doing this, still less that they had forgotten

Jesus, for Mark in his account of the incident tells us that Jesus had instructed them to go home (Mark 6:45). This is the first great fact of the story, for it means that Jesus himself had sent them across the lake by boat knowing full well what was to happen.

The night came on and with the night a great storm. This was a wind storm, as we can tell from the story, the kind that comes up quickly on the Sea of Galilee. Mark and Matthew tell us that the wind was against them. John adds that "a strong wind was blowing and the waters grew rough" (v. 18). This storm was dangerous. Besides this it made rowing difficult, for they rowed into the fourth watch of the night. That is, they began at dusk and rowed until approximately 3:00 A.M. or dawn.

I wonder what the disciples were thinking about as they rowed their boat through the storm for those six or seven dangerous hours. They were worried, no doubt. But did they ever think of Jesus and of his power to help them? Did they realize that even then they were in his care?

They should have recognized this, of course. In fact, it is even evident that Jesus sent them into the storm to teach them this lesson and to help their faith grow. For one thing, they had just witnessed Christ's care in the feeding of the multitudes. Here were at least five thousand people, many of whom Jesus and the disciples undoubtedly did not even know personally. Yet Jesus cared for them and fed them. Do you suppose that the disciples sensed that Jesus was able to care for them too? Did they trust him? Or did they do what we sometimes do—assume that this situation was different, that the power of Jesus was limited, or that he did not know of their predicament? The miracle of the multiplication of the loaves and fish should have taught them that Jesus did know, that his power was adequate, and that he did care.

For another thing, the disciples had already witnessed the power of the Lord Jesus Christ to calm troubled waters. This particular story from an earlier period in Christ's ministry is not told in John's Gospel, but Matthew, Mark, and Luke all record it (Matt. 8:23-27; Mark 4:35-41; Luke 8:22-25), indicating that it took place before the feeding of the multitude in Galilee. Sometime before the multiplying of the loaves, Jesus and his disciples had been in Galilee and had wished to cross from the more settled western shore of the Sea of Tiberias to the eastern shore inhabited by the Gadarenes. Jesus was exhausted from his preaching and fell asleep in the rear of the boat. A storm arose. The boat began to fill with water. The disciples feared that they would be drowned. They woke Jesus up crying, "Master, don't you care that we are about to perish? "Jesus arose and then quietly calmed the sea. He asked them, "Why are you so fearful? How is it that you have such small faith?"

Did the disciples remember this in the midst of the new storm as once again they found themselves rowing across the Sea of Galilee? Did they trust Christ to protect them? Or did they argue, as we do, that this time Jesus was not actually with them and could do nothing?

A thought that I find amusing has sometimes occurred to me as I have read this story. A few verses before this we are told that the disciples had collected twelve baskets of food left over from the feeding. What happened to these twelve baskets? I find it difficult to imagine that they threw the bread away after just having taken pains to gather the fragments up. The disciples could have taken the fragments with them. And in that case evidence of Jesus' supernatural ability and power would have been under their very noses as they rowed through the tempest.

I am not sure that there is a certain answer to be given to the question of whether the disciples had learned to trust Jesus or else were fearful, but as I read the story and contrast it with the earlier incident I sense that their faith had grown. In the earlier account we are told they were fearful. In this account, even though they were frightened when Jesus came walking on the water (they thought he was a ghost), we are not told that they were frightened by the storm. We are told only that they kept rowing.

Whatever the case, at length Jesus came toward them. This is the point at which Peter asked permission to walk toward him and did so for a time, although John omits this part of the experience. Jesus said, "It is I; don't be afraid." After this, John tells us, they were immediately at the land to which they went.

Growth of Faith

What did the disciples learn through this experience? It was a kind of testing—a trial by water if you will. It proved that, on the basis of their former experience, they had learned to trust Jesus a bit more. But what did they learn this time? What did they learn in this experience? I believe they learned at least three things, all of which are highlighted in the various accounts of the story. First, they learned that, although they had not been aware of it, Jesus was watching. He knew what they were going through. Probably he told them this afterward, for Mark explains that when he was up on the mountain alone "he saw the disciples straining at the oars" (Mark 6:48). This is understandable when we remember that these events took place at the time of the Passover, when there was always a full moon, and that it was a windstorm, rather than a rainstorm with clouds, that churned the water.

Have the experiences through which you have gone taught you that Jesus is watching you and knows your circumstances? He does not make things too easy for any of us. He knows that muscles that are never used grow flabby. We must row in rough weather sometimes. There is work to be done. But do we know, even as we do the work, that Jesus' eye is upon us?

This is true in one sense for all men. It is one truth involved in the doctrine of the immanence of God. The immanence of God means quite simply that God is here. We can say that God is everywhere, and this is right too. But it is far more personal to say that God is where we are. He is here, wherever you or I may be. Take these examples. Adam sinned and in his panic of guilt tried to do the impossible: he tried to hide from God. At one time David must have had wild thoughts of trying to escape from God, for he wrote. "Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence?" He then proceeded to celebrate the glory of the divine immanence. "If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there. If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast" (Ps. 139:7-10). Solomon exclaimed, "But will God really dwell on earth? The heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27). Paul assured the Athenians that God "is not far from each one of us. 'For in him we live and move and have our being'" (Acts 17:27-28).

If it is true that God is not far from anyone, that he sees what we do and knows all about us, how much more true it is that Jesus sees his own followers and knows what they are facing in all their circumstances! He has told us that not "a sparrow" falls to the ground without his knowledge and that the hairs of our head are "all numbered" (Matt. 10:29-31). He said, "And surely I will be with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:20). Do you realize that he is with you? Do you sense that his eye is upon you as it was upon the disciples?

The second truth the disciples learned is that Jesus helps. Jesus watches us, it is true. But he does not watch with some kind of serene, unmoved detachment. He watches us in order to help. And he does help—at all times, of course, but particularly when life becomes too burdensome for us and when spiritual victory seems beyond our grasp.

At this point in his commentary William Barclay tells the story of a teacher in a little country school in England. She had told this story to the children; and she must have told it well, for the children obviously got the point. Some short time afterward there was a great snowstorm. The teacher had the job of getting the children home. Sometimes she practically had to drag them through the drifts. It was tiring. Finally, when they were nearly exhausted with the struggle, she overheard one of the youngest children say in his best British manner, half to himself,

"We could be doing with that chap Jesus here now." Well, we could always be doing with Jesus and we never, no matter how difficult the circumstances, have to do without him.

Unfortunately, we often do without him, because we do not wait for his help or listen to his voice. In Let Me Illustrate, a collection of stories and illustrations from the writings of Donald Grey Barnhouse, there is a story of a man who owned an icehouse. One day he lost a fine watch in the sawdust. He offered a reward to anyone who would find it; and many went through the sawdust with rakes searching for the timepiece. No one could find the watch. Finally, when the searchers left the building for lunch, a small boy went into the icehouse. A few minutes later he came out with the watch. The men asked how he had found it, and he replied, "I just lay down in the sawdust and listened. Finally, I heard the watch ticking." Dr. Barnhouse then concludes, "Some of you have lost more than a watch. If you will be very still and listen quietly, the Lord will speak to you and show you just where you lost the power and victory which you so sorely miss."

Finally, the disciples learned that Jesus was also able to bring them home. He not only helped; he got them to the place they were going. John indicates this aspect of the story by reporting, "Then they were willing to take him into the boat, and immediately the boat reached the shore where they were heading" (v.21).

Jesus is able also to get you where you are going. Or, to put it more correctly, he is able to get you to the place to which he has called you or to which you are sent. This is true in life. If he has called you to be a missionary, he will see that you become one whatever the difficulties. If he has called you to a life of quiet witness in a drab undesirable spot, he will give you strength to make your witness there. He will help you in the shop, the home, the church, or wherever you may be.

Moreover, he also will see you safely through this life to your final home in heaven. I do not know whether John had this meaning in mind as he recorded this story. He could have, for he obviously saw levels of spiritual truth in each of the miracles he narrates. Still, whether or not

John himself was thinking of this, what could be more descriptive of our age than that which John tells us was true of the evening in which the disciples crossed the lake—a stormy sea, a strong wind, a dark night? This we face. At times we cannot even see where we are headed. But we shall see Jesus one day, and he himself will guide us into port.

The psalmist says, "Commit your way to the LORD; trust in him and he will do this" (Ps. 37:5).

Becoming a Christian

But then, finally, I may be speaking to someone who has never trusted in Jesus Christ and who is saying, "Yes, it is all very well to speak to Christians like that. I suppose that they can know where they are going. But I do not know where I am going. I am not a Christian, and I do not know how to become one."

If you are saying that, let me explain the matter for you. In order to become a Christian there are two things you must believe and one thing you must do. First, you must believe on the authority of God's Word that you cannot help yourself spiritually. You can help yourself in this life. You can gain praise from others for your character or good works, but none of this will satisfy God. You are a sinner and are therefore as helpless as the disciples were in the midst of the storm.

Second, you must believe that Jesus is able to do what you cannot do. You cannot save yourself, but he can save you. You cannot satisfy God by means of your own character, but Jesus has already satisfied him and God is willing to place his character to your account. Jesus died for you to remove your sin. He rose so that you might know that God is satisfied with what Jesus has done on your behalf forever.

Finally, you must commit yourself to him. The Bible speaks of this in different ways, but in each case it is clear that it involves an act of our will. It says that we are to believe in Jesus, which means that we are to place ourselves in his hands. It says that we are to receive him, which means that we are to invite him into our lives. Will you do that? Will you admit your sin, believe that he is able to save you, and then commit your life into his keeping. When you do that you will learn that he came not merely to save you from the guilt of your sins but also to take charge of your life. Why not hand yourself over to him today? Say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I give myself to you—body, soul, and spirit. I want you to take charge of my life." It is a wise choice, for he is able to keep and bless all those who put their trust in him.

Chapter 76.
The Search

John 6:22-27

Among the most famous sayings of the early church fathers is this one by Saint Augustine:
"Thou hast formed us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find their rest in Thee." This universal restlessness of the soul is the cause of that apparent search for God that is to be found in most individuals and races. What the saying does not point out is that not every way of seeking him is correct.

The doctrine of prevenient grace means that before someone can seek after God, God must have first of all sought that person. Speaking of man in his natural state, the Bible says "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God" (Rom. 3:10-11). It also says, "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). This means that before someone can begin to think even one right thought about God or begin to desire him, God must first have done a work of enlightenment in that person's heart by means of the Holy Spirit. What also needs to be said, however, is that this prevenient and gracious work of the Holy Spirit should have its natural outcome in our thereafter following hard after God. We seek because we already have been found.

But how do we seek God? Do we do it in a way that will inevitably result in our finding him? Or do we seek selfishly and therefore wrongly? The following story will help us to answer that question for our own lives.

Seeking for Jesus

Jesus had crossed the Sea of Galilee by night in order to join the disciples in Capernaum. The people whom he had fed from the five loaves and two fish the day before saw in the morning light that Jesus was no longer in the area in which the miracle had been done. So they began to look for him. Eventually they made their way either around or across the lake and found him at Capernaum.

The reference to the boats in John's story is unclear. Generally commentators interpret the verses to mean that the crowd recalled that there had been but one boat the previous night—the other boats must have been driven in during the night by the storm—and that Jesus had not sailed away with the disciples. However, it also is possible that John means to say that there was only one boat available to Jesus and that he had not entered that. Or again, that only one boat was left on the shore and that Jesus was not in it, nor had he sailed in any of the others. Whatever the meaning of these references, the main point is obviously that the people could imagine no way by which Jesus had crossed the lake, for they could not have imagined that he had walked over it. So when they finally found him they came to him with the question, "Rabbi, how and when did you get here?"

Jesus' reply was to ignore the question and instead deal with the manner of their seeking. He did not praise them. Instead he replied, "I tell you the truth, you are looking for me, not because you saw miraculous signs but because you ate the loaves and had your fill. Do not work for food that spoils but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give you. On him has the Father placed his seal of approval" (vv. 26-27). Here was a sharp unveiling of the crowd's unworthy motives in seeking Jesus. But is it not true that these same motives operate in our own lives, even at times when we think we are most spiritual?

God or Man?

Let me outline what I mean in slightly more precise terms. First, although the crowd was obviously seeking Jesus in one sense, at the same time it is obvious that the minds of the individuals were on themselves. We see that clearly in the matter of the food, which Jesus mentions. We must remember that the crowd had been hungry when they were with Jesus the night before. He had fed them so that they had had all they wanted. The twelve baskets of leftovers are evidence of the fact that they had been fully satisfied. Still, the night had gone by and now part of the morning. It was time for a late breakfast or lunch; they were hungry again. Obviously their minds were primarily on their stomachs as they sought him.

Do you do that when you seek Jesus? Do you come with your mind filled, not so much with Jesus and his all-surpassing worth, but with your needs or with what you imagine your needs to be?

I am convinced that in our day in American Christianity there is a lamentable tendency to focus on human need rather than on God himself. I am equally convinced that this is the worst possible way to actually have the need met and to achieve a healthy Christianity. I know that someone will say, "But how can that be? Isn't it true that people do have needs?" The answer is: Yes, they do. "And isn't it true that Jesus is the answer to those needs?" The reply is: Yes, he is. "Shouldn't we therefore preach Jesus Christ as the answer to people's needs?" The only proper reply is: Yes, we should. "Well, then, what is wrong?" What is wrong is that it is tragically possible to so focus on our needs that we are actually focusing on ourselves rather than on Jesus, and so never get to the solutions to our problems that Jesus wants to bring. This occurs to different degrees in different people, of course. But I know of one case, a woman who has had a great deal of psychiatric counseling, in which there is no longer even a real desire to get better. She will talk endlessly about her problems. But she will almost come apart psychologically at any suggestion that God might have an answer that would bring her problems to an end.

Here is another example. I know of a small group Bible study in which the people involved think mainly of their problems. It is a kind of therapy group in which each one listens to the problems of the others so that the others will listen to him. There is almost a competition in problems. Who has the worst problem? Who should get the most sympathy? I do not want to be too harsh at this point, for I believe that it is always good (in a relative way) to get things out in the open. Nevertheless, the solutions are in Christ and not in our ability to articulate problems.

May I say it even more strongly? I am convinced that one of the major steps to achieving good spiritual mental health is getting your mind off yourself entirely and on the Lord instead. The author of an old English classic, The Cloud of Unknowing, was aware of this. He wrote in his volume, "Lift up thine heart unto God with a meek stirring of love; and mean Himself, and none of His goods. And thereto, look thee loath to think on aught but God Himself. So that nought work in thy wit, nor in thy will, but only God Himself. This is the work of the soul that most pleaseth God."

Possessions

There was also a second thing that these people were doing in their search for Jesus and for which they were rebuked. It is related to the first. They had their minds on material things. The point of the miracle —which you will recall from our earlier study of miracles—was to point their minds to Jesus. He had fed them, but they were to see from the miracle that he was that spiritual bread who alone could satisfy the inner spiritual hunger of the soul. Instead they had their minds on material things alone and so missed the greater blessing.

Even before God created man he created a world full of varied and useful things for people to enjoy. These objects were part of God's plan. But it has fallen out since man's rebellion that those gifts that were for man's happiness today constitute what A. W. Tozer called "a potential source of ruin for the soul." So we find our minds filled with "things" and discover that we often come to God only when our possessions are threatened or when we want more.

It is not at all difficult to find examples of those who, although believers in God and followers of him, nevertheless allow the love of possessions to obscure their awareness of God and limit their growth. Achan is one of whom this was true. He was a soldier in the army of Israel that fought at Jericho. The spoil of that battle was to be dedicated to God, but Achan saw and took for himself a beautiful Babylonian garment, twenty pieces of silver, and a bar of gold. Because of his sin Israel lost her next battle at Ai, and Achan and his family were brought out into the open and judged. Solomon was a wise man in most respects, but he was not wise in regard to wealth and women, both of which ruined his spiritual life. Ananias and Sapphira lied to the Lord about money and were judged for it. Paul wrote of Demas, who "because he loved this world, has deserted me." Unfortunately, this is true to a large degree in our own century.

But is possessing things wrong for a Christian? No, it is not, even though there have been those who have taught this and in some cases teach it today. There is nothing wrong with the right of private property. There is nothing wrong with a Christian's possessing a home, a car, insurance policies, stocks and bonds, even more than one of these things. What is wrong, if there is a wrong in any individual case, is seeking these things to the exclusion of seeking after God, or seeking them more than God.

It is all a question of who or what is in control. I am assuming that you have some possessions. Well, do you control them? Or do they control you? What your attitude should be may be illustrated from a dramatic event in the life of Abraham.

Abraham was a very old man when his son Isaac was born, and as the years went by he undoubtedly came to love Isaac with a great and possessing love. He loved him several times over—because he was the son of his old age, because he was the son of the promise. Perhaps the time came when this possession— even, let us note, a God-given possession—came dangerously close to overshadowing the place that God alone should have occupied in the aging patriarch's heart. At this point God stepped in with the command, "Take your son, your only son Isaac, whom you love, and go to the region of Moriah. Sacrifice him there as a burnt offering on one of the mountains I will tell you about" (Gen. 22:2).

The author of the Book of Genesis does not give us the details of the struggle that must have gone on in the heart of this sublime old man that night, but we can imagine what some of them were. How could he kill Isaac, whom he loved? It would be far better were he himself to die in Isaac's place. Besides this, Isaac was the promised son through whom Abraham was to become a great nation and the Messiah was to come. How could God fulfill the promises if Isaac were to die? At last Abraham came to a solution and made up his mind. He would do as God had directed. He would kill Isaac. He would lose him. But he would trust God to raise him up from the dead. This is what the author of Hebrews indicates when he writes that Abraham "offered Isaac as a sacrifice.... even though God had said to him, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead, and figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death" (Heb. 11:17-19).

God let Abraham go through with his plan up to the point where the knife was about to be plunged into the boy. But then he stopped Abraham—it was only a test, God said—and reiterated the promises. How glad Abraham was! He did not have to kill his son! He had him back! But God was glad too, for Abraham would no longer possess Isaac as he had previously. Now God would be all to Abraham.

One commentator writes on this story: "I have said that Abraham possessed nothing. Yet was not this poor man rich? Everything he had owned before was his still to enjoy: sheep, camels, herds, and goods of every sort. He had also his wife and his friends, and best of all he had his son Isaac safe by his side. He had everything, but he possessed nothing. There is the spiritual secret. There is the sweet theology of the heart which can be learned only in the school of renunciation." This writer adds, "The books on systematic theology overlook this, but the wise will understand."

Do you understand? It is not our possessions that are wrong but our single-minded possession of our possessions. Do you seek for things? Or do you seek for God? How sad it would be if those things that are destined to perish should keep you from him who is eternal.

Halfhearted Seeking

Finally, there is a third error that characterized this seeking of the Galilean crowd. They came seeking, but they really did not seek wholeheartedly. What happened when Jesus refused to feed them physically the second time? I assume that most of them went home for lunch and are not heard from again in the narrative. Whatever the case, we know that after his speech in the synagogue "many of his disciples turned back and no longer followed him" (v. 66). Do you seek halfheartedly and then get discouraged when your prayer or Bible study is not all you had hoped it would be? Do you lose interest when you find that Jesus wants to lead you in a way that does not at first appeal to you? Or do you press on?

David explained some of his difficulties in Psalm 27. But he declared with determination, "My heart says of you, 'Seek his face!' Your face, LORD, will I seek" (27:8).

What, then, do we have to do to seek God properly and successfully? First, we must seek him where he alone can be found—in Jesus Christ. This is the point of Christ's reference to himself in the verse from the story which I cited earlier. Jesus said, "On him [meaning himself] God the Father has placed his seal of approval." What does that mean? In Jesus' day a seal on a document was the equivalent of a signature. It authenticated the document. It was that by which men knew that the document was the real thing and no forgery. It is in much the same sense that God has authenticated Jesus Christ by means of his life, character, teaching, miracles, and above all by the resurrection from the dead. This is the One in whom God is to be seen and found. Have you come to God in Jesus? He said, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6).

Second, you must come yourself. No one else can come for you, not even a Bible teacher through whom you may even receive great blessing. Do you spend time praying—by yourself? Do you study the Bible? Do you spend time meditating on spiritual things? The Lord Jesus Christ is speaking to individuals when he declares, "Here I am! I stand at the door and knock. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will go in and eat with him, and he with me" (Rev. 3:20).

Finally, you must come wholeheartedly. Jesus said, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled" (Matt. 5:6). He was not speaking of the kind of hunger and thirst we know when he said this. The hunger and thirst we know hardly deserves to be called by that name. He was speaking of the hunger of people who seldom have enough to eat and of that thirst for water without which the thirsting man will die. He was saying that we are to hunger after him as a starving man hungers for bread and to thirst after him as a dying man thirsts after water. Do we do that? If we really would, it is hard to estimate how rich in the knowledge and fruitfulness of God we would be.

Chapter 77.
A Golden Sentence

John 6:28-29

It is a great joy in the study of literature or history to discover a saying that seems to sum up a whole personality or a movement. Caesar supplied us with one of these sayings in his often quoted report on a military encounter in Gaul: "Veni, vidi, via" (I came, I saw, I conquered). Winston Churchill did the same in England during the years of World War II. Who can forget his offer to the British people shortly after war had been declared against Germany? He said that he had not come to offer England an easy time or an easy victory but, rather, "Blood, toil, sweat and tears." Later, after Hitler had failed to break the English spirit through the bombing of London, Churchill joked about Hitler's promise to wring England's neck as if she were a chicken. "Some chicken," said Churchill. Then, after thunderous applause, "Some neck!"

Sentences like these are golden sentences, for they vividly capture a personality, a theme, or a spirited moment of world history. In another sense, however, even such striking statements seem less than totally gripping when placed alongside the truly golden sentences of the Word of God.

What are these sentences? You can think of many of them. John 3:16 —"For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." Philippians 4:19—"And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" Psalm 23:1—"The LORD is my shepherd." I believe that our text, found in the sixth chapter of John, verse 29, is another. The crowd that had witnessed the miracle of the multiplication of the loaves and fish had crossed the Sea of Galilee to find Jesus in Capernaum and had asked him, "What must we do to do the works God requires?" It was a question that many people are asking. It was even a great question, though the answer was greater. Jesus replied in words that every human being on the earth should hear, read, and memorize: "The work of God is this: to believe in the one he has sent."

Faith or Works

In some ways it is almost unbelievable that the crowd should have asked this question in view of what Jesus had been telling them. He had said, "Do not work for food that spoils, but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give to you" (v. 27). Jesus had been speaking of a gift, but they had not grasped his meaning. Instead, they replied as the natural human mind, which is against God, always does; they replied that they wanted to do something to earn it.

It is always thus. Arthur W. Pink notes in his commentary: "It was thus with the woman at the well: until divine grace completed its work within her, she knew not the 'gift of God' (John 4:10). It was the same with the rich young ruler: 'Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?' (Luke 18:18). It was the same with the stricken Jews on the Day of Pentecost: 'Men and brethren, what shall we do?' (Acts 2:37). It was the same with the Philippian jailer: 'Sirs, what must I do to be saved?' (Acts 16:30). So it was with the prodigal son—'Make me as one of thy hired servants' (one who works for what he receives) was his thought (Luke 15:19)." None of those involved in these illustrations knew precisely what they must do or thought they must do, but they were certain that they had to do something.

The human mind is always flattered when it is conscious of doing something for God. What is more, for his doings man considers himself entitled to a reward. How pleased we should all be if we could only earn salvation! In that case we would have succeeded in bringing God into the humbling position of being in debt to us, and we would love it. But this is not the way of salvation.

What is the way? Jesus shows the way in our sentence: "The work of God is this: to believe in the one he has sent." It is not what we can do for God but rather what God has already done for us. All that is required of us is that we believe it. The Philippian jailer had asked Paul, "What must I do to be saved?" It was the question of the crowd that had sought Jesus. Paul answered just as Jesus had done before him: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved" (Acts 16:31). Jesus is the One whom God has sent into the world to meet our deepest need. "The work of God" is to "believe" on him. What God requires of us is that we give up trying to please him by our own efforts and instead commit ourselves into the hands of our Savior.

Human Works

The burden of this study must obviously be upon what it means to commit oneself into the hands of the Savior. But before dealing with that it is necessary to deal just a bit further with the matter of human works, for it is these much more than the Savior that men would like to trust.

To begin with, someone might well ask the question, "But is it possible to enter heaven without good works?" The answer to the question is no. You cannot enter heaven without good character. But since we are talking about good works or character we must go on to the next question and ask, "But how good must that character be?" The answer is that your works must be without flaw. They must be perfect; you must be perfect. Clearly, nothing less than perfection could satisfy God. But do you have perfect character? Of course not! No one is perfect. Then, where can you get it? The answer is: Only from God. God offers you the perfect character of the Lord Jesus Christ. This will stand to your account just as the money of a rich man would stand to your account were it deposited in your account in your bank. Moreover, God will credit your sins to Jesus, who has died for them. God asks that you believe this, that you accept what Jesus has done.

What are you trusting rather than the Lord Jesus Christ? Is it rites and ceremonies? Some people think that their baptism will save them. But these are signs of what God has already done, not means of salvation. Baptize the devil, if you will, but his end will still be the lake of fire. Some people trust their humanitarian efforts. They give to the United Fund. They help the poor. But these things, while good in themselves, will not satisfy the righteous demands of a holy God in the day of his judgment. Then, what must you do? The answer is that you must do nothing—you can do nothing—except believe on the Lord Jesus.

I realize that no one will ever abandon his or her own attempts at righteousness until convinced that all human efforts are worthless. All must see that they fall short of God's perfect demands. On the other hand, when the worthlessness of human works in the area of satisfying

God is revealed to a person by the Holy Spirit, then, I am convinced, he can lay hold on the Lord Jesus Christ in joy for his salvation.

"Put That on My Account"

I am now going to return to what it means to believe on the Lord Jesus. But I am going to do so by means of a story. It is a story from one of the short books of the Bible—Philemon.

Philemon was a rich man who lived in the city of Colosse. We know that he was rich because it was in his house that the Christians of Colosse were meeting. Besides, he had at least one slave (and probably more). Philemon had been converted through the ministry of Paul, though probably not at Colosse, since there are verses in Paul's letter to the Colossians that indicate that he had never been there. Since Paul had worked for a long time at Ephesus, and Colosse was nearby, it may be that Philemon had met Paul in Ephesus while he was on a business trip. Whatever the case, Philemon returned to Colosse as a Christian.

Time passed, and the day came when one of Philemon's slaves, a man named Onesimus, ran away. There is no evidence that Philemon pursued Onesimus. But this was still a serious matter. The law had been broken. And the law in the matter of a runaway slave (if accused by his master) proscribed death. Moreover, we know from Paul's letter that Onesimus had robbed Philemon before going. On these funds he probably made his way the great distance from Colosse to Rome.

We are told nothing about Onesimus's life in Rome, but few people would doubt that he had a good time, enjoying life to the full. He probably was something like the prodigal son who, we are told, "squandered his wealth on wild living." Onesimus probably did not have a thought for God. He had rejected that when he had turned his back on Philemon. But God had his eye on Onesimus and eventually brought him into contact with Paul, the very man through whom his master had been converted. How did he meet Paul? We do not know. Paul was in prison, so perhaps Onesimus had been arrested and met Paul in prison. God uses rough ways at times in dealing with those who run from him. But whatever the means, Onesimus met Paul and was converted.

After Onesimus's conversion we can be sure that Paul continued to instruct him in the faith. So I can imagine the day when, under the conviction of the Holy Spirit and in the light of the Word, Onesimus unburdened his conscience. "I need your advice, Paul," he might have said. Then the story came out—the theft, the flight, the loose living, the fear of capture, and now the seemingly impossible task of making right a great wrong. "I feel I ought to go back in accordance with the law and make right what I have done wrong. But I have no money to repay the loss. And returning might even mean my arrest and execution. What should I do?"

Paul replied—in what is surely one of the great examples of the love of Christ within the life of a redeemed sinner—that he would become surety for Onesimus. He would permit Philemon to charge any debt that Onesimus might have incurred to his own account. Moreover, he would write a letter to Philemon that would plead Onesimus's case.

What a picture we have as we imagine Onesimus hurrying back to Colosse with Paul's letter safely tucked into his belt. We can imagine Philemon standing at the gate of his beautiful Roman villa, looking down the road toward the heart of the city. Suddenly he looks up and exclaims, "Why, I believe I see that thief Onesimus coming! Oh, it couldn't be he! He wouldn't have the face to come back here after what he has done! But it does look like him. I'll wait and see." Probably Philemon is reasoning that, if it is Onesimus, it is because the money he stole is all gone and he is going to beg for pardon.

"Master! Master!" Onesimus cries.

"Well, it is Onesimus after all," says Philemon. "I'm surprised that you have the face to be seen around here again."

"Just read this," says Onesimus. He refuses to utter a word in his own behalf.

Philemon takes the letter, breaks the seal, opens the pages, and then slowly begins to read—Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ. "Why, this is from Paul!" says Philemon. "Have you seen him, Onesimus?" he asks eagerly of the returning slave.

"Yes, master, in Rome. It was in prison. He led me to Christ."

Philemon reads on—and Timothy our brother, to Philemon, our dear friend and fellow worker....
"How like Paul," he was thinking. And to Apphia our sister. "Come here, Apphia," Philemon must have called to his wife. "Here is a letter from Paul, from Rome. It seems that he is in prison."

Mrs. Philemon comes running and almost bumps into Onesimus. "Are you back?" she says in some surprise.

"Yes," says her husband, "but don't worry about that now. Onesimus has brought a letter from Paul, and first of all we must read it." Therefore, although in Christ I could be bold and order you to do what you ought to do, yet I appeal to you on the basis of love. I then, as Paul—an old man and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus—I appeal to you for my son Onesimus, who became my son while I was in chains. "He means he was converted," Philemon must have thought. "But I wonder. He would not be the first slave to try to put it over on someone by using religion."

Formerly he was useless to you. "That's an understatement, if ever I heard one."

But now he has become useful both to you and to me. "Perhaps!" I am sending him... back to you.

"Well," Philemon must have thought as he read through the letter, "Paul is certainly impressed with Onesimus, but I can hardly see how Onesimus could expect me to be. Not a word here about the robbery! Nothing about the wrongs that he did to me! Paul may believe that he is a Christian, but I will not believe it until the theft is out in the open and Onesimus admits his wrongdoing."

Philemon gets to the end of the letter, however, and there he finds this: If he has done you any wrong or owes you anything, charge it to me. I, Paul, am writing this with my own hand. I will pay it back—not to mention that you owe me your very self I suppose that in that moment, Philemon's heart was conquered. He knew what Paul was saying. What is more, he knew that Onesimus had confessed his sin and had returned on Paul's recommendation and with confidence in Paul and in his relationship to Philemon. Paul was becoming surety for Onesimus. Although old and in prison, Paul was offering to pay. Onesimus had trusted him. Who can doubt that at this point Philemon freely forgave Onesimus and received him as he would have received Paul?

A Pageant

The connection between this story, the failure of human works, and the need to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation is obvious. This is a pageant, if we may so understand it.

Philemon is playing the part of God the Father. Paul is Jesus Christ. You and I are Onesimus. What have we done? We have wronged God. We have stolen from him that which is rightly his—honor, worship, glory, obedience—and we have run from him in order to sin our fill. There is no chance of our ever being able to make up that which we owe, and beyond that there is the whole matter of forgiveness and of the good will of the Father.

What shall we do? Shall we trust to good works, moral reformation, ceremonies? None of these things will do. Instead we come to Christ and find him interceding on our behalf. "Father," he says, "this runaway slave has wronged you. He owes what he can never repay. But he believes in me. He has been changed. Therefore, I ask that you charge all that he has done to my account." Do you see that great picture of salvation? Will you come to God on the basis of that great offer of the Lord Jesus Christ? You can run farther, if you will. You can try to escape the consequences of your sin, if you wish—though you will not succeed. Or you can accept the work of the Lord Jesus Christ on your behalf and trust in him as your surety. If you look to yourself you may well tremble. But as you look to Jesus you will hear that still, quiet voice of the Holy Spirit that speaks comforting words on your behalf:

> Arise, my soul, arise! Shake off thy guilty fears; The bleeding sacrifice in my behalf appears: Before the throne my Surety stands— My name is written on his hands.

On this basis no charge shall ever be raised against you. And you will know that the true work of God is done when you believe on Jesus.

Chapter 78.
"I Am the Bread of Life"

John 6:30-35

In the early years of my ministry, when I was still doing graduate work, I had opportunity to study the Book of Amos in detail. I remember from those studies a passage that gripped me then and that still grips me whenever I remember it. Amos is speaking of a day when God's judgment will be such that there will be no one to preach true doctrine and when men and women will wander up and down and will not be able to find it. He casts the situation under the image of a famine and says, "'The days are coming,' declares the Sovereign LORD, 'when I will send a famine through the land—not a famine of food or a thirst for water, but a famine of hearing the words of the LORD. Men will stagger from sea to sea and wander from north to east, searching for the word of the LORD, but they will not find it'" (Amos 8:11-12).

This is a horrible prophecy. But in some ways it is even more horrible to have the Lord Jesus Christ, the bread of life, available (as he is today) and yet have men refuse to come to him. Men have great hunger—a hunger for truth, righteousness, peace, joy, spiritual satisfaction, and other things. Jesus is the answer to this hunger. Yet the tragedy is that men will not come to him.

Jesus showed the wisdom of coming when he told the people who had followed him to Capernaum in Galilee, "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" (6:35).

Manipulation

Jesus had been talking to people who had been present on the other side of the Sea of Galilee when he had multiplied the loaves and fish. They were interested in having the miracle repeated. They had been taught by their rabbis that when the Messiah would come he would duplicate the miracle of the giving of manna that had been given originally by Moses. Jesus was claiming to be the Messiah. They could see that. Why, then, should they not expect him to duplicate Moses' miracle, particularly that aspect of the miracle that had to do with his repeating it six times a week for the entire forty years of desert wandering?

The Jewish writings said, "You shall not find the manna in this age, but you shall find it in the age that is coming" (Midrash Mekilta on Exod. 16:25). "For whom has the manna been prepared? For the righteous in the age that is coming" (Midrash Tanchuma, Beshallach 21:66). "What did the first redeemer do? He brought down the manna. The last redeemer will also bring down manna" (Midrash Rabba on Eccles. 1:9).

No doubt the people had heard such sayings as these and had them in their minds. But as I study the story of this conversation it seems to me more and more that they were far less desirous of that age of messianic blessing than they were of a successful outcome to their efforts to manipulate Jesus into doing what they wanted. Manipulation! That is the real clue to their questions. Jesus had spoken of the fact that he was God's gift to men and that God desired men to believe in him. They replied, in effect, that they would not believe unless they received a sign. We find it hard to imagine how they could overlook the sign they already had received. But they were actually saying something like this, "We admit, Jesus, that you did a wonderful thing yesterday. But before we believe in you as the Messiah we want to see a real sign. What you did was interesting, but we are Jews and we cannot forget that when Moses fed the people he did so for forty years. We will believe in you if you can do what Moses did and feed us now."

The Lord Jesus Christ does not stoop to answer this type of arrogant question on the part of sinful men. Thus, he simply overlooked the suggestion and instead directed his remarks to the real, spiritual issue. He said two things about Moses. First, Moses did not give manna. God gave it. It was God's miracle. Second, the manna that was given was not the true bread from the true heaven. It was only earthly bread from a visible sky. He then turned away from the person of Moses entirely and instead pointed to himself as that true bread which alone satisfies the real hunger of the human soul.

"I am the bread of life!" This solemn saying is the first of seven such sayings in John's Gospel: "I am the bread of life" (6:35); "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5); "I am the gate" (10:7, 9); "I am the good shepherd" (10:11, 14); "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25); "I am the way and the truth and the life" (14:6); "I am the true vine" (15:1, 5). So we take this first saying, spoken in this significant context, and we look at it for what it teaches about Christ and our condition.

The Message

It is obvious that when the Lord Jesus Christ spoke of himself as the bread, he was using an image about which everybody knew. So we turn to what people knew about bread for his meaning. What is important about bread? The first answer is that bread is necessary for life. When I was in the process of preparing this chapter I asked the following question at the dining room table one evening as a number of us were gathered around: "What makes bread important?" This was the answer I received: "Bread is necessary for life." What is more, as we talked about it we saw that in Christ's day bread was even more essential than in our own time, for it was the only staple in most persons' diets.

Without bread, men died. If you see that, then you also see that Jesus was claiming to be the One whom men and women could not do without.

Are you trying to do without him? Are you going your way saying, "I'll take care of myself. I can get by. I live in an affluent age. I have a house, a car, plenty to eat, a good job, a wife, a family. I don't need Jesus"? What if everything in this entire life should go well for you, but you should lose your soul? Would that be a gain? Would you consider it a good bargain to do without Jesus forever?

You cannot do without him. You can manage after a fashion, for a time, but you cannot survive. In another of the "I am" sayings Jesus declared, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (14:6). He is the life. You will remain dead spiritually without him.

Second, bread is suited for everyone. Not everyone can eat everything. Some people can never eat sweets. Others cannot eat shellfish. Some cannot eat certain kinds of meat. The nursery rhyme says, "Jack Sprat could eat no fat; his wife could eat no lean." But bread is suited for everyone. In the same way, the Lord Jesus Christ is perfectly suited to the needs of all men. Sometimes people tell me, "Jesus may be all right for the kinds of people you talk to, but he is not for me." That is not at all uncommon. If a person is of more than average intelligence, he tends to think that Christ is only for the dull. If he is dull, he thinks that Christ is only for the intelligent. If he is sophisticated, he thinks that Jesus is only for the common people, and so on. But Jesus is for all. He is for you. He is the Savior of the world, and that includes the peasant as well as the king on his throne. Jesus Christ is great enough and glorious enough so that you will never exhaust him either in this life or in eternity. He has what you need. What is more, he knows you and he knows how to meet that need.

Our Daily Bread

Third, bread should be eaten daily. This brings us into a whole new area, the area of the Christian life. Everything before this has had to do with trusting Christ initially. But when a person trusts Christ as Savior this is hardly the end. Actually, it is the beginning, for it brings him into a living relationship with the Lord Jesus Christ in which he is to grow by feeding upon him day by day.

This point puts us in mind of that phrase in the Lord's Prayer that says, "Give us today our daily bread." There is a great emphasis upon the words "today" or "daily" in this prayer simply because by means of them the idea of a repeated fulfillment of a request occurs twice. The Lord's Prayer has only sixty-five words (seventy-two in Greek). So anything that is repeated twice is important.

But why is it important? For many years commentators on this prayer simply did not know the exact meaning of the Greek word that is translated "daily," for this is the only place where it occurs. They had a rough idea. The word is translated in our Bibles. Still, no one could be quite certain what precise shade of meaning to give to it. In fairly recent times, however, scholars have discovered a piece of Egyptian papyrus that seems to contain most of this word. It is part of an account book and contains the reading: "_ obol for epious—." The writing breaks off at this point. But the word epious seems to be the Greek word epiousios (daily) minus the last three letters. The reference seems to be to something like a daily ration.

Interestingly enough, this meaning now seems to be supported by a seemingly parallel inscription in Latin found at Pompeii. This, too, is a list of expenditures, and it contains the phrase "five assess for diaria" (a term based on the Latin word for "day"). Since both these phrases seem to be part of lists itemizing what we would call a day's supply of something for a person or group of persons, it seems right to take both words in the same sense and refer them to rations.

Put these two texts together—"Give us today our daily bread" and "I am the bread of life"—and think of the truths that emerge from them. One truth is that God cares for our bodies. The Lord's Prayer is certainly speaking of this. Unfortunately, there always have been some in the Christian church who have tried to minimize the importance of the body on the mistaken conviction that by doing so they were somehow becoming more spiritual. But that is not right. Christianity is the only religion in the world that takes the body with full seriousness. It teaches that God gave the body as well as the soul, and that a redemption of the body as well as a redemption of the soul is part of the divine plan. Therefore, it is right to pray for this world's needs, for food, homes, clothing, and other necessities. We have an illustration of the Lord's concern for physical needs in the fact that he fed the multitude.

On the other hand, there is also the truth that God is able and willing to provide for our spiritual needs, and this is far more important. We have spiritual needs as well as physical needs, though in our fallen state we may not be so conscious of them. Will we allow Jesus to satisfy those needs also? All we need to do is come to him, and come daily.

Tragically, many Christians allow the love of things to intrude between themselves and Jesus and, therefore, go on being spiritually hungry. In the Old Testament we are told that this happened repeatedly with the people of Israel. We are told that they desired things instead of God. Therefore, God gave them "things" but "sent a wasting disease upon them" (Ps. 106:15). We do the same thing today. One of our hymns describes us in the terms of God's description of the Jewish people in Old Testament times—"rich in things, but poor in soul." Is that your condition? Perhaps you have devoted most of your life to satisfying your hunger for objects, and yet you have never looked to God in order to be fed spiritually. You pray, "Give me my physical needs." But you have never made a habit of praying, "Give me that spiritual bread that comes down from heaven."

Most of our hungers are all right in themselves, of course, although we often get them out of proportion. They have been put within us by God. We have a valid desire for achievement, happiness, friendship, love, and success. But it is tragic that many Christians attempt to satisfy these hungers in the world's way while neglecting the truly satisfying task of spending time with God.

Fourth, bread also produces growth. We need to grow. The church of Jesus Christ is weak in our age, and it is weak simply because the individuals who compose it are not strong. Where are the great churches of a former age, churches filled with men and women who knew the great doctrines of the faith and were not afraid to trumpet them to a sleeping world? Where are the Augustines, the Luthers, the Calvins, and the Wesleys of our time? I do see some hopeful signs. The fact that some conservative churches are growing is hopeful. The Jesus movement is another hopeful sign. So are the great evangelistic crusades. But we do not have a strong church today. What we have is a weak, anemic Christianity, a lot of easy believism coupled with morality—and I include evangelical churches in that characterization. What is the reason for our sickly Christian postures? Undoubtedly, the reason is our deep failure to feed upon Jesus Christ who alone can make us grow.

The True Bread

Would you like to see such growth—in your church, in you personally? If so, you must feed on Jesus. This means, in the first place, that you must not look to other people as the source of your nourishment. That is what the people who had been talking to Jesus were doing. They were looking to the current teaching of their rabbis and to Moses. They were saying, "We are people of tradition. We look to what has been passed on to us by Moses through history." Do not look to the past. Do not look to men as the source of your teaching. I know that others can be the channels of good teaching. I am trying to be that myself for many people. But it would be terrible if a person should go away from hearing sound teaching and say, "But Dr. So and So said..." when you should go out declaring, "The Lord Jesus Christ has spoken thus." There is no power in the name of a human teacher. But there is power in that blessed name of Jesus, that name that is above all earthly names. Before him, every head shall bow and all knees bend.

In the second place, we must not look to earthly things for our satisfaction. The people of Christ's day were doing this. Are you looking only for your earthly needs to be granted? God will satisfy your earthly needs. He has promised to do it. But if that is the whole of your desire, even your major desire, then you are never going to see a great moving of the Holy Spirit of God in your life. We need to get our minds off ourselves and our needs, and we need to focus instead on the Lord Jesus Christ and his glory. And what great glory! What a great Lord!

Have you ever thought about all that grain must pass through before it becomes bread? It must first be planted and then grow. When it is ripe it must be cut down, winnowed, ground into flour. Finally, it must be subjected to the fiery heat of the oven. Only by this process does it become able to sustain life. This is what happened to the Lord Jesus Christ in order that he might become your bread. He was born into this world. He was bruised. He was cut down by sinful men. He passed through the fires of God's holy wrath as he took your place in judgment. This is his glory. He suffered this for you. How, then, can you refuse to feed upon him? Come to him! Draw from his fullness, and grow strong.

Chapter 79.
Those Who Shall Come

John 6:36-37

In considering Jesus as the bread of life, it was pointed out in the last study that today's churches have not fed adequately upon that bread. The result is a sick and anemic Christianity in our century. If the verses to which we come now are understood and are allowed to penetrate the heart, they will cause the Christian who feeds upon them to be sickly no longer; instead, that person will grow and become strong. These are difficult verses—this section of John's Gospel may be among the most difficult portions of the book to assimilate—yet they are verses that carry us deep into the mind and heart of God.

These verses are given to fix our minds upon the grace and sovereignty of God in all things. They therefore take confidence away from anything that might be found in man and, instead, anchor it in God alone who alone is able to support it. They teach of man's sin and inability, God's electing and irresistible grace, the free offer of the gospel, and God's keeping power on behalf of his saints.

Another way of saying the same thing is to say that these few verses carry us deep into the principles of the Reformed or Calvinistic faith, although of course they do not date alone from the Reformation. This is the doctrine of Jesus Christ, Paul, Wycliffe, Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, Bullinger, Bucer, and other outstanding leaders of the Reformation period. These doctrines are reflected in many of our creeds, which in turn have become the official standards of many Protestant denominations. The official documents of the various branches of the Presbyterian and Reformed churches in Europe and America are all explicitly Calvinistic. The Baptist and Congregational churches, although they have no fixed creeds, have in many cases been strongly Reformed if we may judge from the writings of their major preachers and theologians. The Church of England and her daughter church, the Episcopal Church of America, have a Reformed creed in the Thirty-nine Articles. Moreover, even in Methodism (which is generally opposed to this system of doctrine) there is a body of Whitefield Methodists in Wales that even today bear the name of "Calvinistic Methodists."

In more recent times Hodge, Dabney, Cunningham, Smith, Shedd, Warfield, Kuyper, Spurgeon, and Berkouwer have all held these doctrines and taught them with conviction. In many cases they were taught under the acrostic of the "Tulip," which stands for: "total depravity," "unconditional election," "limited atonement," "irresistible grace," and "the perseverance of the saints."
These doctrines lie embedded in this section of John 6. And since they are so important, we are going to look initially only at the first two verses (vv. 36 and 37) where we find three great teachings: (1) man's inability, (2) election, and (3) the free offer of God's grace. After this we will return to the verses a second and a third time for a deeper study of these teachings.

Man's Inability

The first principle is the principle of man's total spiritual inability. It is taught in verse 36, in which Jesus says of those who had followed him from the far side of the Sea of Galilee to Capernaum, "But as I told you, you have seen me and still you do not believe." This is more than a mere description of the situation, for several verses later Jesus adds in speaking to the same people: "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (v. 44). In other words, the people did not believe because they could not believe, and because of this, Jesus was not in the least surprised by their attitude. They had witnessed all the evidence for Christ's claims that a person could wish. They had seen him, heard him. But they could not believe.

We must be careful as we say this to point out that the inability of man in spiritual things is not a physical inability and, therefore, that a man is not excused by his failings. He is guilty for his inability to believe. Let me explain in this way. Suppose that a man could be saved by literally getting up and walking over to Jesus. That would be easy to do if the man were in good health. But suppose he were lame. In that case, walking over to Jesus would be impossible; and because the inability was physical no one would blame the lame man. The same thing would be true if man's inability was analogous to physical blindness. We could say, "Look to Jesus and be saved." But if a man were blind, he could not look and no one would hold him guilty for that inability.

When we say, then, that the natural man has no ability in himself to turn to Jesus we are not speaking of a physical failing. We are speaking of something deeper, something that delves deep into man's nature, and for which he is guilty. A partial illustration can be found in the nature of animals. In the animal kingdom there are animals that eat nothing but meat—carnivores. There are animals that will eat only grass or plants—herbivores. Take a lion, which is a carnivore, and place a beautiful dish of oats or a bale of hay before him. Will he eat the oats or the hay? No! Why not? Is it not physically possible for the lion to eat oats? The answer is yes; it is physically possible for the lion to eat oats. But it is not in his nature to do so. Consequently, he will not eat them. In the same way, it is physically possible for a lamb to eat meat. But a lamb will not eat meat. So it is possible to say, in the same sense in which we are using the word of human inability, that it cannot.

In speaking of the will we come even closer to the true nature of man's problem. For the full tragedy of man's situation apart from God's grace is that man will not admit his need and will not come to the Lord Jesus Christ to have that need met. Moreover, since the will more than any other part of man's makeup is the real man, this means that man is totally depraved in spiritual things. Or, as we might also say, he is depraved at the very core of his being.

Those well-known verses from Romans 3 must be seen in this light. They say: "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God" (vv. 10-11). Here are verses that express man's total inability to find or please God—in the area of the moral life ("there is no one righteous"), in the intellectual realm ("there is no one who understands"), and in the sphere of the will ("there is no one who seeks God"). Moreover, it is this combination that makes the case of man so desperate. Someone who does not hold to Reformed doctrine might say, "But surely the Bible teaches that anyone who will may come?" Of course! But that is not the point. On that we are all agreed. Certainly, anyone who will may come. But who wills to come? The answer is: No one except those in whom the Holy Spirit has already performed the entirely irresistible work of the new birth so that, as the result of the miracle, the spiritually blind eyes of the natural man are opened to see God's truth and the totally depraved will of the sinner is turned about to enable him to embrace Jesus Christ as his Savior.

When you as a sinner begin to understand this, when you begin to understand something of your nature and the absolute necessity for God's electing grace, then and only then do you begin to see how desperate your situation actually is. If you are holding onto the belief that you have some ability in spiritual things, no matter how small, then there is no great need to worry. Life is long. You can make yourself believe in the Lord Jesus Christ later, even on your deathbed, if necessary. At least you can take your chances on that being possible.

But if you realize that the Bible is completely accurate and serious when it says that you are dead in trespasses and sins, that you cannot come to Christ apart from a miracle, the working of which is entirely in the sovereign choice of God, then you find yourself close to despair. For how can you be saved if it is neither in your nature nor power to trust in God and in the work of the Lord Jesus? You cannot. You have no hope; no hope, that is, unless God intervenes, in spite of yourself and your desires, to save you by pure grace.

Election

That, of course, brings us to the next verse. For if verse 36 says, as it does, that left to himself man is totally unable to believe on Jesus Christ or come to God, it is also equally and gloriously true that God does not leave all men to themselves but rather acts, in spite of man's will, to save some. So verse 37 declares: "All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away." It is because of this truth (and this truth alone) that Christians are able to preach and testify to Christ's gospel.

We need to enter into this sentence by looking into each of its parts. First, it speaks of the original position of all things, saying that all are in God's hands. This must be so if God is able to give some of those who are in his hands to Jesus.

I know that as we read this in the understanding of the flesh we are inclined to believe it is wrong. We like to think that we are each in our own hands so that we can each go in any direction we choose. However, that is not true. Within a certain limited sphere of activity it is true that you and I make our own decisions. But in this verse God is telling us the far greater truth, that we are held in God's hands in relation to everything important, whether we are believers in the Lord Jesus Christ or not. What is to be our fate, then, if we are not among those given by God the Father to the Lord Jesus Christ as his inheritance and for whom he died? Jonathan Edwards knew the answer to that question, and he presented it so graphically to those who heard him that men and women trembled in the pews and called out in desperation to God for salvation.

"Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" was his message. Terrible was the plight of those who spurned the Son but who could never escape the justified wrath of the Father! "There is no other reason to be given, why you have not dropped into hell since you arose in the morning, but that God's hand has held you up," he argued. "You need to consider yourselves, and awake thoroughly out of sleep."

That is true. All you have and are—your health, wealth, mind, aspirations, even your very life— you have and are because God holds you. You would like to think that you are your own master, the captain of your own fate, but you are not. What happens to you is solely in God's pleasure.

But then, second, this verse also speaks of a great transaction, according to which some of those who have been held in God's hand in his suspended wrath have been handed over to the Lord Jesus Christ in his mercy. That is the greatest contract of all time, and this is not the only place in the Bible where this truth is mentioned. For instance, in the seventeenth chapter of John, Jesus speaks of those whom the Father has given him. In verse 2 he says, "For you granted him authority over all people that he might give eternal life to all those you have given him." In verse 6 it is mentioned twice: "I have revealed you to those you gave me out of the world. They were yours; you gave them to me and they have obeyed your word." Verse 9 says, "I am not praying for the world, but for those you have given me." And in verse 24 Christ says, "Father, I want those you have given me be with me where I am, and to see my glory."

Who are these who have been given by God the Father to Jesus Christ? They are those about whom Paul writes in Ephesians: "For he chose us in him before the creation of the world" (Eph. 1:4). These are the elect. We are told elsewhere that they are to form a vast and innumerable company.

Third, our text teaches that this great transaction that took place in eternity past between the Father and the Son is to be followed up by many specific changes in time. This is seen in the text in the contrasts between the tenses of the major verbs. In verse 37 where the Son is waiting for those whom the Father has given, the change is from the present tense to the future—"all that the Father gives" and "will come." In verse 39, where the matter is looked at from the perspective of the eternal will of God, the change is from the past tense to the present —"of all that he has given me." In other words, the choice of God in eternity past has this effect—that men and women come to Christ now in time, coming as sinners who need to be saved, coming with nothing in order that they might receive everything from Christ.

It is in order to have men and women come in this way that the gospel is preached. It is why I preach it today. Will you come? Will you believe in Jesus? Do not say, as some do, "But if I am not among those whom God has given to Jesus, I cannot come." That is true. But you do not know whether you are among that number or not. All you know is that the gospel is proclaimed to you and that the command is given: "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved." Will you come? I know that there are difficulties in sorting this out intellectually. But the text need not be a problem for you. It can be a blessed comfort. For if God has given certain persons to his Son—if this is irrevocably determined—why should you not be among them?

Finally, some should also be encouraged by the fourth point, which tells us that there is no exception in what is described here. For all that the Father has given to Jesus shall come. That is an encouragement even to the preacher of the gospel. There are periods in history when the gospel message seems to fall almost entirely on stony soil and little fruit is forthcoming. At other times the soil is receptive and much happens. What if the preacher, teacher, or lay evangelist were to peg his sense of accomplishment to these results? Well, it might be all right in periods of great blessing. But in times of drought how discouraged he would be! If, on the other hand, he is to take this text at full force, realizing that God is serious when he proclaims that all whom he has chosen shall come, then he can preach with full confidence and can rejoice to be a part of God's great plan of salvation.

Take heart, Christian worker! I do not know why God has chosen to save some through the foolishness of preaching and witnessing, but he has. Moreover, he has promised that all whom he has chosen to save will come. Nothing can stop them—not your failures (though you must take heed as to how you live), not even the devil! You may seem to be sowing seed at random and at times with little results. But God will see to it that some of that seed falls onto ground that he has prepared, and that it prospers. "Therefore, my dear brothers, stand firm. Let nothing move you. Always give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord, because you know that your labor in the Lord is not in vain" (1 Cor. 15:58).

The Free Offer of God's Grace

Finally, although it would be quite natural to stop at this point, it would not be right to stop without saying once more that none of these teachings is given to limit in any way the free offer of God's grace through the gospel. This is the offer of the second half of verse 37. In this study we have looked at John 6:36 and the first half of John 6:37. We are going to be looking at the second half of verse 37 in detail later, but even here it is not right to omit it. This half says, "And whoever comes to me I will never drive away." What a great offer that is! What a great promise! It is universal. It has no restrictions. It tells us that anyone is welcome to come in any way at any time. You can be young or old, bold or timid. You may have heard the gospel for the first time today or have been acquainted with it for the better part of a long lifetime. None of this matters. The only thing that matters is whether or not you will come to the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior.

Someone will say, "But what must I do?" The answer is: You must stop doing. You have done quite enough for one lifetime, for you have ruined yourself by your doing. Your question should not be, "What should I do?" but rather, "What has he done?" The answer to that question is simply that it has all been done. He died for you. The work is finished. You need only to let go of your own attempts to earn God's favor and fall instead into the gentle and waiting arms of the Savior.

Chapter 80.
The Certainty of Divine Grace

John 6:37

John 6:37 demands discussion of a point passed over briefly in the last study. It is found in the first half of the verse, the half that reads, "All that the Father gives me will come to me." This is one of the great statements in the Bible of the doctrine of "the efficacious calling" of the sinner by God, or "irresistible grace." It is the teaching that all those whom God has chosen inevitably come to faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. This means that God's grace will not be frustrated, that the plan of salvation will come to a perfect completion, and that Jesus Christ will not have died in vain. This teaching necessarily belongs with those looked at earlier, for it is part and parcel of that Reformed system of doctrine that holds to the biblical teaching on man's total spiritual depravity and the necessity of God's electing grace.

Moreover, a little thought will show anyone who is willing to face these questions fairly that it must be this way. If we should attempt to make salvation ultimately dependent upon some act of man, no matter how small that act is, then nothing can be certain where salvation is concerned, and a statement like this—"All that the Father gives me will come to me"—is impossible.

Alpha and Omega

Let me explain what I mean. If Jesus Christ died not knowing if men would believe in him or not, and without the guarantee by God that they would believe, then it is entirely possible that no one would have believed and that his death would have been for nothing. He would have died, but no one would have been saved. You cannot have it both ways. Thus, God either determines who will be saved and sees to it that they are saved, or there is at least the possibility that no one will believe in Jesus. And if there is the possibility that no one will believe, or even that some whom God has chosen and given to Jesus will not believe, then John 6:37 is untrue and ought not to appear in the Bible.

Some have tried to avoid this conclusion by introducing the factor of God's foreknowledge. They argue that God in his omniscience foresaw that some would believe and therefore sent Jesus Christ to die for them. But that does not help anyone out of the difficulty. In fact, it makes the difficulty worse. For, instead of making the salvation of an individual depend upon the depraved will of man, it actually makes even the death of Jesus Christ himself depend upon the will of man. For if God had foreseen that none would believe, then Jesus would not have come and died and the great drama of salvation would have been nipped in the bud—and all because of us! We would have been dictating to the Savior.

Instead of this reasoning, we must come back to the great biblical principle that God is not only the author of salvation in the sense of being the One out of whom the plan flows, but also the author in the sense that, like any good author, he finishes the story. Thus, God brings the plan of salvation to its perfect conclusion by irresistibly drawing men, women, and children to himself. He is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the author and the finisher of our faith. Moreover, this is precisely what John 6:37 is teaching.

Cords of Love

As I say this, however, I am aware that there has been some disagreement even among Reformed theologians, as to how God does this. There have been various theories. Everyone is agreed that if God is drawing men and women to himself irresistibly, he is nevertheless not coercing them.
He is not forcing or manipulating men. The Bible says that he draws us with the cords of love. But how does he do this? That is the question.

One of the theories advanced to answer this question is that God so orders circumstances that by ordering them he leads the will to do what he desires. What are we to say to this theory? Certainly, we may say that on a human level this often is true. We see it, for instance, in the raising of our children. I did this with my two-year-old daughter. We were at church for a supper meeting at which the children were to eat together while the adults began their meeting. My daughter did not want to eat. In fact, she would not! I sat down at the children's table, telling her that I was tired—which I was. When she would not eat, I asked for a plate for myself and had it piled high with lots of red Jell-O. I took the first bite. It was all I ate, but as I ate it I remarked how good it was. I took another spoonful, but as I took it I passed it by her nose. Her mouth opened, and the Jell-O was gone. "You ate my Jell-O," I exclaimed. That was a good joke to her. She brightened up, and soon she was eating it all. In a few minutes she pointed to the meat. She wanted some of that. She drank some milk. Finally, she had not only finished dinner, she had even had seconds and thirds on the Jell-O. That is bending the will toward its own best interests through circumstances.

The difficulty with this theory is that it does not do justice to what the Bible has to say about the will as it is since the fall of man into sin. Before the fall this theory would have been operative. But since the fall, it is not. Here we must remind ourselves about the character of people's inability to choose God. Our inability is not physical; it lies deep in our nature. We will not believe. But this lies so deep in our nature that for all practical purposes the "will not" actually means "cannot." This is why the Bible speaks of man as being "dead in trespasses and sins." He is as unable to save himself as a dead man is unable to return himself to life. Therefore, no matter how propitious the circumstances may be, the answer is always the same. It is to reject Jesus.

Rebirth

What would it take for a dead man to respond physically to the voice of Jesus? The answer is that it would take something like a resurrection, a miracle. That was true in the case of Lazarus. Lazarus had been dead four days. Jesus called, and Lazarus came forth. Why? Because Jesus did a miracle in raising him to life. In the same way it requires something like that miracle if a man or woman who has been dead in sin is to believe on Jesus.

This is what the Bible teaches. Therefore, a second, better theory is that God calls people to himself irresistibly by means of a miracle. It can be described as a resurrection. More often it is described as rebirth. Have you never heard someone say that the birth of a baby is a miracle? Of course you have, and it is. It is this same miracle that God does spiritually in the life of anyone who comes to believe in Jesus. The order is this: (1) God chooses, (2) God regenerates, (3) the individual believes. Moreover, it is because God alone is active in the first two steps that the calling of God is 100 percent effective. Here are some verses that teach this.

First, James 1:18: "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created." This verse speaks of the moment at which the Christian life begins as the moment at which a child is conceived. It is telling us that this is done according to the will of the Father and not of the child. Who ever heard of a baby deciding on the time or place where it should be born? The idea is preposterous! Yet it is no more preposterous than the teaching that you and I become children of God by deciding that we would like to be born into God's family. If you are a believer in Jesus Christ, it is because the matter of your faith in Christ was decided first of all by your heavenly Father. He engendered you. Moreover, we are told that the means by which he did that was the Word of God, the Bible.

The second important verse to tell about our spiritual conception and birth is John 1:13. This verse tells us that those who are born again are born "not of natural descent [blood], nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God." This teaches that there are three ways by which a man or a woman does not become God's child. It is not by physical birth. This is the significance of the phrase "not of blood." We do not associate birth with blood today, except in the phrases "noble blood" or "blue blood," but blood was associated with birth in antiquity; this is the sense in which John is writing. No one becomes a child of God simply because his or her parents are children of God. No one inherits the relationship. Then, too, no one becomes a child of God through emotion. This is the heart of the phrase "nor of human decision." A person can be moved to tears in a revival service, for example, and still not be born again. Finally, it is not of his own will either; for, according to John, no one becomes a believer merely by sitting down and deciding entirely in himself that he or she will believe. We cannot do that. Well, then, how do we come to believe? The answer is that we come to believe simply because God first does a miracle in order to make us alive spiritually.

A person must believe. You must accept Jesus if you are to be saved. But the question is: Why do you accept him when another person does not? Or, why do you reject him when another comes to him? Is it anything in man? Of course not! If that were the case, there could be boasting in heaven. Salvation is not of man, salvation is of God who intervenes. Men believe because God has first regenerated them, rather than it being the other way around.

Birth from Above

A third important verse on this subject is John 3:3: "No one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again." In one sense this verse merely repeats what I have been saying. It tells us that a person must experience spiritual birth if he or she is to see spiritual things (cf. 1 Cor. 2:14). But it is also true that it adds a bit more. For one thing, there is a choice of words in the expression "born again" that is a clue to the fuller meaning. There are two words for "again" in the Greek language. One word is palin, which refers only to the repetition of an act. This is not the word used. The other word is anothen, which means both "from above" and "again." Clearly, by using this word, John expressed the idea that the new birth must come from God alone and not from man.

Moreover, even the idea of repetition ("again") is not mere repetition. For anothen also means to have the act repeated by the same one who acted the first time. In other words, just as God made Adam alive once by breathing into him the divine breath so that he became a living soul, so it is necessary for God to breathe into a man the second time in order that he might be brought to life spiritually. It is hard to miss the fact that this is precisely what is involved in the quickening of a dead soul, for a few verses farther on Jesus speaks of the fact that the new birth takes place by means of God's breath or spirit. He says, "No one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and of the Spirit" (3:5). God's spirit is his breath. His breath must fill our spiritual dust if it is to be animated.

The last verse is 1 Peter 1:23: "For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God." There are many images for the Bible in the Word of God. The Bible calls itself a lamp to our feet, a light to our path. It is a hammer, a rock, a mirror, a sword. It is milk for the infant. It is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. These are all great and good images, but none is so bold or striking as the image for the Word of God that occurs in this verse from 1 Peter. Here it is sperm, the male life germ. Peter is saying that God uses his Word to engender spiritual life in an individual, just as the human father implants his life within a woman in the act of engendering a child.

What happens when a man or a woman is born again? First, God takes the ovum of saving faith and gives it to the individual; for we are told that even faith is the gift of God (Eph. 2:8). Next, he sends forth the seed of his Word so that the living Word pierces the egg of faith and engenders life. In this act a new spiritual life comes into being. And if anyone should inquire after the mother, the answer is that the church fulfills this function. For it is within the womb of the church that the Word is preached and in which the embryo can grow until it comes to the point at which the new life becomes visible and the cry of confession announces the reality of new birth.

It Matters

If you are a Christian, this is a great truth for you, for it is a truth that gives tremendous importance to what you become in Christ and to what you do. God has a plan. So if he has chosen you and called you to himself in the course of his day-by-day unfolding of that plan, then where you are and what you do where you are matters.

Here is an illustration. According to any system of theology that places the ultimate decision in salvation with human beings, salvation is something like getting on a train that takes you away from your environment. It comes from somewhere else, passes through your town, and goes on to glory. Grace is involved, of course. God did not have to send the train. But still, your efforts are involved. You have to get on, and it takes you away. What I have been teaching is different. According to this system, you are not even on the platform. You are at home. But God comes on the train; he gets off; he goes to your house; he does a miracle in your life. And then, he instructs you to live for him there, because that is important to him.

If you see that, you will realize that the most important thing in this entire universe is, not what is happening in the halls of our heads of state or in the laboratories of the world's most brilliant scientists, but what is happening in you now. This gives importance to whatever you do. It means, you matter.

Are you saying, "But I am far too insignificant; I am not important"? In the world's eyes, yes, that may be true. But it is not true for God. In Shakespeare's King Lear there is a dungeon scene in which a number of selfish nobles are about to put out the eyes of an old man named Glouster. It is a wicked deed, and they are doing it for their own selfish ends. On the stage with them is an exceedingly minor character in the play. He does not even have a name. In the list of dramatis personae he is just called a servant. No one has been paying any attention to him. Nevertheless, in this one scene he rushes across the stage to defend Glouster. At once one of the nobles turns about and simply cuts him down with his sword. Then they go on and blind the old man anyway. Who is important in this scene? The world answers, "the noble." But if this were real life and we were looking at the play from God's perspective, the right answer would be, "the servant." For he did the right thing at the right moment.

We do not see this great drama of life clearly. God is the only One who knows the end from the beginning. We do not know the importance of our role, but we do know that he has created us and called us so that at this particular moment in the drama, in the play called "Time," we might take the part he has given in a way that is honoring to Jesus Christ. Will you take that role? Will you live for him? This is the spiritual meat of the text that tells us that all whom the Father has given to Jesus shall come to him and that no one who comes will be cast out.

Chapter 81.
No One Driven Away

John 6:37

The record of John 6:37 is one of the great texts of the Word of God: "whoever comes to me I will never drive away." This verse swings the broad gates of heaven wide open and promises that Jesus will receive all who come to the Father by him. It means that the gospel is for you if you will hear it and come to Christ. It is for you personally.

Years ago in the Midwest there was an old German farmer by the name of Klein. He was an ungodly man. Although he lived across the street from an Evangelical Lutheran Church, he never went in; and, of course, he did not believe the gospel. To his way of thinking, the gospel was for other people, not for him. One day, however, the Bible school of the church began to teach the Bible school children the chorus of the hymn that goes:

> Grace! Tis a charming sound,
> Harmonious to the ear;
> Heav'n with the echo shall resound,
> And all the earth shall hear.
> Saved by grace alone!
> This is all my plea: Jesus died for all mankind,

And Jesus died for me.

From his listening post across the street Mr. Klein heard the children sing. He heard most of the words clearly. But when they came to the line "Jesus died for all mankind," he thought they were singing "Jesus died for old man Klein, and Jesus died for me." The thought that Jesus died for him personally finally sank into his heart. Klein crossed the street to the church, attended services, and eventually committed his life to the Lord Jesus Christ.

That is the message of John 6:37. Put your name in that song and say, "Jesus died for Mary Jones, John Smith, Paul Brown, Betty Harris, or whatever your name might be." Jesus died for you if you will come to him.

Belief and Trust

Before we go on to see just how wide this text is—how wide heaven's gates are flung open by it—we need to explain, first of all, what is meant by the word "come." Jesus said, "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away." What does it mean to come to him? One answer to that question is that Jesus is clearly talking about faith. To come to Jesus means to have faith in him. This channel of salvation is always spoken of in the Bible. "For it is by grace you have been saved through faith," Paul wrote to the Ephesians (Eph. 2:8). "Without faith it is impossible to please God," said the author of Hebrews (11:6). Faith in Jesus is commitment to Jesus based upon a belief that he is who he said he is and that he will do what he has promised to do for everyone who trusts him.

The great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon once wrote about faith: "Faith is not a blind thing; for faith begins with knowledge. It is not a speculative thing; for faith believes facts of which it is sure. It is not an unpractical, dreamy thing; for faith trusts, and stakes its destiny upon the truth of revelation.... Faith is believing that Christ is what He is said to be, and that He will do what He has promised to do, and then to expect this of Him." Since Jesus said that he was dying for the sin of mankind and that he would save any who would commit themselves to him, saving faith is therefore just believing this and putting your life into the hands of the Savior.

Look at the same thing another way. What is faith? Faith is a simple thing. It is the eye that looks to Jesus, just as the eyes of the Israelites looked to the bronze serpent in the wilderness and were healed. Faith is the hand that grasps, just as Jacob grasped hold of the angel of the Lord, who wrestled with him by the brook Jabbok, and would not let go until he had been blessed. Faith is the mouth that feeds upon Christ, feasting on the bread of life and quenching its thirst with living water. Again, faith is clinging to Christ when it seems that this is all one can do. Faith is building on Christ so that a worthwhile structure begins to grow on that foundation. Faith is stepping out by faith in Christ when there seems to be nothing to step on, just as Peter stepped out onto the waters of the Sea of Galilee at Christ's bidding. Faith is trusting Christ and proving his promises.

Sometime ago a man introduced himself to me with the remark that he was a "C and E" Christian. I did not know what he was going to say, but I sensed what was coming.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Christmas and Easter," he answered. "I am the kind of Christian who goes to church on Christmas and Easter." I could easily have insulted him, but I held back and instead reminded myself of another Christian, an old saint from England, who called herself a "T and P" Christian. She wrote these letters in her Bible opposite promises that she personally had found to be true. The letters stood for "tried and proven."

Which are you? Are you a "C and E" Christian? In most cases that is no Christian at all. Or are you a "T and P" Christian, one who has tried God's promises by faith and has proved them personally?

I feel at this point that someone may say, "But I do not think that I can do even one of these things. I want to look up to Christ, but I cannot look. I want to grasp hold, but I cannot seem to do it. I want to feed on him, but I seem to lack the will even for that. I cannot seem to cling, build, step out, or prove his promises." But can you not simply let go then and fall into the waiting arms of Jesus? Suppose there is a fire and you are trapped on the third-story ledge of a building. The building is burning down around you and will soon fall. You are clinging to the ledge for dear life. Below are the firemen with their net. Well, can you not let go and fall into the net that will save you? That is all God asks. Merely release your hold on all that keeps you from him—whether this is your desire to run your own life, your own fine opinion of yourself, your low opinion of yourself, your good works, whatever it is—and fall into the net of salvation, into the waiting arms of the Savior. Jesus said, "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away."

Who May Come?

Let me make it even more personal. Who, according to this text, may come to Jesus? The answer is: anyone. How may they come? The answer is: in anyway. When may they come? The answer is: at any time. How can it be more universal? The first half of verse 37 is written in the abstract—"All that the Father gives me will come to me." This is the part of Christ's sentence that deals with election. It is plural, designating a great number. It is abstract, for we do not know who those who are called by God are. The second half of the verse, however, our half, is both singular in number and personal—"him." It is Jesus' way of saying "You," whoever you may be, and however and whenever you may come.

Even if you are a great sinner, you may come. The Bible tells us that Jesus did not come to call the righteous "but sinners to repentance." What is your sin? Murder? Adultery? Theft? It does not matter. If you will come to Jesus, you will be received. "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away." Children of Christian parents, you who have been running away from the God of your father and mother, you may come! "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away." Backslider! "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away." You who are indifferent! "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away."

Some time ago I met a man who was indifferent toward Jesus Christ. He told me that he came to Tenth Presbyterian Church occasionally, adding that this was "whenever my friends think I need a dose of religion." That kind of exposure to religion will innoculate you against true faith and will lead you (with a false sense of wellbeing) to a Christless eternity. Religion saves no one. Christ saves. So Christ is for you if you are indifferent. Come to him. Jesus said, "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away."

How May I Come?

Then, too, I want you to see that there is no restriction on how a person may come, just as there is no restriction on who may come. How may you come? The answer is: in any way.

Some come running. I have seen that many times. The gospel is preached; these persons respond like Zacchaeus, who climbed a tree to get a saving view of Christ, or like Peter, who jumped vigorously into the sea and swam toward him. For these persons, the gospel is like a key in a lock, or a quarter in a soft-drink machine. The results are immediate. Moreover, they seem to come in the fullness of faith into a full knowledge of the gospel. Often, Catholics who have not believed in Christ personally come in this way, for they often have a true sense of God's sovereignty, righteousness, wisdom, and other attributes to begin with, and the gospel makes all of it fall into place.

Others come limping to Christ with poor, halting steps. They want to believe; they think they believe, a bit, in part; then they are not too sure, on the other hand, that they do want to come. It makes no difference. These may come too, for the words of Jesus do not specify how we may come any more than they specify who may come. Coming is for anyone.

Perhaps you are one who has been holding back, resisting faith, just as Paul, Augustine, C. S. Lewis, and many others have resisted. It makes no difference here either, so long as you eventually commit your life into the hands of Jesus Christ. Let me give you a personal illustration of this point. Some time ago, at the University of Pennsylvania, workers for Campus Crusade for Christ began speaking to a young black student who was apparently a Christian but who did not seem terribly interested in Christian things. His chief interest was in making the freshman basketball team, and he had been working toward this goal all through the fall of his freshman year. Actually he was resisting the gospel, but the Crusade staff did not know this then. They invited him to a fall conference at which I was speaking. He did not want to go. He had no money, he said. They gave him a scholarship. He then said he did not have a way to get there. The staff offered him a ride. When he arrived at the conference he had eaten no dinner, so he decided to go out for hamburgers instead of going to the first meeting. His dinner did not take up the entire time of the meeting, however, so he came in when it was just about halfway through. I did not see this student enter but, apparently, just as he came through the door (wondering whether he would make the freshman basketball team—the final try-outs were to be held on Monday) I said, "God loves you, whoever you are; he offers you a plan for your life." This word struck him as directly from God. He sat down and listened. He committed his life to the Lord, and he became the most effective witness of Christ's saving grace to the black community on the campus.

It does not matter how you come. You may come boldly, limpingly, reluctantly. The important thing is that you do come. Will you do that? Will you commit your life to Jesus?

When May I Come?

Finally, the words of Jesus are broad also as to when you may come. You may come at any time. You may come as a child. I am glad that children hear and respond to the gospel. Some say that you cannot preach to children, but that is untrue. Children can understand an enormous amount if someone will just take time to teach them. And they can follow Jesus. Are you a child? If you are, and if you can understand what I am saying, you should know three things: (1) you are old enough to sin, (2) you are old enough to die, and (3) you are old enough to come to Jesus. It is wonderful to come as a child. If you come as a child, you have a whole lifetime ahead of you in which Jesus can mold you into the kind of person he would have you be and can train you for the kind of work he has for you to do. I am glad that Jesus called me when I was young, for most of the decisions of my life, even at a young age, were made in view of that call and in view of the fact that I felt led to a preaching ministry. Children, will you not believe in Jesus and follow him?

You may be one who is saying, "But I have missed all that. I could have come as a child, but I did not come. Now I am old, and it is hard to change. It is too late for me." No, it is not too late! I will admit that there are increasing difficulties associated with advanced age. There are habits of mind. A young mind generally is more open. But God is equal to these difficulties, and men and women in old age come also. Why not you? If a number of those who have lived long lives before believing in Christ will come to Christ, why should you not be among them? You may not be able to do very much for Jesus because of your age, but he can do everything for you. Yours can be a great testimony. Though you will have only a short time on earth to serve him, you will have an eternity through which you can praise him.

Spurgeon once wrote, "Oh, my dear hearers, come to Jesus! Come in the morning when the dew is on your branch, for he will not cast you out. Come in the heat of noon, when the drought of care parches you, and he will not cast you out. Come when the shadows have grown long, and the darkness of the night is gathering about you, for he will not cast you out. The door is not shut; for the gate of mercy closes not so long as the gate of life is open."

Will You Come?

Will you come to Jesus? The time is now; the place is wherever you find yourself at this moment.

A number of years ago I was in Egypt and stood on the banks of the mighty Nile River. Egypt owes her life to the Nile, so much so that the Egyptians have a proverb about it: "Egypt, the gift of the Nile." The Nile brings water, which makes the country one great oasis in the midst of the desert; the yearly inundations have long provided fertilization for the rich, dark soil. Nothing is greater or more valued in Egyptian life than the Nile. Yet for all its importance, the Nile is free and abundant to anyone who finds himself by its banks. Any dog, any cow, any person can drink of the river of Egypt and drink all he desires. So, too, with the grace of God. The river of God's grace is freely flowing. All may drink of it. Will you drink? You need only stoop down and scoop it up.

Chapter 82.
The Keeping Power of God

John 6:38-39

Study of the sixth chapter of John has brought us to another great theme of the gospel, another plank in the system of doctrine known as the evangelical or Reformed faith. It is the keeping power of God. This aspect of theology has sometimes been referred to as the perseverance of the saints. But it is much better to speak of it as the keeping power of God, since it is God who perseveres with us far more than we with him. Simply put, this doctrine means that God never begins a work that he does not intend to finish and that, therefore, no one whom he has called to faith in Jesus Christ as Savior will ever be lost.

It is important that we understand this great truth, for, one way or another, our knowledge of it (or lack of knowledge of it) will affect our lives. If we do understand it, we will have a plank upon which we can stand, a foundation that is sure and upon which we can build.

Never, Never Drive Away

The doctrine of the keeping power of God is actually present in the verse that we studied in the last lesson, though we skipped over it then in order to stress the universality of the offer of the gospel to sinful men. The verse we were studying was John 6:37, which says, "All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away." The last phrase of that verse—"whoever comes to me I will never drive away"—certainly opens the gates of heaven to any man, woman, or child who will come. The gospel is for you, whoever you may be. At the same time, it also is true that the verse speaks of God's power to keep the one who does come, and to keep him eternally. We see this particularly in the original text, for the Greek contains a double negative that, in effect, denies that the one who comes to Christ will ever be driven away—either now or later. We can capture something of the effect by translating the verse— "whoever comes to me I will never, never drive away."

This theme is now developed more fully in the verses that follow. Here Jesus says, "For I have come down from heaven not to do my will but to do the will of him who sent me. And this is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day" (vv. 38-39).

That... I should lose nothing! Not only is Jesus promising to reject no one who comes to him, he also is stating his determination to lose none of those who do come. Martin Luther saw this clearly and wrote, "Here Christ says: 'This is the will of Him who sent Me, that I should lose nothing.' He will not only refrain from expelling and rejecting anyone, but He is also resolved to keep them with Him and prevent anyone else from taking them from Him."

For All Believers

Who are the ones about whom the verse is speaking? Who are those who will never be lost? The answer is that the verse applies to all who will come to the Lord Jesus. The "all" of verse 39 is the same as the "all" of verse 37. So, whoever you are and however you may have come, if you have come to Jesus as your Lord and Savior, this truth is for you. You may be aware of it, or you may not. You may believe it, or you may not. You may resist it, or you may not. It does not matter. If you have truly believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, then this verse is Jesus' own statement of the truth that you will never be lost. He will keep you.

You can know that you will be in heaven one day as certainly as you can know that the Lord Jesus Christ himself will be there.

Let me make that explicit. In the last study it was pointed out that some people come to Jesus boldly. They hear the gospel, and immediately everything falls into place. They believe it, and they are as certain of their salvation in that moment as they will be forty years hence. Others come slowly and with many misgivings. They are constitutionally cautious and unstable. They are like butterflies in the garden that flit from flower to flower without settling down on any of them. In business they go from job to job. In Christian circles they go from church to church. They never are quite sure of their salvation. If you ask whether they have believed in Jesus as their Savior, they reply that they have but are not sure whether they have believed enough. Are people like that kept by God? Yes! They are as much in his perfect care as the one who comes boldly and completely at the beginning.

The same thing is true wherever a person may be along the normal span of human life. Take a child, for instance. Can that child who has responded to Jesus really believe these things? Does he know what he is doing? The answer is yes. "But so much lies ahead of him. He has so much growing and changing to do. Might it not be the case that his mind will be filled with other ideas later on and he will fall away from Christ?" Not at all. For Jesus Christ is keeping him. If you are a child, look forward to a lifetime of service for Jesus Christ. You will grow, and as you grow you will find that Jesus is even more wonderful than you think him now. You will find that he is indeed able to keep you and that you will not be lost.

Someone else is at the other end of the spectrum. You are in old age. You face sickness, increasingly restricted movement, eventually death. "Will I be able to keep myself strong in faith?" you are asking. The answer is that God is able to keep you. He will persevere with you.
He will be as real to you in old age as he has ever been. In death he will be even closer. Moreover, even if you should be unaware of the fact that he is with you and will keep you and are fearful, that will not change the fact. For Jesus himself has said that he will lose nothing of all that has been given to him by the Father.

Are you saying, "But suppose I should get to the point where I would deny him?" May I be bold enough to answer that Jesus will keep you even then. Do you need an example? Take Peter. Peter lived with Jesus for three years, but at the time of the arrest and crucifixion Peter denied the Lord with oaths and cursings. Did Jesus forsake Peter? No! Peter was far from the Lord in that moment, it is true. But the Lord was not far from Peter. So we read that Jesus turned and looked on Peter and then later appeared to him personally and recommissioned him to service. This doctrine of the keeping power of God is for all. It is for you—whoever you may be, however you have come, whatever you may or may not have done.

God Is Faithful

Second, not only is the keeping power of God for all who have come to Jesus, it is also absolutely certain. It is certain because both the will and the power to keep those who have come to Christ from falling are God's. It would not be a certainty if the will and power were man's.

Our text speaks of God's will. We are going to look at God's will in more detail in our next study. God's power is spoken of in a dynamic and lucid way in 2 Timothy 1:12. In this verse Paul, who knew these truths, writes of God's power to keep his spiritual deposits. He says, "Yet I am not ashamed, because I know whom I have believed, and am convinced that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day." The verse is powerful in English, but it has a special power in the French translation. The French translation of one phrase says, Il a la puissance de garder mon depot. The metaphor is that of banking; and the translation literally means, "God has power to keep that which I have deposited with him." In other words, the verse is telling us that when we believe in Jesus Christ for our salvation we are actually trusting that God will be able to keep our spiritual deposits, and it is asserting that he will indeed keep them.

Capital Deposits

Have you trusted in God through faith in Jesus Christ? If so, think of the capital investments you have placed on deposit with him. First, your faith for salvation. Can God keep that? Of course he can! We turn to the Bible and discover Christ saying, "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (John 10:27-28). Again we read, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? ...No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:35, 37-39).

The love of the Lord Jesus Christ. What a theme! How wonderful to know that nothing can separate us from such love! There are things that would try. Paul lists three possible causes of separation from God's love in Romans 8, but then he dismisses them all.

First, there is sin. An honest Christian knows that although he is justified by God he is still a sinner and sins daily in thought, word, and deed. Such persons worry when they look at the sin that clings all too closely to their garments. "Well, what of sin?" asks Paul. "Christ has died for sin (past tense), and thus, in God's sight our sin is gone forever." Suppose someone should accuse us? "God is the judge," Paul answers. The Christian has been acquitted before the bench of the highest court of all, and no one is authorized to reopen his case.

Second, Paul speaks of physical suffering. And not only external suffering—tribulation, famine, nakedness, peril, and sword—but internal suffering too, that anguish of the soul that often is known by those who undergo persecution for the sake of their Lord and for the gospel. We read, "Yet for your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered" (Rom. 8:36, quoted from Ps.

44:22). It is in such suffering that we can be aware of the sustaining love of God.

All the words referring to this suffering are interesting, but the word "tribulation" in the King James Version has a particularly vivid mental picture associated with it. In the Greek language the word that is translated "tribulation" originally meant "pressure." It is the word thlepsis. This originally meant any kind of pressure—the pressure of a hand upon a table, the pressure of the wind against a sail, and so on—but in time it came to mean pressure that was oppressive or burdensome. At this stage the verb meant "to afflict" or "to harass," and the noun came to denote "affliction," "distress," or "oppression." In the Latin language, from which we got our English word "tribulation," the word referred to an instrument for threshing grain. This was done by beating the wheat from the chaff. Thus, when the word was applied to the calamities of this life it referred to their destructive characteristics.

We know such tribulation also. Sometimes it is the physical oppression of those harassed for their faith. At other times the pressure is mental, resulting from ridicule or from the tensions of our fast-paced society. Whatever it is, however, we are to know that it cannot separate us from Christ's love. God is able to keep our spiritual deposits for salvation in the life to come.

The third potential cause of separation from Christ's love is the existence of supernatural powers.
But Paul says that even these cannot effect a separation. This was not an idle thought for Paul.
He knew the extent of spiritual wickedness in this world and had wrestled against it himself. Moreover, he knew that this was the ultimate dimension of the struggle inherent in the Christian life. To the Ephesians he wrote, "For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12). But spiritual forces cannot be victorious over us.

The Bible says that Christ "having disarmed the powers and authorities, ...made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:15). Can we be separated from God's love through things present or things to come? Not by these things either. For God has chosen us in Christ from before the beginning of the world, and we shall be with him in glory long after time has ceased to have meaning.

God's Workmanship

Our faith for salvation is only one thing that we have deposited with God, however. If you are a Christian, you have also deposited your faith that he is able to accomplish his purposes in you in this life. Can God keep that? Of course he can! We turn to Ephesians 2:10 and read, "For we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do." In other words, when we come to Jesus we step out of one kind of life into another kind of life and are committing ourselves into the hands of One who is determined to form us, direct us, push us, and (if it is necessary) even kick us in order that he might mold us into the image of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We may take one more example. If you are a Christian, you have also committed unto God your faith that he is able to see you through temptation. Can God keep that? Yes, that too. For we read, "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor. 10:13). Certainly God is able to keep our capital deposits.

And think what marvelous dividends he pays on the investment! It is not only that we are secure both for this life and the future but that we partake so richly of God's present blessings. There is a partaking of his love. There is joy. There is the peace that passes understanding. There are a thousand other blessings besides.

We are to be encouraged by the reality of these things in our lives. I once read the story of a little boy who went into a bank with just one penny to open an account. He went up to the teller and said, "Please, sir, I would like to deposit a penny in your bank." With a serious expression the teller took the penny and wrote out a bank book in the boy's name. Then he handed it to the boy and the boy went off. A little while later the boy came back and stood there looking up at the teller. "Yes. What is it, young fellow?" the teller asked. "Please, sir, I would just like to see if my penny is still in your bank." The teller held up a penny where the boy could see it. The boy smiled and went away satisfied.

It is our privilege to do that with God. He is not made weary with our childish questions. So, if the time comes (as it does to many Christians) when we begin to doubt the reality of spiritual things and our security, God has arranged it so we can come to him and say, "Please, Lord, I would just like to see whether the spiritual deposits that I have placed with you are still in the bank." If we ask him, God will provide the assurance. That is why Paul can write in the letter to the Philippians, mentioning just one of our dividends: "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6-7).

Where does it stand with you? Do you have faith in a God who is able to do all that he has promised—able to save, able to keep you from falling? Or are you uncertain, unstable? There is much that will make you unstable if you look first to the world instead of to God. Learn instead to look to God first, to that great God who is able to guard your spiritual deposits.

Chapter 83.
God's Will Confirmed by Jesus

John 6:40

There is nothing certain in this world but death and taxes!" So goes a very cynical saying. This may be true in part for the unsaved person, but it is obviously not true for the Christian. For one thing, Jesus Christ may return for his own at any moment, in which case death will be avoided. For another, the Christian looks at that saying with the realization that whatever the case may be for others, in his case at least there are things that are far more certain.

We come to a number of these certainties in this particular portion of John's Gospel. They are certainties, Jesus tells us, because they are founded upon the combined wills of God the Father and God the Son. We can gain some feeling for the full strength of this combination of wills by recalling one of the promises that Jesus gave to his followers. He said, "Again, I tell you that if two of you on earth agree about anything you ask for, it will be done for you by my Father in heaven" (Matt. 18:19). If it is true that this shall be done upon earth in regard to our wills (when blessed and guided by the Holy Spirit), how much more true is it that this will be done when the wills of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit are combined.

This, then, is the sense of John 6:40 in which Jesus says, "For my Father's will is that everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." As we try to enter into this text let us look first at the sovereign will of God; second, at the fact that this will is confirmed by Jesus; third, at the areas in which the wills of God the Father and God the Son combine; and fourth, at the truth that God is determined to carry out his will for us now. Our conclusion will be that this good and perfect will of God should be confirmed by everyone who calls himself a Christian.

God's Will

We begin with the sovereign will of God. What are we to say about that will? To begin with, it is beyond and above anything that we can know on this earth; indeed, it is the origin of all things and that according to which all things are ordered. God's will is absolute. It is unlimited. It is determined only by itself. God needs to consult no one in formulating and effecting his plans. God's will is independent. God's will is fixed, for it does not need to adapt to changing circumstances. It controls the circumstances, for it is omnipotent. "I the LORD," says God, "do not change" (Mal. 3:6). James writes that he is "the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). God's will is also irresistible, for he has foretold the end from the beginning and has promised to keep in his care all who come to him.

How would you change God's will? Would you change it for the better? You could not possibly change it for the better, for God's will is holy, just, good, and perfect. You cannot improve on perfection. Would you change it for the worse? Of course not, for we would not want God to be less than perfect even if that were possible.

"This is the will of him who sent me," says Jesus. We read that line, and we are terrified until we go on to read that the will of God is our salvation. Spurgeon wrote, "O God, I tremble at thy will, until I read those lines; I know not what thy will may be, and since I know it must be accomplished I cower down at thy feet in terror until I read that mercy is the Father's will, that love is the Father's will, that salvation is the Father's will, and then my heart flies into thy bosom with ecstasy and joy, to think that thine omnipotent, unchangeable will should be such good will; so full of benevolence, so full of love."

God's Will Confirmed

Second, this section of John tells us that the good and benevolent will of God is confirmed by Jesus. Jesus says, in effect, "Yes, I agree; that is my will also; I pledge myself to see that this perfect and loving will is effected."

Let me illustrate this truth by the way in which a constable of the state might pledge himself as surety for a star witness scheduled to appear in a trial. The witness has been chosen by the court through subpoena. He is in danger, because friends of the man on trial might attempt to have the witness killed to escape the impact of his unfavorable testimony. The judge calls the constable. He says, "I want this witness to appear in court next Friday, and I want nothing to happen to him. I am committing him into your care. See that he appears at 10:30 A.M." The constable receives the witness and becomes surety for him, saying, in effect, "Your will is my will; I pledge myself to see that he appears next Friday at the hour appointed." That is what Jesus does for us, the only difference being that while a witness may be harmed in spite of the constable's care, with Jesus as surety none who are committed to him need ever fear being lost.

Jesus confirmed the will of God in the first instance by going to the cross. He said, "Here I am, I have come—it is written about me in the scroll. To do your will, O my God, is my desire; your law is within my heart" (Ps. 40:7, 8; cf. Heb. 10:7). He further confirms that will by drawing back to himself all who wander, by sanctifying them, and by bringing them irresistibly to that moment when they are presented to the Father without any sin, spot, or wrinkle.

A Sure Salvation

In this section of John, three areas of God's will concerning us are mentioned. First, verse 37 tells us that the will of God is seen in our election. "All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away." Quite clearly, the plain sense of this passage is that God has chosen a great company of persons, all of whom he has given to Christ and all of whom will come to him. The verse further tells us that Jesus confirms this aspect of God's will by promising never to drive away anyone who so comes.

I do not understand why this doctrine is so vigorously resisted by so many, unless it is due to the fact that this is simply unlike man's normal way of thinking and runs against his desires. People have imagined that the responsibility of human beings for their sin is lessened if one speaks of election. But this is not true. It is true that some have preached election in a way that implies that people are not responsible, but this comes from following the dictates of reason rather than the plain teaching of the Word of God. God elects, but we are also responsible. Thus, I can stand in the pulpit and preach anything that an Arminian can preach about man's sin and the necessity for him to surrender his will to the Lord Jesus Christ. If you have not believed on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior, your failure to do so is your own responsibility; you are already, therefore, justly under condemnation. If you would be saved, you must come to Christ. You must do it. You must yield yourself to him. At that same time, I can come to a text like this and declare with equal force that if you do come it is because God chose you in Christ before the foundation of the world and quickened you irresistibly by grace so that your eyes were opened to see who Christ is and your will was moved to embrace him.

Someone has illustrated this by describing the door of salvation as containing two signs. On the outside—"Whosoever will may come." On the in-side—"Chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world." You say, "But am I among the elect?" I do not know. Believe in Christ; I will tell you the answer after you either receive or reject him. If you do believe, it is because the will of God the Father was confirmed by the will of God the Son in your election.

Second, verse 39 tells us that the will of the Father is confirmed by the will of the Son in the matter of our preservation. "And this is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day." This verse tells us that God's will is that no one who believes in Jesus Christ should ever be lost. It tells us that Jesus confirmed this will of his Father by promising to raise up all who do believe at the last day.

I find it interesting that the promise is literally that Christ will lose "nothing" or "no thing." This certainly means "none," but the fact that the pronoun is neuter suggests more than this. The meaning is that not even one part of those who have believed in Jesus will be left behind. It is not a soul salvation about which Jesus Christ is talking; it is a whole salvation. We are to be saved spirit, soul, and body. This text reminds us of God's promise to Moses at the time of the Jewish exodus from Egypt. When God delivered the people, he did not deliver some and leave the rest behind. He did not deliver the people and leave their property behind. The promise was, "There shall not a hoof be left behind." So also for us the promise is that nothing that concerns any one of us will be lost.

Finally, the will of God is confirmed by Jesus in the matter of our entering into a new quality of life now. Verses 39-40 say, "And this is the will of him who sent me, that everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him may have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Eternal life is a present possession. Hence, this verse adds to the preceding thought of the keeping power of God the equally important thought that God is determined to accomplish his will in us now. We must not think that God begins a work in us at the moment of our initial faith in Christ, completes it at the moment of our death, but is completely indifferent to what happens to us in the meantime. That is absurd and unbiblical. On the contrary, the fact that God has placed his own, eternal and everlasting life within us is evidence that his will extends to the way we live, think, act, and grow now.

God Is Determined

Other verses also teach this. Philippians 1:6 is one: "Being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus." This verse states that God is determined to carry out his plan in a Christian through this life until the moment in which the Christian dies or Jesus returns to take him home. Romans 8:28 and 29 also speak of God's present purpose in the life of a Christian: "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers."

This is a remarkable statement if we really understand it. To put the matter bluntly, it means that God's great purpose (of which our election, calling, and preservation are only a part) is to make each person who believes in Jesus Christ like Jesus. It means that God is so delighted with his Son that he has created and called millions of sinful men to himself in order that he might reproduce Jesus Christ in them and so populate the universe with millions of Christs where there was only one before. This does not mean that we will become divine. God is still God. We are his children, parts of his creation. But it does mean that we will be like him, like Jesus. This is the point in the whole matter of our present transformation.

I do not think this means that we will become increasingly aware of how good we are becoming. The opposite will be true. We will become increasingly aware of how sinful we are—like Paul, who early in his career called himself "the least of the apostles" (that is, he humbly called himself "number 13") but who toward the close of his life saw himself to be the "chief of sinners" (1 Cor. 15:9; 1 Tim. 1:15; cf. Eph. 3:8). We will not be conscious of increasing holiness. But we will be becoming more like Jesus even in becoming more aware of our sin. And we will be giving Christ more and more control over us so that his life will be seen in us increasingly. To put it in other words, it also means that what the Bible calls the fruits of the Spirit will be seen—"love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control" (Gal. 5:22-23). This, too, is an aspect of God's will confirmed by Jesus.

There is a somber side to this subject, however. It comes from the fact that there will inevitably be times when the sovereign and irresistible will of God comes into conflict with our wills and we will attempt to resist the inevitable. When this happens, God will begin to deal with us, and his dealings will become sharper and sharper until we return to the path in which he has determined we shall go.

In the world of science today everyone is talking about the theory of continental drift that seems to be increasingly confirmed by various types of core samplings of the earth and by accurate measurement of positions upon the earth's surface. According to this theory, the world's surface (both above and below water) is divided into large segments called plates. These plates are slowly and ponderously moving. Thus, to give an example, North and South America are part of one plate, and this is moving away from the plate on which Europe rests at a rate of about one inch per year. On the western coast of the United States, this same plate is being passed by the enormous plate that underlies the Pacific Ocean. In this case the rate of drift is quicker, scientists estimating that adjustment along the edge is between four and eight inches annually. No one understands the forces that cause the great land masses to move. But they do move, and the movement is both fixed and irresistible.

The force of my illustration lies in the fact that earthquakes generally occur along the lines where these plates meet, but—and this is important—not at every point along the line. The San Andreas fault is an example. At places there have been violent earthquakes such as the San Francisco earthquake of 1906, or (farther south) the earthquake that devasted Managua, Nicaragua, in December of 1972. At other places along the same line there have never been earthquakes, and there will apparently never be any. What is the difference? The difference is simply that in the places where there are great earthquakes the edges of the two land masses lock in place and resist the movement. Pressure builds up; eventually the adjustment comes suddenly. In 1857, the Pacific side of the San Andreas fault jumped forward as much as 30 feet in the area of Fort Tejon near Los Angeles. On the other hand, in places where there are no earthquakes the land masses do not lock, and the adjustment is gradual. Geologists refer to the movement along these areas as creep.

May I apply that to the will of God for your life? God's will is as irresistible for you as the movements of the great, continental plates. We may not understand God's will, but it moves anyway and at its self-determined rate. What will you do? Will you resist it? If you do, the forces will build up and God will make the adjustment violently in your life. Or will you yield to it gradually? You will as by God's grace your eyes are opened daily to see his way and walk in it.

Chapter 84.
Murmurs of Disbelief

John 6:41-47

It is one of the surest facts of Christianity that when the doctrines of man's total spiritual depravity and the necessity for God's electing grace in salvation are preached there will be resentment by many who hear them. That was true in Christ's day, and it is true in our own. Moreover, we do not have to go far to find either contemporary or historical examples.

The Jewish Leaders

In Christ's day this is precisely what happened. So we are not surprised to find that Jesus' teaching about the necessity for God's grace in salvation, which we have in John 6:35-40, is immediately followed by an outbreak of protest and resentment by certain of the leaders of Israel. The author of the Gospel reports the moment by writing, "At this the Jews began to grumble about him because he said, 'I am the bread that came down from heaven.' They said, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How can he say, "I came down from heaven?"'" (vv. 41-42).

In these verses we have a change of persons from the verses that have gone before, and probably a change of place. Up to this point Jesus has been speaking in the open to the crowds that had followed him from the other side of the Sea of Galilee to Capernaum. Now he is speaking to the leaders who had heard his teaching, and probably speaking in the synagogue of Capernaum, as is suggested by verse 59. In this discussion Jesus restates his teaching and supports it by evidence both from the Old Testament and from experience.

The first thing we are told, however, is that the Jewish leaders "grumbled about him." The King James Version uses the word "murmur." What does that mean? To understand what that means and to understand how close it comes to what we do in our relationship to the gospel, we must realize that the word "murmur" is one of those unique words in the English language that exist solely because they sound like the thing they describe. "Hiss" is such a word. "Tinkle" is another;

"buzz" is a third. Such words are often used in poetry because of their unique character. One of the earliest examples of this device (known technically as onomatopoeia) is in Aristophenes' play The Frogs, in which one of the lines given to those who represent the frogs sounds like frogs croaking. Aristophenes wrote:

> Brekekekex co-ax, co-ax!

A better known example in the English language is Edgar Allan Poe's poem "The Bells." To some degree the whole poem is built on this device, but these lines will be an example:

> Hear the tolling of > the bells, Iron > bells!
> What a world of solemn thought their > monody compells! In the silence of > the night
> How we shiver with affright
> At the melancholy menace of their tone!

In this stanza the words chosen by Poe suggest the matter being described. In exactly the same way then, murmur suggests by its sound what people do when they disagree with someone and protest what he is saying. Murmuring is the confused sound that runs through a crowd when people are angry and in opposition to some teaching. This is what the leaders of Christ's day were doing in regard to Christ's teachings. Others do it in our day. In fact, it is a sin that few, if any, are preserved from.

Christ's Answer

It is interesting, too, that the objections of the Jewish leaders took the form of a criticism of Christ's person rather than a direct criticism of his teachings. They did not say, let us notice, "There are three reasons why we cannot agree with you and why we consider your views to be wrong." Christ's teaching was too consistent and too self-authenticating for that. Instead, they attacked him personally, saying, in effect, "Don't listen to him. He is a nobody from the sticks of Galilee, the son of a carpenter named Joseph. Listen to us." In this they revealed their consummate snobbishness, demonstrated their pride, and revealed their ignorance. The irony is that they did not recognize at all that there had been a virgin birth and that Christ's true Father was God.

What did Jesus answer? It is important to notice that Jesus did not answer by defending himself on the personal level, as we might like to do. He could have done it, of course. But instead of this he returned to his teaching and restated it, giving two proofs. This was a challenge to his hearers to investigate his teaching for themselves. Finally, after having restated his teaching and given his proofs, Jesus stated the doctrine again for the final time. The verses that contain this read as follows: "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him, and I will raise him up at the last day. It is written in the Prophets, 'They will all be taught by God.' Everyone who listens to the Father and learns from him comes to me. No one has seen the Father except the one who is from God; only he has seen the Father. I tell you the truth, he who believes in me has everlasting life" (vv. 44-47).

We need to take these statements one at a time. First, Jesus repeats what he had said earlier, but here he does so in even sharper language. Before, he had said, "You have seen me and still you do not believe. All that the Father gives me will come to me" (vv. 36-37). This implies that no one can come, apart from a special act of God on his behalf, but it does not say this negatively. Now Christ does. "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him."

This verse is so straightforward in its language that it has always been a battleground between those who are willing to accept the doctrine of election here taught by Christ and those who resist it on rational or humanistic grounds. It was discussed by Augustine and Pelagius, by Calvin and Arminius, by Luther and Erasmus.

The latter case is particularly interesting. Erasmus had been led to attack Martin Luther's teaching on the total spiritual depravity of man in a volume centering on the nature of the human will and on whether it can function in turning a man or a woman to God. Erasmus said it could. Moreover, he answered the obvious objection based on the argument of Christ in this verse—the objection that no one can come to Christ except the Father draw him—by saying that God draws people in the same way that an owner of a donkey might get it to move by holding a handful of carrots before its nose. The man draws, but obviously the will of the donkey is involved. According to this theory, God originates salvation but man nevertheless cooperates in it.

This may make good sense to the natural human way of thinking. But it is not what Scripture teaches, and Luther said so quite openly. What better drawing could there be, Luther argued, than the drawing of the Lord Jesus Christ himself? He was present among the people. He taught them personally. Still they did not come. In fact, they killed him. Luther concluded, "The ungodly does not 'come' even when he hears the word, unless the Father draws and teaches him inwardly; which he does by shedding abroad his Spirit. When that happens, there follows a 'drawing' other than that which is outward; Christ is then displayed by the enlightening of the Spirit, and by it man is rapt to Christ with the sweetest rapture, he being passive while God speaks, teaches and draws, rather than seeking or running himself."

This was a good answer, of course. But we can go even further than this on the basis of Christ's statement. Luther's key word in answering Erasmus was "passive." He said that man was passive spiritually, inert, as inert as a dead man might be, if we may use that image. In John 6:44, however, there is in addition to this truth the thought that man also actually resists the work of God within. That is, he is not only passive; he also is perverse and obstinate.

We see this truth in the word that is chosen to speak of the Father's work in "drawing" a man or a woman to Christ. This word always implies resistance to the power that draws. William Barclay gives a number of examples of this in his devotional studies on John's Gospel. He shows that it is the word for drawing a heavily laden net to the shore, a net filled with a great number of fish (John 21:6, 11). It is the word that is used of Paul and Silas being dragged before the civil authorities in Philippi (Acts 16:19). It is used for drawing a sword from the belt or from its scabbard (John 18:10). Always there is the idea of resistance. So here also there is the idea that men and women resist God.

Curiously, however, Barclay adds that "God can and does draw men, but man's resistance can defeat the pull of God." The curious thing about this statement, though, is that not one of his examples shows the resistance to be successful. The fish do get to shore. Paul and Silas are dragged before the magistrates. The sword is withdrawn. Indeed, we can go even further than this. As Leon Morris notes in his commentary, "There is not one example in the New Testament of the use of this verb where the resistance is successful. Always the drawing power is triumphant, as here." People resist. In this their depravity is seen. But the power of God always overcomes the resistance in those whom he has determined before the foundation of the world to give to Jesus.

Is this discouraging? Not at all. Actually, the fact that God does draw men and women to Christ in spite of themselves is our hope.

Evidence

At this point the Lord Jesus Christ gives two points of evidence to support his teaching. He did not need to give evidence, of course. His word was sufficient. Nevertheless, in speaking to these religious leaders he does support his statement—first, by a reference to the Old Testament, and then, second, by an appeal to experience.

His reference to the Old Testament actually is a partial quotation of Isaiah 54:13. Jesus says, "It is written in the Prophets, 'They will all be taught by God'" (John 6:45). As it stands in John's Gospel, we might read this verse with the thought that the "all" in the quotation applies to all men, thereby thinking that somehow God illuminates all, and men either come to Christ or refuse to come to Christ on their own volition. The full text, as Isaiah wrote it, shows that this is not the case. Actually, Isaiah wrote, "And all your children will be taught by the LORD." We see at once that the verse applies to God's children only, not to all men, and that it implies that one must first be a child of God through the new birth before one can really understand about Christ and come to him.

Jesus then goes on to show that this truth is also confirmed by experience: "Everyone who listens to and learns from the Father comes to me." Why is it that you and I can present the gospel to some people and never seem to get anywhere, even when the circumstances seem entirely favorable? And why is it that others with maximum problems and limited understanding believe? The only answer is that God has taught the one person and has not taught the other. Moreover, all whom God has taught do come to Jesus.

Life before Faith

Finally, after having stated his teaching and having given two points of evidence to support it, Jesus repeats his teaching about the necessity of God's grace in election a final time. He says, "I tell you the truth, he who believes has everlasting life" (v. 47).

I know there are many who have interpreted this verse in direct opposition to all that I have been saying. They have supposed that we are first to believe, after which, as a result of our having believed, we are given eternal life. But this would mean taking the verse in a way that would contradict all Christ's previous teaching. Actually, it is a summation of it all.

Perhaps this illustration, often used by Donald Grey Barnhouse, will help. We must imagine a battlefield over which troops are advancing in order to take a ridge that is just before them. Suddenly heavy fire opens up, and immediately the soldiers fall to the ground and hold their prone position until the enemy fire is silenced. Imagine further that all the soldiers are either dead, or alive and unwounded. When the firing stops the command comes once again to advance. Naturally, some of the soldiers do get up and move forward while others, the ones who are dead, do not. Why is it that the ones who do get up and advance get up? It is because they are alive and hear the voice of their commander. Does their getting up give them life? Of course not! It is rather the other way around. In the same way, he that "believes" on Christ does so because he already has "everlasting life." The hearing and believing are the marks of the existence of the new life of God implanted within the individual.

If you are not yet a Christian, this doctrine applies to you in the sense that the grace of God in election is your hope. There is no hope in yourself, either in your spiritual attainments or in your ability. In yourself you cannot even choose Christ. How wonderful, then, that God is able to do what you cannot do. He can draw you. Be cheered by that and prove that he is already at work in your life by coming to him.

On the other hand, if you are a Christian already, I challenge you to allow these great doctrines to have their proper and transforming place in your heart. I am convinced that to accept the principles of Christ's teaching in this chapter of John's Gospel would necessarily involve both a mental and spiritual revolution for many thousands of Christians at the present time. It would certainly involve a radically different approach to preaching and the practice of evangelism, as well as to most other parts of church life and theology. The great question is this: Will the Almighty God of the Christian Scriptures be our God? Or will our God be something less, something tailored to our own greatly limited horizons? Let us have the God of the Lord Jesus Christ, of Augustine, Luther, Calvin, and countless others, as our God. Let us stand with them in giving all might, majesty, dominion, power, and all glory in the matter of our salvation from beginning to end to that God only.

Chapter 85.
The Two Mannas

John 6:48-51

Several years ago I heard a story about a Scotsman who was coming to America. He had purchased passage on one of the great ocean liners. He did not have much money, so he decided to save on food by stocking up on crackers, cheese, and fruit before his departure. The ship sailed, and he began to eat his Spartan meals. This went fairly well for the first four or five days. But as the ship drew closer to New York the crackers became increasingly stale, the cheese became moldy, and the fruit spoiled. Finally there was nothing left that was fit to eat. The Scotsman decided that he would go to the dining room and have one last, good meal before the liner docked in Manhattan and he went ashore. Imagine his surprise to discover that nothing in the dining room cost anything and that all that he could ever have eaten had already been included in the price of his ticket before he left the British Isles!

Unfortunately, this is the way in which thousands of men and women act toward the true bread of life that is offered to us without price in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is there for all. But the sad fact is that many would rather feed upon the dry crackers of human philosophy or the spoiled fruit of good works than come to him.

Jesus said, "I am the bread of life. Your forefathers ate manna in the desert, yet they died. But here is the bread that comes down from heaven, which a man may eat and not die. I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever. This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (John 6:48-51). We will enter into the full meaning of these verses when we recognize that in them Jesus Christ voices a great claim, makes a requirement, and offers a wonderful promise.

Christ's Claim

The claim that the Lord Jesus makes in these verses is, quite simply, to be the "bread of life." It is the second time in this chapter that he has described himself by this image, and the image itself constitutes the first of the great "I am" sayings that are a characteristic of this Gospel. Here Jesus is portrayed as the bread of life. Later he will say: "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5), "I am the gate" (10:7, 9), "I am the good shepherd" (10:11, 14), "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25), "I am the way and the truth and the life" (14:6), "I am the true vine" (15:1, 5).

By these images he shows that he is all that men and women need and that he is the sole way to come to God the Father.

Another way of setting the context for this saying is to notice that it is the third great Old Testament image that has been appropriated as a description of who Jesus Christ is and what he does. In chapter 1 Jesus has used the figure of Jacob's ladder upon which the angels of God were ascending and descending from heaven. This suggests that Jesus is the One through whom God the Father is revealed to men. In chapter 3 he is the brazen serpent that Moses lifted up in the wilderness. Here the crucifixion is portrayed, that work by which men and women are healed from the serpent bite of sin. Now he is the bread of life, the new manna, by which the new people of God are fed during the years of their desert wandering. There are two mannas, of course. There is the manna upon which the Jewish people fed in the wilderness under the direction of Moses. This manna sustained physical life for a time; but even this physical life did not go on forever, and eventually all who had eaten this literal manna died. There is also the manna that Jesus gives. This bread imparts and sustains that kind of life that will go on forever.

What does it mean when Jesus claims to be the bread of life? It means that he is able to satisfy the deepest needs and longings of the human soul. He is able to satisfy your needs, your longings, whatever they may be.

This does not mean that Jesus is going to satisfy every want or desire you may have or think you have. It means that he will satisfy that which you most deeply need. You say, "But aren't those two the same thing?" No, I do not think so. Let me give an example. Take a child who is beginning to grow up with a highly sharpened sense of what he "needs," as most children do. He thinks he needs candy—about every hour or so throughout the day. He thinks he needs to stay up to watch the late, late show on television. He thinks he needs to be able to set his own schedule—get up when he wants to, go in and out with his friends when he wants to, come to dinner when he wants to. He thinks he needs leisure time, particularly when he is asked to straighten up his room or help his mother with the dishes. All these items are "needs" from the child's point of view. But if the parent indulges the child in these, all he will produce is an unruly and obnoxious brat. What is more, when he grows up the child will attempt to inflict his unrestrained desires on everyone else and may well end up in jail.

What is it that the child needs? It is not what the child thinks he needs. Actually, the child needs discipline. He needs a standard of right and wrong conduct and someone to insist on that standard. He needs to be loved, to have goals, guidance, and encouragement.

In the same way, our real needs often differ from our imagined needs, and it is our real needs for which Jesus Christ is the answer. We find salvation in him. In him we have eternal life. We also are loved, receive goals and guidance, and are encouraged in life. "I am the bread of life," said Jesus. The implication is that we should feed upon him and grow.

In this chapter Jesus gives what would be called in theology a "progressive revelation" of himself as the bread. It is as though he held the mystery of himself as the bread in his hand and then slowly opened his hand one finger at a time so that those who were listening to him would see the truth gradually. First, he spoke of a bread from heaven that the Father gives to men (v. 32). This was the opening of the first finger. After the curiosity of the crowd had been aroused Jesus opened another finger by pointing out that he was the bread about which he was speaking (vv. 35, 48). Finally, in the verses that we are considering, he opens his hand the whole way and shows that the bread is his body that will be given up in death for men and women. He says,
"And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (v. 51).

I am glad that Jesus went on to speak of the cross, because Christ without the cross is of no use to us. We can look to his example, to the way he led his life. We can admire it. But the life alone does not help. We can admire the life, but we cannot live it. Besides, we are condemned by that life, for it is the standard of what God would require of us as his creatures. A Christ without the cross is of no use to us. He condemns us. Fortunately, there is more. For Jesus went on to speak of the cross and eventually to die upon it and rise again. Now there is hope. He died for our sin. The chastisement of our peace is upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. In his resurrection life we now have life. In his righteousness, through his death, we are now reckoned righteous in the sight of a holy and loving God.

To understand these things is to understand not only why Christ is truly the bread that came down from heaven but also why he is necessary for spiritual life.

The Requirement

These verses not only contain Christ's claim, which is a great claim; they also make a requirement. The requirement is that we feed upon him. This means to believe on Jesus, commit your life to him, take him into yourself so that he becomes a part of you and you of him. It is precisely the same act that is spoken of in verse 37, where we are encouraged to "come" to Christ, knowing that those who come to him will never be cast out. Have you come? I do not mean, do you know about Christ? Many people know about Christ but have never come to him. The devil knows about him but hates him. I mean, have you committed your life to him so that now your life, properly speaking, belongs to Jesus? If not, you need to say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I want you to know that I accept all the things said in Scripture about my sin and my need of you. I know that I am not holy. I recognize that I cannot please you by my own efforts. At the same time, I recognize that you died for me on the cross two thousand years ago, and I want that death to stand for my death. I want to be yours. Receive me now as one of your followers, as your child."

Men and women have used many different words as they have prayed along these lines. Many who read this have come in different ways and have said different words as they have come. Still, at its heart the experience is the same. It is the experience of letting go of anything that you might present, in order that your hands might be empty to receive that righteousness that Jesus Christ gives. There is no substitute for that. If you have not done that, you are not a Christian, no matter how much you may know about the Christian faith. On the other hand, if you have done that, then you are already a Christian and know that God has placed his eternal life within you and will keep you until the last day.

What I have been saying is born out in a forceful way by this imagery of eating. Think what eating involves. First, it is necessary. Other things are necessary too, but not to the same degree. A person might argue that exercise is necessary. Yes, it is good for you. But if you do not eat, before long you are not going to be able to do your exercises. Someone else might argue that the life of the mind is necessary. I agree. But if you fail to eat, pretty soon you will not even be able to sit up and read or think clearly. You must eat to live. So, spiritually, you must eat of the Lord Jesus Christ if you are to come to life spiritually and grow strong.

How do you feed upon Christ? It is through studying the Bible. That is one reason why I place such a strong emphasis upon a systematic study of the Word of God on the Bible Study Hour. It is why in my church I comment upon the Scripture readings at each of the services, as well as preach the sermon. It is why I encourage area Bible studies in which people can meet informally to learn and grow together as they eat and digest the Word. These are tools by which you and I can feed upon Jesus. There is no substitute for them.

If we use the Word, God will bring us into contact with Jesus. He will use it to bring to our minds what we most need to know; he will reveal sin in us and correct it; and he will most certainly lead us in the way that we should go.

Then, too, eating is always a response to a need that is felt. In physical terms the need is for nourishment and the feeling of the need for nourishment is hunger. It is the same spiritually. When does a person come to the Lord Jesus Christ as Savior or for daily feeding after he has believed on him initially? It is when he has recognized his need. If you consider yourself allsufficient spiritually—sufficient for this life and for the next—then it is not likely that you will come to the Lord Jesus Christ. However, if you have tried the allurements of this world and have found them to be empty, as many have, then there will be within you that sense of inner need and hunger that will drive you toward Jesus. If you have been reading the Bible, God will show you that need for holiness that will turn you to him.

At one point in my ministry I was talking with a number of young people who had seen other young people turn to sexual indulgences as a means of satisfying the hunger they felt in their hearts. It had a hold upon them, as sin always does. They enjoyed it. They did not see how they could possibly stay away from this style of life. It was everything to them. But the interesting thing is that they were not happy. They were miserable. There is an old saying, "If you're so smart, why ain't you rich?" We could also say, "If sex is the way, why aren't you happy?" These young people needed to recognize that any way that is not God's way—that is divorced from Jesus Christ—is empty. They needed to see that Jesus is the bread that satisfies.

How I wish I could make that clear! Jesus is the only One who satisfies. You will never have to go far to find those who say the opposite. Madison Avenue exists for no other reason than to say the opposite. It says it all the time. Buy a car; you'll be happy. Take this vacation; you'll be happy. Use a detergent; you'll be happy. But it is not so. Do not permit yourself to be sold a bill of goods spiritually. Real joy comes from knowing the great God of the universe in Jesus Christ and from glorifying him forever.

Third, eating involves appropriation. Knowledge is not enough. It is possible to sit down at a banquet and identify all the dishes and even be able to address them by their French names—all the way from the potage de legumes to the crepes suzette. But if you do not or will not eat of them, they do you no good whatsoever. In the same way, it is possible to understand Christian doctrine so well that you can tell where everyone else is wrong—where Barth is wrong, where Brunner is wrong, where Boice is wrong—but you are still lost unless you appropriate Jesus Christ personally.

That, of course, leads to the last significant point about eating. It must be personal. You must eat. No one else can do it for you. It also is true in regard to your relationship to the Lord Jesus. You cannot get along by saying, "Well, my husband believes ... my wife believes ... my children or my parents believe." The question is: Do you believe? Are you feeding on Jesus? I hope that you will never cheat your wife or husband or children or parents by asking them to do something that you refuse to do personally, but rather will give them the best of yourself by allowing God to make you into the kind of person he has always planned for you to be.

Life or Death

The last point is involved in all that has been said previously. It has to do with believing or not believing in Jesus. What are the issues? They are "life" and "death." It is not just a matter of a little bit of happiness versus more happiness or partial satisfaction versus greater satisfaction. It is life versus death. To know Jesus is to live—now and eternally. To refuse him is suicide.

There is no greater issue to be faced by anyone in the course of a normal human existence. Will you have life? God is the source of life; he gives it abundantly. Or will you choose that eternal death that comes from making yourself, rather than your Creator and Redeemer, the center of your spiritual horizons?

Do not do what the prodigal son did. He thought that he was going to find life when he left his father to enjoy himself in the city. We would say in today's jargon that he was determined to "live it up." So he took his inheritance and squandered it on riotous living. Did he find life? No, he found a life that to a Jew was a symbol of death. He was feeding unclean animals. When did life begin for the prodigal? Only when he saw his need, left his willful past behind him, and returned to his father. I covet that for you if you are one who has never really surrendered your will to Jesus and returned to him. Will you not come to him? Jesus is wonderful. He really is. He wants the best for you. Why do you not walk in that way willingly?

Chapter 86.
Food Indeed and Drink Indeed

John 6:52-59

Years ago, before the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. revised its Book of Order and with it the vows that were taken by ministers at their ordination, there was a phrase concerning "the peace, purity, and unity of the Church," which all who became ministers agreed to encourage. They promised to "study" these points, which meant to advance them. The difficulty lay in the fact that it was not always possible to promote the peace and purity of the church concurrently. Peace could be maintained without purity. Purity could be achieved without peace and unity. But to do both at the same time was difficult. The reason was that truth always will have enemies and that pure doctrine always will be opposed. Actually, I would go so far as to affirm as a rule of Christian experience that strong teaching of strong doctrine will inevitably produce discord in some Quarter.

This is not experience limited to our own time either. It goes back to the time of the Lord Jesus Christ. An example is found in the verses that immediately follow Jesus' claim to be able to give his flesh for the life of the world.

Jesus had said, "I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever. This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (v. 51).

This bothered those who were listening to him, with the result (so we read) that they "began to argue sharply among themselves, 'How can this man give us his flesh to eat?'" (v. 52). This time, however, Jesus repeated his claim in even stronger terms. He said, "I tell you the truth, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you. Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is real food and my blood is real drink. Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him. Just as the living Father sent me and

I live because of the Father, so the one who feeds on me will live because of me. This is the bread that came down from heaven. Your forefathers ate manna and died, but he who feeds on this bread will live forever" (vv. 5558).

It is interesting as an insight into the problems of our own times, that in answering those who were in conflict over his teaching Jesus did not try to tone down the teaching to make it more palatable. If anything, he did the opposite. It would seem, then—to make a conclusion—that, according to Jesus, truth concerning doctrine leading to a genuine peace, rather than peace at the expense of doctrine, was to prevail.

Not the Lord's Supper

But what do these words mean? What does it mean to eat Christ's flesh and drink his blood? If we are to understand them, we must begin first by realizing that they do not refer—as many, including Raymond E. Brown in his comprehensive commentary for the Anchor Bible series, have believed them to refer—to the Lord's Supper or the communion service.

Many have looked at the sixth chapter of John in this way, of course, particularly those whose theology gives a high and mystical value to the sacraments. Generally speaking, there have been three major views of the Lord's Supper. The first is highly literal. It is the view of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox communions, as well as of some high church Anglicans and Episcopalians. According to these churchmen, the bread and the wine of the communion service are literally transformed into the flesh and blood of Jesus Christ by an ordained priest and thus become, at least to some, a reenactment of Christ's sacrifice. Clearly, to those who take such a position, the words of Christ in John 6 must refer to the mass, or Eucharist. They literally describe what is happening. The worshiper literally feeds on the Lord.

The second view of the Lord's Supper is that it is a mere memorial or testimonial. This understanding focuses on the words "Do this in remembrance of me" and on Paul's statement "For whenever you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26). Certainly, there is truth in this view, but it is weak in that it does not indicate how Jesus can be present in any special way to those taking part in the service.

The third view, which was the view of John Calvin and of the Reformed church bodies, is that Jesus is actually present in the communion service but that he is present spiritually, not in any physical way. Calvin called this understanding the doctrine of the "real presence." We often say, in speaking of God, that God is everywhere present. It does not mean that he is physically present in physical objects, for that would be pantheism. It means that he is present spiritually. We also say that God is present in a special way with those who are his children; that is, he dwells within them. So he is present in Christians in some ways more than he is in the world. Moreover, even as Christians we often say that God is with us more at some times than at others, by which we mean (I assume) that we are more aware of his presence or that the lines of communication are more open. It is in this same progression but in an added sense that we speak of the real presence of Jesus Christ in the Lord's Supper. This presence is spiritual. It is, therefore, received spiritually, which is to say, by faith.

These, then, are the three great understandings of the meaning of the Lord's Supper which have prevailed in the church and according to which, particularly in the first instance, the sayings of Jesus in John 6 have been interpreted.

It is my view, however, that the Lord's Supper is not in consideration in these verses at all. Why?

First, because at the time of the speaking of these words the Lord's Supper was not yet instituted.

Second, because Jesus was addressing unbelievers in John 6, while the Lord's Supper is for Christians only. Third, because the eating and drinking spoken of in John is unto salvation, while the eating and drinking that is part of the Lord's Supper is for those who are already saved, and speaks of fellowship, growth, and communion. Fourth, because the Lord's Supper does not produce those results that are here attributed to the eating and drinking of Christ. This last is the greatest reason, for it is perfectly obvious that many thousands of persons partake each week of the Lord's Supper and yet do not possess that eternal life that Jesus says results from a true feeding upon him.

Feeding on Christ

If it is true, then, that the eating and drinking that Jesus speaks of in John 6 does not refer to the Lord's Supper, to what does it refer? Or, to put it in other language, what does it mean to feed upon Jesus? The answer to this question is that eating Christ's flesh and drinking his blood refer to that which Jesus has been speaking of all along. He has said that men and women must "believe" in him (vv. 29, 35, 47). They must "come" to him (v. 35). They must "look at" him (v. 40). They must "listen" and "learn from" him (v. 45). All these terms—believe, come, listen, learn—refer to what we would most naturally call faith. The last terms—"eating and drinking"— stress that the commitment that is involved in faith is as real, irrevocable, and productive of results as any literal eating or drinking.

Have you committed yourself to Jesus Christ so that he has become as real to you as that? Is he as real to you spiritually as something you can taste or handle? Is he as much a part of you as that which you eat? Do not think me blasphemous when I say that he must be as real and as useful to you as a hamburger and french fries. I say this because, although he is obviously far more real and useful than these, the unfortunate thing is that for many people he is much less.

If Jesus has not become as real to you as eating and drinking, let me suggest that you do something similar to that which a bride does in promising herself to her husband. Before the ceremony the bride can do anything she likes. In fact, if she wants to, she can even cancel the whole wedding, for she can decide even at 1:58 that she has made a mistake and cannot go through with a 2:00 ceremony. However, when the ceremony begins she comes to the place where she speaks her vows and, on the basis of those vows and those of her husband, is pronounced a wife, his wife. She is now no longer her own. At the same time, her groom pronounces his vows to her, and he becomes hers no less than she becomes his.

Apply this now to him who is the faithful lover and bridegroom of the church, and to you and me who are his bride. It is he who has courted us and wooed us. We did not choose him. It is he who has pronounced the vows first of all. His vows were pronounced in eternity long before the foundation of the world. He said, "I, Jesus, take you, John Smith (Mary Jones, or whatever your name may be), to be my wedded wife. And I do promise and covenant, before God and these witnesses, to be your loving and faithful husband, in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for time and for eternity." We looked up into his loving face and eyes, believed his promise, and repeated his vow.

In the case of the church something great happened between the speaking of this promise by Christ and our repetition of it. Between his vow and our vow, Jesus went to the cross where he paid an infinite price for our sin, purchasing us so that we could be free of sin, guilt, and shame as we come to him. We see his sacrifice. With that in mind we repeat, "I, sinner, take you, Jesus, to be my wedded husband. And I do promise and covenant, before God and these witnesses, to be your loving and faithful wife, in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for eternity."

That is what faith is. That is what it means to eat Christ's flesh and drink his blood. It is to commit yourself to him. It is to accept his promise and pledge on your behalf and to repeat his promise, vowing to be his for eternity. If you have done that, you have done the most important thing there is to be done in this life, regardless of what you may already have accomplished or may yet accomplish. If you have not, you should know that today is the day of salvation. Today is the day of your union with Christ, if you will have it so.

Results of Feeding

There is one more point that we must see in studying these verses. It is that there are certain results that come from feeding upon Jesus. The verses suggest three of them.

First, we receive the certainty of our salvation. This result is seen primarily in verse 54, where we are told of the gift of eternal life and of Christ's promise to raise us up at the last day. What is eternal life? Some who have disagreed with the doctrine of eternal security, the doctrine that no one who has come to Christ will ever be lost, have stressed that the eternal life that we receive in salvation is a special quality of life, rather than life of infinite duration. But while I would not deny for a moment that eternal life is a life of special quality, I am convinced that we must also go on to say that it is indeed eternal. Eternal life is the life of God. It is without end because he is without end. This truth is certainly affirmed in this passage, for Jesus immediately follows his mention of the gift of eternal life with the promise that he will raise up those who have been given eternal life at the last day (so also in verses 39, 40, and 44). What a great promise! How good to know that nothing will ever separate us from the One who loves us and who has taught us to love!

Second, we enter into a life-transforming union with Christ as a result of coming to him. This thought is expressed in verse 56, where the idea of union with Christ is mentioned for the first time in John's Gospel. It will become very prominent later, particularly in the last discourses. Here Jesus says, "Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him." What does it mean that we are joined to Christ and he to us? The fact that we are joined to Christ means that we have a change in our life and status. Let us go back to the wedding illustration. Before the wedding the bride has one status; afterward she has another. For one thing, there is the change in her name. Henceforth, she will bear her husband's name. There is a change in her legal status. Before, she could buy or sell property as she chose. Now there must be joint signatures. There is a psychological change; she senses a subtle difference between being single and being married. There is a social change that will penetrate even to the matter of who her friends will be, whom she will entertain, how her time will be spent, and other matters. When do these changes take place? The answer is that they take place instantly and simultaneously in the moment when she is joined to her husband. So it is spiritually. At the moment when we are joined to Christ through faith and by the new birth, we receive a new name—we are now Mrs. Christian instead of Miss Sinner—and a new way of life with new relationships and obligations is opened before us.

On the other side, the fact that Christ is joined to us means primarily that we receive his life and are to go on receiving it in increasing abundance throughout eternity. We are to be filled, as Paul says, with "all the fullness of God" (Eph. 3:19). Right now we are a bit like a quart bottle that has been filled with seawater. It is real seawater, but not much is in the bottle. But suppose you were able to enlarge the bottle so that it would contain a gallon. In that case, you could then put in three more quarts of seawater. The larger the bottle became, the more water it could hold—until, if it were big enough, it could conceivably be filled with all the fullness of the sea itself. In the same way, God promises to enlarge our spiritual capacities until the full life of the infinite Christ is reproduced in us.

Finally, the words of Jesus suggest that we receive strength for the living of this life as we feed upon him. He says, "So the one who feeds on me will live because of me" (v. 57). This verse is not talking about eternal life primarily; it is talking about our present daily life to be lived in Christ's power. Galatians 2:20 is another statement of that principle. "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

Do you live by that life of the Lord Jesus Christ? That life is there in all its strength and purity. It is there to feed upon. By that life and that life alone we can grow.

Chapter 87.
Discipleship Tested by Doctrine

John 6:60-65

After the Lord Jesus Christ had left Judea, where he had encountered hostility, and had gone into Galilee, it seemed that for a time people were attracted to his teaching and were flocking around him. He had performed miracles in Galilee—turning the water into wine at Cana, healing the nobleman's son, multiplying the loaves and fish by the side of the Sea of Tiberias. This had attracted so much attention that for a time as many as five thousand people followed Jesus to hear his teachings. In a short while, however, the real nature of his claims became apparent.

When this happened, many of his followers went back and no longer walked with him. We see the beginning of this toward the end of the sixth chapter of John's Gospel.

How did the ministry go in Galilee? Exactly as it had gone in Judea. The Lord Jesus Christ had been popular. Many had followed him. Then, as he began to teach, his doctrine became the measure of his followers' discipleship, and most dropped away. John, therefore, concludes the chapter by showing what happened, not among Christ's professed enemies but among his apparent adherents—the general company of his followers (v. 60) and the Twelve (v. 67).

Hard Sayings

If we are to profit from this section of the Gospel, we must be very clear in our understanding of why those who had appeared to be disciples dropped away. John says, "On hearing it, many of his disciples said, 'This is a hard teaching. Who can accept it?'" And he adds, "Aware that his disciples were grumbling about this, Jesus said to them, 'Does this offend you?'" (vv. 60-61). The reason lies in the fact that Christ's teachings were "hard" to accept. The Greek word is sklēros, and it clearly does not mean "hard to understand." It means "hard to tolerate."

So long as Christ's followers could not understand him, they stayed around and asked questions. It was when they did understand him that they went elsewhere. They left because what they heard was so contrary to their own views that they would not accept it.

This applies to our own day and to ourselves. Often, when professing Christians criticize a true servant of God, one who is really giving out God's truth, and complain that his teachings are "hard," the real cause is not the difficulty of the doctrine but rather the unwillingness of the people involved to accept what they hear. Perhaps it conflicts with their own views. Perhaps it is different from the traditions of their fathers. Many of these persons also copy the men of Christ's day in another way, for they grumble among themselves as they drop away rather than coming directly to Jesus Christ to state their difficulties.

What were these teachings the crowd found difficult? They are the same ones that men and women find difficult to accept today.

First, there is the doctrine of Christ's incarnation with all that this implies for his person. Jesus said that he was the true bread that came down from heaven (vv. 33, 38, 51). This implied that he had existed before his physical birth and that he had a special relationship with God. He was God's Son, possessing the divine nature. He had come as God in order to take human nature upon himself. The crowd obviously understood what Jesus was saying, for we are told in the other Gospels that when he said such things they were immediately ready to interpret what he had said as blasphemy. God come in the flesh? This they could not accept. There are many who will not accept it today.

Secondly, Jesus was teaching that he needed to go to the cross. This truth lies in verse 51, which says, "And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." How hard this is to accept and truly understand! Those who heard Christ might have argued that they could understand how a person should pay for his own sin, even die for it if the crime were great enough. They could understand how salvation might be earned. But to think that Jesus Christ had to earn salvation for them and that they would therefore have to receive it as a free gift from him or not receive it at all—this they found objectionable. This is the primary difficulty that most of our contemporaries have in accepting Christianity.

Finally, Jesus had taught that the reason why most of those listening did not believe on him was that in themselves they could not believe and that they could come to believe eventually only if God had previously determined to give them to him. These are the rudiments of that system of doctrine known as the Reformed faith—man's spiritual inability to please God and the necessity of God's electing grace in salvation. Jesus had said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (v. 44). He had said, "All that the Father gives me will come to me" (v. 37). Nothing is more calculated to arouse the ire and rebellion of the human heart than this teaching. But it is true. Christ did not hesitate to proclaim it.

Each of these teachings ran counter to the normal way of thinking of those living in Christ's time, and they run counter to the normal way of thinking today. The question is: Are we willing to change our opinions to conform to the teachings of Christ? Or will we persevere in error? Obviously, we need to have our discipleship corrected by Christ's doctrine, and to learn not to evaluate spiritual matters by the measure of our own understanding.

Christ's Answer

Jesus answered by asking, "Doth this offend you? What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before!" (vv. 61-62). I do not think the meaning of this verse is self-evident, at least it has not been self-evident to commentators, for they take different positions in referrring to it. Some think of it as a reference to the cross. Some view it as a prediction of Christ's ascension. Let me tell you what I think it means.

Years ago I heard a story told by Donald Grey Barnhouse, which will make this particular interpretation remain in your mind forever. Barnhouse had been visiting foreign mission fields, and while he had been doing this his family had been living in Berlin, Germany. There was a world-famous zoo in Berlin in those years to which Mrs. Barnhouse and the children went often. So when Barnhouse returned from his travels, and after the reunion, this was the first place the children wanted him to see.

In particular, they wanted him to see Rupert. Rupert was a magnificent sea lion weighing several tons, and he was kept in an immense pool that he had to himself. Everyone in Berlin loved Rupert. And they especially loved to be at the edge of the pool when he was fed each day by his keeper. Rupert would mount a platform and then catch the fish that his keeper threw to him. There were many fish, for Rupert had a great appetite. And with each fish Rupert would have to stretch out farther and farther to catch it. Finally, as the keeper reached the bottom of the bucket, the fish would be thrown so far out over the water that Rupert would have to leap from his perch, catch the fish in the air, and then come crashing down into the pool spraying water everywhere. It was this sight that the children wanted their father to see.

The family did see this together. And, in addition to seeing it, Barnhouse also filmed it on a small movie camera that he had purchased. Later, when they had left Berlin, the film was shown; and all this action unfolded on the screen. When he got to the end of the reel, however, Barnhouse stopped the projector before the film had entirely run through and threw the wheels into reverse. Now everything that the children had seen began to run backward. First there would be an enormous amount of water, which sprang up from all over the pool and began to disappear into a hole that had appeared in the middle. Then out of this hole came Rupert, all three or four thousand pounds of him, and he gracefully floated back through the air to land on the platform. Moreover, as he did it he spit out a fish that went flying back through the air and landed in the keeper's bucket. This show became far more popular than the right way of seeing the pictures. So, every time that the pictures were to be shown the children would cry, "Please, Daddy, make Rupert spit fish!"

You can see at once why this story has remained in my mind, and you will be able to see, I believe, how this graphically illustrates what Jesus meant when he asked, "What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before!" It was not his future ascension that he was looking forward to, but rather his descension that he was remembering. He was saying, "Are you offended at my teachings? Do you find them hard? Well, then, what if I were to retract them and retract the whole plan of redemption? What if I were to put the whole film into reverse and go back through the early days of my ministry, back through my childhood, be unborn, and then reascend to my Father? What would you do then?"

What would we do? What could we do? Our case would be hopeless, desperate. But, thank God, Jesus did not do that. He went instead to the cross, giving his life as a ransom for our sins; he ascended, and he is sitting today at the right hand of the Father, watching as the Father through the efficacious working of the Holy Spirit brings men and women to him. I look at those truths and see my salvation written plainly in them. Jesus did die. He died for me. Therefore, my salvation is eternally secure unless Jesus should reverse the whole plan of salvation even now, which he obviously will not do.

Not Flesh, but Spirit

But then Jesus went on to say something else. His first answer had been to ask, "What if I were to reverse the whole plan of redemption?" The conclusion is that it is far better to have Christ's ministry, even though it has doctrines that are difficult to accept, rather than have no ministry at all. But then he went on to add: "The Spirit gives life; the flesh counts for nothing. The words I have spoken to you are spirit and they are life" (v. 63). This sentence adds the truth that it is only through the ministry of the Holy Spirit that we can understand his doctrine.

It is not difficult to understand what that means. We see it, first of all, in the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus. People have said, "Wouldn't it have been wonderful to have known the Lord Jesus Christ in the flesh? Wouldn't it have been glorious to have walked with him, to have heard his voice, to have traveled about with him as he moved from place to place during his three-year ministry?" I suppose that for some it would be wonderful. But the interesting thing is that many in Christ's day did just that but nevertheless did not believe and eventually "turned back and no longer followed him." Knowing the Lord after the flesh did not necessarily profit those who were with him. Thus, Jesus was saying that it was his thoughts, words, and acts that were to bless them—not his outward appearance—and that even these had to be conveyed to the heart by the Holy Spirit if blessing should come.

On one occasion a woman said to Jesus, "Blessed is the mother who gave you birth and nursed you." But Jesus said, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and obey it" (Luke 11:27-28).

Then, too, this principle is true of our life as Christians today. It is not the external trappings of religion that bless the soul, but rather the Word of God as it is carried to our understanding by the supernatural intervention of God's Holy Spirit in our lives. This is true of any outward form of religion. Baptism is a good thing; it is commanded by God. But baptism does not save an individual. In fact, it has even become a curse in some denominations where it has been practiced upon unbelievers, for it has given the impression that all is well with their souls when actually they are children of wrath and under condemnation.

Take communion as a second example. Communion can be a blessed event. But it is also true that it is observed regularly by thousands who have never truly committed their lives to Jesus Christ, and so it is totally ineffective. The works of the flesh profit nothing if the Spirit does not give life.

Bible reading is another example. So is prayer. So is church membership. These aspects of Christianity are of great value if the Holy Spirit is blessing them to us and if we are seeking his blessing. But they can also be used in an unbelieving, formal way and so achieve nothing. We grow in the doctrine of Jesus only when we allow the Spirit of Jesus to interpret his words and apply them to our hearts.

Words of Life

So, what will you do with Christ's words? Will you heed them, allowing the Holy Spirit to bless you through them? Or will you turn away from them, as many of Christ's followers did? It is true that no one can come to Jesus unless the Father draws him, but this does not eliminate human responsibility to heed Christ's words. Notice the balance of truth in Christ's statement. He said, "The Spirit gives life." That is the divine side. In this work God operates by himself, and no man participates. But Jesus also went on to say, "The words I have spoken to you are spirit and they are life." To you speaks of human responsibility. The teachings of Jesus are directed to you. Do you believe them?

If you are not a Christian, your obligation is to read God's Word and to see yourself and your need reflected in it. Moreover, it is to follow that true Word wherever it leads you and to come (for it leads in this direction) to the Savior.

On the other hand, many who read these words will be Christians. What is your obligation? Your obligation is to take these words to those who are lost and who will certainly perish without them. This is your prime responsibility. I know that we have other obligations also. We are obliged to feed the sick, comfort the sorrowing, care for the destitute, provide for widows and orphans. You will not neglect these good works. But even as you do them you will remember that the truly great and lasting changes in this world, those that determine history and human destiny, are those that take place in the realm of the spirit through the preaching of God's Word. You must give yourself first and foremost to that work.

You are to feed on Christ's words, digest Christ's words, live Christ's words, exude Christ's words. Many pressing concerns will attempt to dissuade you. People will try to discourage your commitment. Do not be discouraged. Proclaim Christ's teachings to those who will receive them and to those who will not. Proclaim them to the rich and to the poor, the educated and the uneducated, the high and the low, the privileged and the disadvantaged. As you do, God will use them to draw men and women to the Savior.

Chapter 88.
Nowhere to Go but Forward

John 6:66-68

I do not know if you ever attempt to visualize the scenes of Christ's life when you are reading about them in the Gospels, but I do occasionally. I have found myself doing this as I have read about the early enthusiasm and later defection of the crowds who came to hear Jesus in Galilee.

I see it in cinematic terms, contrasting the apparent success of the morning about which these verses are written with the pitiful sight that occurred later as Christ's former followers left him. I can see them coming in the early hours of the dawn as the sun rises over Galilee. They had been with Jesus in the wilderness the night before. Now they gather in the town of Capernaum until at last, with the streets bursting with crowds and the synagogue fully occupied, they press their questions upon him. Unfortunately, the answers of the Lord are not those they desire to hear. So, as the day wears on, these apparent followers defect. At last the day ends as it had begun. Jesus is alone with his own close followers, the disciples. If I were filming the scene, I would contrast the morning with the evening, showing the small group who remain standing quietly, looking out over the lake as the last enthusiasts of the morning depart in the darkness to their homes.

This is a poignant scene, but now it becomes even more poignant. For, instead of congratulating himself on the fact that the Twelve had remained behind with him or allowing them to congratulate themselves, Jesus quietly turns about and asks this question: "Will you also leave?" It is a simple question, but it is one that must have cut deeply into their hearts and minds and that cuts into our hearts also. Will we go away? Will we be as some who have heard the Word of God, have even professed to believe it, but who have turned their backs upon Christ and Christianity? Or will we stay?

God grant that we may all be able to answer with Peter: "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life" (v. 68). It was a profound question and a profound answer. Both the question and the answer are profoundly relevant to all who hear them and who should be able to echo Peter's answer today.

A Relevant Question

Look for a moment at why this question is so relevant for those who are living today. It is relevant, first of all, because some of whom it is asked are not true Christians and will surely go away.

Some will betray Christ. Do you doubt that? If so, look at the men to whom Jesus himself was speaking. Here were twelve men whom he had picked out to be with him and help him. He certainly had good judgment, much better judgment than any minister or officer who votes on admitting a person to membership in a particular congregation today. Yet one of these men was Judas. He was a man who had never believed in Christ in a saving way—for Jesus termed him a devil—yet he was with the other disciples and was unknown by them in his true character. Eventually he betrayed the Savior.

Is it too much to say that there are Judases within the visible church today? I think not. There are some who profess to be Christians, who even hold office in Christian churches, but who have never been born again and who may one day openly turn their backs on all they have stood for previously. These are those who go out from us because they are not of us. Are we among their number? Could we be? Instead of a glib answer, we should let that question go around among us as it went around the table in the upper room: "Lord, is it I?" We should search our hearts to see if we have really committed ourselves to the Savior.

Second, the question is relevant because, in addition to the fact that some will certainly betray Christ, each of us could deny him. Here was Peter. Peter was born again. Moreover, Peter is the very one who utters the correct answer to Christ's question in this story—"Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life." Later on he would say,

"Even if I have to die with you, I will never disown you" (Matt. 26:35). Yet the time came when Peter was shaken and did deny Jesus. Jesus was arrested, and Peter stood by. A little girl asked him, "Weren't you with Jesus of Galilee?" Peter said, "No." Another declared, "This fellow was also with Jesus." Peter denied it. Later, another one said, "Surely you are one of them, for your speech gives you away." Peter denied for the third time that he knew Jesus, this time with cursings. I suppose that in the context of the Jewish culture of the day Peter would have sworn by some veiled reference to Jehovah. "In the name of God Almighty, I do not know Jesus Christ." What a comedown for Peter! But what about ourselves? If this could happen to Peter, it could happen to us. Will we also go away? Will we deny Jesus?

I would like to encourage you to be strong, to stay, to give a forthright and lasting testimony to the grace of God in Jesus Christ. It is not terribly difficult to gain an audience for the gospel message, particularly in this country in this day when, like the men of Athens, Americans seem to live only to hear or tell of some new thing. But to keep those who come for years and to build them up into a strong community where the gospel is openly confessed and the standards of Christianity are upheld—this is difficult, for men vacillate. Spurgeon wrote, "There is a constant winnowing going on in all churches, and this drives away the light and chaffy ones. There is a fan at work upon this floor.... Be not as the chaff.... Better far that we die than that we deny the Lord."

A Searching Answer

We have looked at the question; we need now to look at Peter's answer. Peter said, "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life." This has reference to the thought of going back, and Peter is expressing his view that having once come to Jesus such a thing is unthinkable. Is it unthinkable to you? Or would you consider turning back?

You say, "I am so discouraged right now, I think I might." Well, then, let me ask this: What would you go back to? Is there anything in your past that can compare with Jesus?

Would you go back to your former way of life? You know what your way of life was before you came to faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. It may have been characterized by a great emptiness or lack of meaning and purpose. God filled you and gave your life meaning. Would you go back to your emptiness? Your former life may have been filled with the excesses of sin. It may have been drunkenness, drugs, sexual licenses, or other things. You were ruining yourself by your sins. Will you turn back to those? The past may have been characterized by worldliness, in the sense of assuming the world's values. You may have been on a great ego trip from which you have been delivered by the Lord Jesus Christ. Would you go back to that? Was that so satisfying?

If nothing else should do it, your own self-interest should demand that your pathway be forward. When Christian was face-to-face with the devil in Bunyan's account of his travels to the celestial city in Pilgrim's Progress, he thought how dearly he would love to go back and escape the conflict. However, when he thought of his armor, he remembered that he had none for his back. He had a shield, a breastplate, a helmet, a sword, but nothing for his back. So he realized that if he should turn around, it would be the work of only a moment for the devil to slay him with his spear. He therefore resolved that however bad it might be to go forward, it would, nevertheless, be worse to go backward. So he fought on and gained victory. Think of that fact when you are discouraged or tempted. Retreat is impossible! Press on!

Let me remind you of a second inadequate alternative. Would you go back to the secular ideologies of our age? There is the ideology of progress. This word characterized the aspirations of the nineteenth century with all its advances in commerce, science, medicine, communications, and transportation. Some thought that we were headed toward a golden age in which all would live in peace and all forms of sickness and ignorance would be wiped out. But that has not happened. Sin is still with us. Science has not conquered it.

Some have been caught up in the ideology of world peace. This often was spoken of at the time of World War I, the war that was supposed to make the world safe for democracy. But World War I was followed by World War II, World War II by the Korean War, the Korean War by Vietnam. Foolish was the man or woman who thought that the American withdrawal from Vietnam would be the end of all wars!

Did your past hold the secular ideology of maximum human freedom? This philosophy billboards all forms of control or any type of restriction as an enemy and believes wholeheartedly that all will be well if only men and women are released to do their own thing. We have seen this philosophy at work in education and in other areas. But it is like saying that a garden will produce the most beauty if it is left to itself. Does it? I suppose there are some who might consider weeds beautiful and desirable—just as they consider crippling nationwide strikes, abortion on demand, open homosexuality, and anarchy beautiful and desirable—but for most sane men and women these are still weeds. They do not compare with the beauty that results from careful control and cultivation. Was freedom apart from Christ so wonderful? Was it real? Would you go back? Or did you first find real freedom in serving the Lord Jesus?

Perhaps your past held the ideology of agnosticism. This is the view that denies the possibility of finding answers to the deep questions of life—Who am I? Who is God? What am I here for? and so on. Questions are good, but what is the value of asking questions if you fail to find answers?

What Christian would want to return to that?

There is a third area of the past to which you might be tempted to return. I have spoken of your former way of life, as well as the secular ideologies of our time. There are also false religions and false religious leaders. If your past contained these experiences, would you go back to them? How about the cults? How about the eastern religions? Were they the answer?

Finally, would you go back to that dead moralism that characterized the lives of so many of us before we became Christians? Before we came to Jesus Christ we were bent on a life of high moral attainment, but we found that the life we attained failed to satisfy anyone except ourselves—and it did not even satisfy ourselves most of the time. Did you have the sense that you were really pleasing God? I would be surprised if you did. Did your wife approve? Your husband? Your parents? Your children? If so, why did you have so much trouble with your personal relationships? Besides, when you came to Jesus, did not this involve the confession that your own efforts were empty and that you needed a righteousness that you could not find in yourself? Of course it did! So your experience is similar to that of the apostle Paul who pursued high ethical ideals but who, after he had found Christ, recognized that his past achievements were worthless (Phil. 3:8). Would you go back to the scrap heap of your morality?

"Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life." I do not know where you could go to escape Jesus, even if you wanted to go back to those empty things that characterized your past. I doubt if you could even escape the suspicions of others that you have been with Jesus. Remember Peter. Peter denied the Lord with oaths and cursings. But he had just spent three years with Jesus, and as a result there was something in his speech that betrayed him. If you have been with Jesus, you will never be the same again either. No matter how you swear, someone will smoke you out and declare, "Surely you are one of them; you have been with him." David asked, "Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence? If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there. If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast" (Ps. 139:7-10).

Bound to the Master

The conclusion of this is that if you have believed on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior—if you are truly united to him through the miracle of the new birth—then there is no way for you to go but forward. A threefold cord binds you to him. Peter speaks of it.

First, there is nowhere else to go. Peter acknowledged this in the tone of his question. You have acknowledged it as I have reviewed the alternatives in this study. Who will have you after you have been with Jesus? Jesus was not wanted. He was killed. His followers down through the centuries have been killed. Who will take you in when the door has already been shut against your Master?

Second, you have learned that there is satisfaction in the words of the Lord Jesus Christ and that true satisfaction can be found in him only. Peter said, "You have the words of eternal life." It was said by the Greeks that that man would always be unsatisfied with human food who had once tasted the nectar of the gods. That is a description of your case if you are a Christian. Jesus said, "Drink of me, and I will satisfy your thirst; feed on me, and I will satisfy your hunger." You have done that. You have had heavenly food. Now anything else will seem flat by comparison.

Finally, as Peter says, "We believe and know that you are the Holy One of God." Thus, to go back now would be not only a crisis of faith; it would be intellectual suicide and dishonesty. It cannot be done. We know too much to prove faithless.

I wish I could tell you what the future holds for you, but I cannot. It may be that the future is bright. I often think this, for the trends of our day (in my opinion) are opening wide, wide doors for Christianity. It is a day of opportunity. The next generation may be the generation of the widest possible opportunity for the proclamation of the gospel and for witnessing and growth in history. If our day is the day of opportunity, we shall advance. We shall go forward. I am also aware, however, that days of opportunity often are followed by days of harsh persecution and that the chaff may be greatly winnowed out in our lifetime. The time may come when you and I may be persecuted. What shall we do then? How can we do less than those great martyrs of the faith who have gone boldly before us?

In the year 1555, in Oxford, England, Hugh Latimer, that great English bishop of the Reformation period, was led to the stake to be executed. Ridley was with him. These men had come to prominence as spokesmen for the Reformation in England under Henry VIII and had carried the true gospel of salvation by grace into every hamlet in the nation. But a change had come. Bloody Mary was now upon the throne, and godly men everywhere were being executed. Like one who had run a good race and who had kept the faith, Latimer went to the fires calmly. At the last he called out, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as (I trust) shall never be put out."

If the time should come when you or I should find ourselves in that position, I trust that we too shall be strong. We cannot turn back. There is no place to go but forward.

Chapter 89.
A Disturbing Revelation

John 6:69-71

I do not know why the apostle Peter appeals to me as much as he does, but I suppose it is because I am so much like him. I could say it is because Peter is so much like us Americans. On the negative side, he is impetuous. He speaks without thinking. Because he speaks without thinking he almost always is wrong. He also is overly confident. So one of the first things Jesus needed to teach him was that he was actually ignorant, weak, and cowardly. On the other hand, Peter is loyal, good-natured, and extremely anxious to learn and do the right thing. So when he is close to Christ and guided by the Holy Spirit he occasionally has great insight into divine truth and speaks truly.

This was the case in each of his great confessions of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. One of those confessions is well known. It is recorded in the sixteenth chapter of Matthew in which Peter declares, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16).

A lesser known but equally great confession occurs in the verses that close the sixth chapter of John. On this occasion Jesus had asked the disciples if they, like the Galilean crowd, would go away from him. Peter had answered on behalf of the others, "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life." He then concluded, "And we have believed, and have come to know, that you are the Holy One of God" (6:69 RSV). In this confession Peter employed a phrase that is very uncommon in both the Old Testament and the New Testament—"the Holy One of God." It is so uncommon, in fact, that some of the scribes who were copying the New Testament during the early days of its transmission felt compelled to alter it and at the same time make this confession conform verbally to the confession of Matthew 16. The result was the version we have in most of our Bibles. But this was not what Peter said in Capernaum. Peter said, "You are the Holy One of God." The importance of the phrase lies in the fact that as he said it the others would naturally have thought of that other very popular phrase used of God himself—"the Holy One of Israel." In other words, there is no other possible place that Peter knew to assign to Jesus. He was the "Lord"—Jehovah. Peter was placing him with God and not with man.

Faith and Understanding

Peter's confession of faith is also interesting because of two words Peter used to indicate how he came to know this truth about Jesus. They are "believing" and "know." The most important thing about them is their order: first belief, then certainty. It is the divine order for true understanding in spiritual things.

Let us admit at the outset that this runs counter to our natural instincts and to our natural way of doing things. From a human point of view, who ever heard of believing in something in order to be sure of it? We want to make sure of something before we believe in it. We want to test out a person before we trust him. God reverses the order. Take these examples. David declared, "I am confident of this: I will see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living" (Ps. 27:13). Jesus said to Martha, "Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?" (John 11:40). In Hebrews we are told, "By faith we understand" (Heb. 11:3). There is a reason for this, of course. Quite simply it is because divine truth is beyond us. God's ways are not our ways. So we will begin to know and understand God's ways only as we begin to know and (in part) understand God. And we can begin to know God only through trusting him. Assurance, insight, knowledge—these are the fruit of believing. Certainty that Jesus is the Son of God comes, therefore, not by listening to the arguments of professors or by reading the latest of theological books or articles, but rather by believing what God has said about his Son in the Scriptures.

I admit that if this were a matter between men only, then to believe without seeing would be foolhardy. However, in dealing with God it is logical. God has never made a promise that he has not fulfilled in its proper time. His word is his bond. Moreover, if we do not believe him, then we actually are casting doubt upon his character.

Did you know that God has strong words to say about those who will not believe his testimony concerning Jesus Christ? We read this statement from him: "We accept man's testimony, but God's testimony is greater because it is the testimony of God, which he has given about his Son. Anyone who believes in the Son of God has this testimony in his heart. Anyone who does not believe God has made him out to be a liar, because he has not believed the testimony God has given about his Son" (1 John 5:9-10). This is a great and sweeping statement, but it is important because it affords an insight into the heart of God. God tells us that he wants to be believed.
Moreover, he tells us that he wants us to believe him because of who he is.

These verses compare our belief in people with our belief in God, and they point out that we do believe other people. We believe in men, or in what men say, every day of our lives. If we did not, we could never ride a bus, go to work, attend a concert, sign a contract. These activities all involve acts of faith. They all involve the word of another person, sometimes even when we have not seen him or her. "Well," says God, "if you can believe other people, you can believe me; if you do not, you are dishonoring me." There are many men and women so refined and polite that they would never think of calling anyone a liar; yet they make a liar out of God every day by their unbelief. God says that they should believe him exactly as they believe other human beings.

The secret to arriving at a point of certainty in spiritual things is that we must believe what God tells us. Then, believing, we will find knowledge following. It is striking, is it not, that this is illustrated by the chapter we are studying. For the certainty Peter spoke of did not come primarily from viewing Christ's miracles—the turning of water into wine, the healing of the impotent man at Bethesda, the multiplying of the loaves and fish, or the walking on the water. It came rather from hearing and believing the "words of eternal life" that Jesus, the Holy One of God, had spoken.

One Is a Devil

At this point the sixth chapter of John reaches some sort of a climax as the result of Peter's confession. It is true that most of Christ's followers have left him. Still the Twelve have remained, and Peter has even spoken on their behalf to voice a great confession. If we were writing the Gospel, we would end the chapter at this point and go on to some new theme in chapter 7. Interestingly enough, however, John does not do this. For John is a realist, and he is portraying, not merely the growth of faith in Jesus, but also the emergence of hate for him and its intensification. Therefore, in this chapter Peter's confession of faith in Jesus is followed by a disturbing revelation.

There is some irony in the situation. Peter had spoken on behalf of the Twelve, saying, "We believe and know...." But Jesus, who knew the hearts of men as his disciple did not, replied, "We? Did you say 'we,' Peter? You may not believe it now, but I tell you that one of you, one even of this small number, is a devil and will one day betray me."

Actually, he did not say "betray" at this point, though he did so later. It is the evangelist himself who adds this note for clarification.

Here is a warning for us. We cannot see into the hearts of men either, though we would like to. We think at times that we have insight into men's character. Sometimes God gives insight. But still we usually see only the externals and so make many errors. "Man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7). Then let us allow God to do it, and let us exercise great caution and humility in our evaluation of other men and women.

Why Judas?

Verses 70 and 71 tell us that Jesus saw into the hearts of men and knew that Judas was not a believer and would one day betray him. But if this is so (as it is), why did he choose Judas? Why not another?

The first and easiest answer to that question is that Jesus chose Judas because the Scriptures foretold it. John 17:12 tells us that, for it says, "While I was with them, I protected them and kept them safe by that name you gave me. None has been lost except the one doomed to destruction so that Scripture would be fulfilled." The reference is to Psalm 41:9 and similar passages. Jesus chose Judas to fulfill these passages. But to say this is only to push the question back one stage farther, for now we must ask, "But why did God cause such Scriptures to be written? Why did God ordain Judas to be among the twelve disciples?" Here we are helped by a number of wellthought-out comments by Arthur W. Pink, one of the most thoughtful commentators on John's Gospel.

First, as Pink notes, the choice of Judas by Jesus furnished an opportunity for Christ to display his perfections. When Jesus had come to earth he had professed, "Here I am ... to do your will, O God" (Heb. 10:7). This will was written "in the volume of the book," and it included the choice of Judas as one who would betray him. This was a trial for Jesus, beyond any doubt. Judas was associated with Jesus for the three years of his ministry. They moved in the closest possible contact. Yet Judas was the devil's tool. Even when Jesus retired alone with the Twelve to escape the worst of his critics, Judas was there with him. Still He did not hesitate to do what the Father demanded. It is in his full subjection to the Father's will, written in the book, that his perfection as the incarnate Son may be evaluated.

If you are being tried, remember the perpetual trial faced by Jesus and learn that God has sent these trials into your life just as surely as he ordained the presence of Judas among the Twelve. Why? If there are no other reasons, there is at least this one—that God may display the perfections of Jesus within you as you endeavor to live for him.

Second, the choice of Judas provided an impartial witness to the moral excellency of Christ. Pink observes, "His Father, His forerunner, His saved apostles, bore testimony to His perfections; but lest it should be thought that these were ex parte witnesses, God saw to it that an enemy should also bear witness. Here was a man that was 'a devil'—a man who was in the closest possible touch with the life of Christ, both in public and in private; a man who would have seized eagerly on the slightest flaw, if it had been possible to find one; but it was not: 'I have betrayed ... innocent blood' (Matt. 27:4), was the unsought testimony of an impartial witness."

Third, the choice of Judas gave occasion to uncover the awfulness of sin. Imagine spending three years in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ. Imagine all that Judas saw in that time— demonstrations of the love of God for a sick and sinful humanity; revelations of wisdom; a total lack of all the sinful aspects of human character, no pride, anger, lust, impatience, loss of selfcontrol; total selflessness. Now imagine betraying such a One. That is how terrible sin is. The fullness of redemption brings to light the wonder of divine love. But it also was ordained that the fullness of redemption would expose something of the full horror of that sin for which the atonement was being made. Moreover, they are connected. For we will only begin to comprehend the height and depth of this divine love when we begin to see something of the nature of the sin for which Christ's blood was poured out.

Fourth, the presence of Judas supplies the sinner with a solemn warning. A person may experience the closest possible contact with Jesus and still not come to him for salvation. He may hear Christ's teachings, witness great miracles, observe the changed lives of others who have yielded to Christ and have believed on him, and yet not be born again. Judas was with Jesus, and he did not believe. Perhaps you are like him. You may have been raised in a godly home. You may have heard great preaching. You may have seen others believe, perhaps even in your own family. But you have not believed personally. Their faith will not save you. You must believe. Do not allow proximity to cheat you out of faith in the Savior.

Fifth, the presence of Judas shows us that we may expect to find hypocrites among the followers of Jesus. Judas was certainly a hypocrite. Think what it meant for any one of the Twelve to follow Jesus. It meant leaving home, going without any sure and certain shelter, being tired from hard journeys, preaching the gospel that Jesus instructed his disciples to preach. Judas did all these things and did them so well that, so far as we know, not one of the disciples ever suspected him of being what he was. Yet underneath it all he was no friend of the Lord Jesus Christ, and he eventually betrayed him.

There is no way of saying this nicely, but it must be said. There are Judases among the apparent followers of the Lord in our day. They are in our pews, even in our pulpits, and they are sometimes undetected. They betray the Lord and the gospel by both their words and actions. Jesus warned us to watch out for such. He called them wolves in sheep's clothing.

Sixth, the presence of Judas among the Twelve affords us one more illustration of how radically different are God's thoughts and ways from ours. Pink writes: "That God should appoint a 'devil' to be one of the closest companions of the Savior; that he should have selected 'the son of perdition' to be one of the favored twelve, seemed incredible. Yet so it was." Therefore, since we have seen that God did have good reasons for this selection (in spite of our thoughts to the contrary), let us learn to trust God in matters for which we can see no reason. Let us humble ourselves before him. Moreover, since we can see that God's thoughts are not our thoughts, let us learn that our thoughts must change.

Peter or Judas?

Here are two men brought together in the space of just three verses—Peter and Judas. One made a great confession. About the other we have a disturbing revelation. Which one most characterizes you? Both were with Jesus. Both gave evidences of a genuine interest in religion. But with one it was real; he was there because of Jesus. The other was there only for himself, or for what he could derive from the relationship. May I make it even more personal? What are you into Christianity for? Is it for Jesus? Or is it for yourself? I cannot promise that if you come to God out of a genuine love for the Lord Jesus Christ you will find the road easy. The company is usually good, but the road is rocky. It leads to a cross. Nevertheless, I can promise that Jesus is even more than you might hope for or realize, and beyond the cross there is glory.

Chapter 90.
What Time Is It?

John 7:1-10

Few things in this life are as important as time, but time often is wasted and thereby becomes unimportant. Moreover, it often is spent on that which later proves to have no meaning. When life is empty, time drags. Macbeth knew this and cried, "Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow creeps in this petty pace from day to day." When life is full, time flies. Ovid declared, "The stream of time glides smoothly on and is past before we know." Seeing life and fortune fall before it, he also termed time "the devourer of all things." Shakespeare spoke of "the tooth of time." William James declared, "The great use of a life is to spend it for something that outlasts it."

But how do we know what will outlast it? Since we are bounded by time, how can we see beyond its horizons? One answer to how we can make our time count, not only for this life but for eternity also, is to be found in a saying of the Lord Jesus Christ to his brothers just before he went up to Jerusalem for the final time to begin the last phase of his work on earth.

Just before this, Jesus had concluded his work in Galilee. He had been there some time, and he had met with initial success. Nevertheless, as the true nature of his teaching became known and his claims became understood, the crowds that had once followed him willingly gradually drifted away. Eventually, he was alone with his disciples and, to judge from this narrative, in contact with his family. He seemed unwilling to leave Galilee, for he lingered there for approximately six months. This is the period between the time of the Passover, by which the events of John 6 are to be dated, and the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, which is the time note of chapter 7. The opening verse of chapter 7 explains the reason for Christ's delay in returning to Jerusalem—he was "purposely staying away from Judaea, because the Jews there were waiting to take his life."

At this point Jesus' brothers approached him. The Feast of Tabernacles was approaching, and it was their recommendation that Jesus go up to the feast with them and do miracles there. Perhaps they thought this would revive Jesus' sagging popularity. They were not altogether altruistic in their suggestions. John tells us that even his brothers did not really believe in him.

Jesus' reply was emphatic. It was not for them to tell him where and when to go. There was a great gulf between them and, besides, his steps were ordered. His exact words were, "The right time for me has not yet come; for you any time is right. The world cannot hate you, but it hates me because I testify that what it does is evil. You go up to this Feast. I am not yet going up to this Feast, because for me the right time has not yet come" (7:6-8). John goes on to tell us that Jesus remained for a time in Galilee but eventually made his way to Jerusalem secretly.

God's Time and Our Time

If we are to understand what Jesus meant by declaring that his time was not the same time as the time of his brothers (and if we are to gain insight from that for the time that is given to us), we must begin with the recognition that God's time is different from our time. In fact, it is questionable whether we can use the word "time" in reference to God's time at all. Time is a word for creation, and God is not in time. God is outside time. He stands in eternity. Consequently, we should not make the mistake of applying time concepts to him.

There is no good illustration of how God relates to what we call time, because every illustration, every word that we can draw upon, has time limitations. Nevertheless, some people have been helped by the following. We must imagine a river winding across a countryside. It begins in a mountainous interior, passes down through evergreen forests, across coastal plains, and into the sea. Moreover, we may imagine a man in a rowboat making his way down this river. He is in the mountains on Monday, among the trees on Tuesday, in the midst of the plains on Wednesday, and at the river's mouth on Thursday. For him, the mountains, forests, plains, and sea are in a time sequence. He sees only one of these geographical features at a time. On the other hand, we can imagine a pilot flying five miles above the earth's surface, and we can see that for him all the geographical features are present at the same time. He can see all the way from the mountains to the seas in one glance. God sees like the pilot because he is not confined by time. We can make the same point also by imagining time to be something like a motion picture. We view it in sequence. God views it as though it were millions of individual frames, all seen at once. From his perspective God sees Adam and Eve, Abraham and Isaac, Christ on the cross, you and me, simultaneously.

This is not just an interesting play of the imagination, of course, for it has bearing on what we understand of God and his relationship to our days. We see it primarily in the area of what you and I call "decision." For us, a life in time is filled with decisions. We make decisions constantly, and we do so in an effort to cope with variableness, ignorance, previous indecision, and other things. Our decisions are attempts to deal with problems not previously considered. God's decisions are not like this because of the nature of his relationship to time. There is no variableness or indecision with God. Consequently, his decisions are rather in the nature of eternal decrees, unchanging and unchangeable. The Westminster Shorter Catechism speaks of these decrees saying, "The decrees of God are his eternal purpose, according to the counsel of his will, whereby, for his own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass."

I believe that this could be a great step forward in your spiritual life if you can see it. God does not make decisions because he suddenly is confronted with a problem that he has not foreseen. He determines both the problems and their solutions in advance. He is never surprised, never caught off balance. Thus, there is never a problem that baffles him or a work that he does not intend to finish. Because of this we can rest in him and trust him for the ordering of our days.

The Time of Jesus Christ

The importance of these truths becomes particularly clear in relationship to the time of Jesus Christ, for here was God, the inhabitant of eternity, now living in time. What do we learn about the time of Jesus Christ? We learn that the time (or times) of Jesus Christ was fixed by the eternal decrees of God.

As we read the New Testament we are amazed at the number of verses that indicate that Jesus was born, lived, and died according to the fixed plan of God. For instance, Galatians 4:4-5 tells us, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons." In Revelation 13:8 Christ's death particularly is placed in this context as John speaks of "the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world." Paul links the same event to the prophecies of Scripture in 1 Corinthians 15:3, saying that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures."

On the day of Pentecost, in the first truly Christian sermon, Peter linked both the element of prophecy and the fixing of time by the Father to Christ's crucifixion. "Men of Israel," he said, "listen to this: Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him, as you yourselves know. This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:22-23). Later, in his first epistle, Peter repeats the same truths in writing to Christians: "For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect. He was chosen before the creation of the world, but was revealed in these last times for your sake" (1 Peter 1:18-20).

Naturally, there are many more verses that could be cited. But we can draw all the important conclusions even from these. (1) The death of the Lord Jesus Christ was the most important event of his life, and it was eternally planned and determined by God. (2) Not only his death, but also the details of his death and other minutia of his birth and life were similarly determined. (3) When Jesus came to this earth, he was conscious that the events of his life were marked out for him by God. And (4) since these things are true, it follows that everything planned by God for Jesus Christ and revealed to us in the Scriptures has been accomplished.

One very important conclusion flows from this. If the events of Christ's life were ordered by God, as we have seen, then it follows that the most important thing that can be said about the death of the Lord Jesus Christ is that God the Father caused it. God the Father put Jesus to death. In the history of the church there have been times when men and women have emphasized the role that the Jewish leaders had in Christ's crucifixion. This has led in a very unjustifiable way to much anti-Semitism. It is true, of course, that the religious leaders did have a part in Christ's death, but this is relatively unimportant. Others, to counter this line of thought, have emphasized that it was actually the Gentiles, in the person of Pilate, who sentenced Christ to death. But again, while this is true, it is nevertheless relatively unimportant. The important thing is that God the Father put Jesus Christ to death and that he did so in order that there might be an atonement for our sins.

Imagine a trial in which a judge is obliged to impose a heavy fine upon his own son for some act of juvenile destruction. He imposes the fine, then steps down from the bench, taking his place next to his son, and pays the fine for him. This is an illustration both of the incarnation and of Christ's death. The incarnation is God stepping down from the bench. The cross is God in love paying the fine that he in justice has imposed upon us. Can you understand this illustration? If you can, then you can see that the cross is God taking your place because he loved you and wants you to love him.

A Fixed Time Schedule

There is one more point that must be brought into focus here in order that we might understand John 7:6 and apply these truths to our own situation. The point is this: Not only were the events of the life of Jesus Christ predetermined by God, as we have seen, but even the time at which they occurred was determined. This is the only truth that gives meaning to our text. For on one day Jesus refused to go to Jerusalem, but then just three or four days later he reversed himself and did go.

The Bible does not provide us with detailed time references for every event of Christ's life. But in Daniel there is a reference to the time of his death that is so exact that we are justified in applying the same principle, the principle of time-determination, to all the events of his birth and ministry. The revelation to Daniel concerning the coming of Christ was focused in a period of seventy weeks. A week, in this phrase, as is evident from the context, concerns a period of seven years; that is, a week of years. We might say a "heptad" if we had that word in our language. There were to be seven weeks of years, by which time the city of Jerusalem was to be rebuilt, following its destruction by the Babylonians. Then there was to be a period of sixty-two weeks of years, by which time the Messiah would have come and died. The prophecy says, "Know and understand this: From the issuing of the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem until the Anointed One, the ruler, comes, there will be seven 'sevens,' and sixty-two 'sevens.' It will be rebuilt with streets and a trench, but in times of trouble. After the sixty-two 'sevens,' the Anointed One will be cut off and will have nothing" (Dan. 9:25-26). Here is a full prophecy of the substitutionary death of Jesus Christ for sin, and it is dated in history from the year of the issuing of the decree to rebuild Jerusalem.

When was this decree? It has been dated from several sources as having been issued in 445 B.C. Consequently, the latest possible date for the death of the Messiah, according to this prophecy, was to be 483 years later (that is, sixty-nine weeks of years, or sixty-nine times seven). The year arrived at by this reckoning is A.D. 38. Jesus must have died by then. Moreover, if the more accurate reckoning of the great British scholar Sir Robert Anderson in his book The Coming Prince is accurate, the dating may be even closer that this. Anderson's calculations place the end of the 483-year period on April 6, A.D. 32. Clearly, then, even the precise years and days of the events of Christ's life were determined.

Moreover, this tells us a great deal about the nature of the Scriptures. In the seventeenth century an English astronomer by the name of Edmund Halley announced, on the basis of Newton's newly discovered laws of gravity, that the brilliant comet that had been seen in Europe in the year 1682 would return in 1759. Halley died in 1742, seventeen years before the time he had predicted for the comet's return. But in 1759 the comet did return, right on schedule, and the laws by which he had calculated its orbit were vindicated.

In the same way, the Scriptures of the Old Testament foretold the time of Christ's coming, even though those who had originally been the vehicles of their writing and who had received them died. The years dragged on. Throughout the ages all who had faith in God looked to the heavens and awaited the fulfillment of these prophecies. Finally a star was seen in the sky, and the wise men who followed it arrived at Bethlehem where the young child was found. The birth gave way to the life, the life to the crucifixion, the crucifixion to the resurrection and ascension. All that had been planned and determined by God concerning Jesus Christ was accomplished. The Scriptures were vindicated. Thus we were also given a firm basis for our confidence in God and our hope in Christ's return.

The conclusion to this is simple. It is that our time can either be like the world's time, like the time of Jesus' brothers, or it can be like the time of Jesus. If it is like the world's time, our time has no meaning—at any rate, no more than we ourselves are able to give to it. On the other hand, if it is like the time of Jesus, it can be filled with meaning. Your time can become part of that great and eternal drama of salvation that is God's plan for the ages. If you are not a Christian, I encourage you to come to Christ for salvation and begin to allow him to plan your time. If you do, he will give your life meaning and fill all your times with opportunity.

Perhaps you are already a Christian and yet do not see how your time has been made meaningful. Do not be discouraged just because you cannot see it. God sees it, and he both knows and has planned what is happening.

Years ago I saw a film I will never forget. It was produced by the Moody Institute of Science by using both high speed and time lapse photography. It was called Time and Eternity, and its premise was that many things in this world escape us because we are locked in a fixed time progression. Some things move too fast for us to see. The flight of an insect is an example. The film revealed this by filming at a very high speed and then slowing the film down for projection. Other things move too slowly—the growth of a flower or the moving of clouds. When these are filmed slowly and then speeded up for viewing, the dance of a growing flower or the churning, billowing excitement of the clouds is breathtaking. We can see each of these things physically, but we miss the beauty because we are locked in our own time system. In the same way, we often miss the beauty of what God himself is doing in our lives, not because we cannot see the individual features of his work but because his work is either too slow for our comprehension or too fast.

Trust him, and rejoice in the fact that one day your perspective will be his own.

Chapter 91.
What Do You Think of Jesus?

John 7:11-13

Once, in preparation for an interview period on the Bible Study Hour, the staff of the radio program went out onto the streets of Philadelphia to ask people this question: "Who is Jesus Christ?" Sometimes they asked, "Do you think Jesus Christ is God?" The answers they received were illuminating, for they revealed the confusion that exists in many person's minds about the identity of this remarkable man from Nazareth.

One young woman responded, "Jesus Christ was a man who thought he was God." Another young woman, a biology student, replied, "Jesus Christ is pure essence of energy. God to me is energy, electric energy because it's something that's not known." A man told us, "I think that's something you have to decide for yourself, but he had some beautiful ideas." Others replied, "He is one that we look up to as our leader"; "he is an individual who lived two thousand years ago, who was interested in the social betterment of all classes of people"; "he was well liked; he meant well; he was a good man." Most people asked were just confused. They answered, "I haven't any idea.... I don't know...."

The confusion that exists in most people's minds about Jesus of Nazareth was not the only thing our interviewers detected, however. The interviews also showed the fact that, in spite of their confusion, most of those who were asked about Jesus could not quite escape him. No one said, "I couldn't care less." Quite a few actually seemed embarrassed by the question.

Who is Jesus Christ? This is a question that men and women have been asking ever since Christ's time and that needs to be asked and answered again and again in each generation. Jesus had delayed in going up to the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem, and while he delayed the people were asking questions about him. "Where is he?" asked the priests. "Who is he?" asked others. John then says, "Among the crowds there was widespread whispering about him. Some said, 'He is a good man.' Others said, 'No, he deceives the people'" (John 7:12).

The One Impossibility

Who is Jesus Christ? I want to help you answer that question (in case you have never faced it squarely). But I want to begin by talking about the one truly impossible answer. The one truly impossible answer is the answer that was given first by the people of Jerusalem. They said, "He is a good man." Many give this answer today, but it is the one thing that Jesus most certainly cannot be.

Why is that? It is because of the peculiar nature of his teachings. One of their most obvious features is what John Stott calls their "egocentric character. "Jesus' teaching is all wrapped up in himself. For instance, Jesus often spoke of the Fatherhood of God, but whenever he did that he seemed always to go on to speak of the special relationship that he had to the Father, possessed by no other. He even had a special word for God, abba, which revealed his special relationship. It meant "daddy." No contemporary Jewish figure ever used this word for God; it would have been thought irreverent or even blasphemous. Yet Jesus used it. Moreover, he went on to teach that because of what he would accomplish on the cross, and only because of that, others could come to enjoy this relationship also.

The egocentric character of Christ's teaching is seen also in the great "I am" sayings that are so prominent in John's Gospel. "I am the bread of life," Christ said. "I am the light of the world." "I am the gate." The last of these—"I am the way and the truth and the life"—is categorical in its teaching that faith in Christ is the sole way by which a sinful man or woman can find a right relationship to God and enter heaven.

A careful study of Christ's teaching will reveal that Jesus considered the Scriptures of the Old Testament to have been written mainly about him. Moses "wrote about me," he maintained (John 5:46). "Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad" (John 8:56). Using the books of the Old Testament as his text Jesus explained to his disciples those things that were written "concerning himself (Luke 24:27). One great example of this outlook occurred early in his public ministry in the synagogue at Nazareth. Jesus had been asked to read from the prophets, as any male Jew might be asked to do on any Sabbath, and he had chosen to read from Isaiah 61:1-2. "The Spirit of the Sovereign LORD is on me, because the LORD has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim freedom for the captives and release for the prisoners, to proclaim the year of the LORD'S favor." At this point, however, he closed up the scroll and applied the prophecy, saying, "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing" (Luke 4:21). This was a remarkable declaration, for it was nothing less than the claim that Isaiah had written of him and that he was fulfilling this prophecy.

With such an estimate of himself it is not surprising that Jesus called men and women to follow him. In fact, he commanded them to follow him, and then later dispatched them on a worldencompassing evangelistic ministry.

The impossibility of regarding Jesus merely as a good man is seen also in his claim to be able to forgive sins, not merely sins against himself but also against others. No mere man can forgive sins, no matter how good he is. In fact, as C. S. Lewis notes, "Unless the speaker is God, this is really so preposterous as to be comic." We do not have much difficulty in imagining how a person can forgive an offense against himself. If a person should hit you, you have a right to forgive him. "Don't mention it," you might say, particularly if he said he was sorry. If he steals from you, you can also forgive him. But suppose the person should go around hitting other people, thousands of them, and stealing from them. In that case, you have no right to forgive him; and you should not regard highly anyone who thought he had this right. Yet this is precisely what Jesus did.

On one occasion, a paralyzed man was lowered into his presence from a hole cut in the roof of the house where he was teaching. Jesus said, "Son, your sins are forgiven" (Mark 2:5). On another occasion Jesus forgave a woman who was known to be a sinner in some open way. She had entered the house where Jesus was eating, wept so that her tears fell on his feet, and then wiped his feet with her hair. Jesus told her, "Your sins are forgiven" (Luke 7:48). On each occasion the onlookers objected, saying, "Who is this that forgives sins? Who can forgive sins but God only?" None of the observers was prepared to admit Christ's claim at this point, but at least they saw the issue clearly. How could he forgive sins? The claim was preposterous if he was not really God.

Finally, the impossibility of considering Jesus to be merely a good man is seen in the fact that on several occasions he openly claimed to be God. In the climate of the Judaism of his day this could not be done often or openly, for it was blasphemy and a capital offense. Nevertheless, there were times when Jesus allowed the issue to become clear.

For example, in the eighth chapter of John there is the record of a conversation between Jesus and the Jewish rulers over the relationship of Jews to Abraham. They thought they were saved because of their physical descent from Abraham. Jesus denied it. They became angry and attacked him personally. "Are you greater than our father Abraham?" they asked. Jesus answered, "Before Abraham was born, I am" (John 8:58). This so offended those who heard him that they began to pick up stones to throw at him and kill him. They did this because they recognized the claim to divinity that Christ's words implied. At the least these words were a claim to preexistence; that is, Jesus claimed to have existed in the beginning with God before Abraham was created. In addition, however, they were also a claim to be God himself. For Christ's "I am" was the very name for God—Jehovah—which means, "I am who I am" (Exod. 3:14). It was because of this claim that those who heard Jesus took up stones to kill him.

A second example of the same claim occurs when Jesus appeared to Thomas shortly after the Resurrection. Thomas had said that he would not believe in Jesus' resurrection unless he could put his finger in the nail prints of Jesus' hands and his hand into Jesus' side. But when Jesus appeared, Thomas did not insist on these tests. Instead, he fell at Jesus' feet, declaring, "My Lord and my God." What did Jesus do? Did he reply, as Paul and Barnabas did later in a similar situation, "Men, why are you doing this? We too are only men, human like you" (Acts 14:15)? Not at all! He accepted the designation of this doubting apostle, adding, "Because you have seen me, you have believed; blessed are those who have not seen, and yet have believed" (John 20:29).

What are we to do with these claims? We cannot escape them. As John Stott observes, "The claims are there. They do not in themselves constitute evidence of deity. The claims may have been false. But some explanation of them must be found. We cannot any longer regard Jesus as simply a great teacher, if He was so grievously mistaken in one of the chief subjects of His teaching, namely Himself." In the same way C. S. Lewis has written, "You must make your choice. Either this man was, and is, the Son of God: or else a madman or something worse. You can shut Him up for a fool, you can spit at Him and kill Him as a demon; or you can fall at His feet and call Him Lord and God. But let us not come with any patronizing nonsense about His being a great human teacher. He has not left that open to us. He did not intend to."

The Possibilities

I have said, then, that the one impossible explanation of the person of Jesus Christ is that he was a good man. But the quotation from C. S. Lewis has already begun to suggest the true possibilities. There are three of them.

First, if the unusual and egocentric claims of Jesus of Nazareth eliminate the possibility that he was merely a good man or an exceptional teacher, they nevertheless do not eliminate the possibility that he may have been mad, or, if you will, that he was suffering from a severe case of megalomania. This is the view of those who in this chapter say, "You are demon-possessed" (v. 20). This has been the case with other men. Hitler suffered from megalomania. It is probable that Napoleon did too.

Perhaps Jesus was crazy or possessed. Before we jump too quickly at this explanation, however, we need to ask whether the total character of Jesus (as we know it) bears out this speculation. Did he act like one who was crazy? Did he speak like one suffering from megalomania? It is hard to read the Gospels and be satisfied with this explanation. Rather, it is hard to escape the conclusion that Jesus was actually the sanest man who ever lived. He spoke with quiet authority. He always seemed in control of the situation. He was never surprised or rattled. He just does not seem to fit our easy classifications.

There is another reason why Jesus cannot have been crazy. It is the reaction of others to him. Men and women did not merely tolerate Jesus; they either were for him or else violently against him. This is not the way we react to those who are crazy. We may be irritated by a madman's irrational behavior. We may ignore him. We may lock him up if his delusions are dangerous. But we do not kill him. Yet this is what men who did not want to follow him tried to do to Jesus.

The second possibility is that Jesus Christ was a deceiver—the view of some others (v. 12). That is, he was out to fool men deliberately. He wanted to be a big man; therefore he made messianic claims and deluded men and women into believing them. Before we settle on this answer, however, we need to be perfectly clear about all that is involved. In the first place, if Jesus really was a deceiver, he was certainly the best deceiver who ever lived. Jesus claimed to be God, but we must remember that this claim was not made in a Greek or Roman environment where the idea of many gods or even half-gods was acceptable. It was made at the heart of monotheistic Judaism. Nowhere else in the ancient world could one find a strict belief in one God, but this belief was present in Judea in Christ's century. Jews were ridiculed for it. At times they were persecuted. Nevertheless, they stuck to this doctrine and were even fanatical in its defense. It was in this hostile theological climate that Christ made his claims. What happened? The remarkable thing is that he got people to believe in him. Lots of people—men and women, peasants and sophisticates, priests, even eventually members of his own family. So if Jesus was a deceiver, he was at least a good one. He was the best.

On the other hand, if Jesus was a deceiver, he was also the worst deceiver—so much so that he could be termed a devil if he were not God. Think it through clearly. Jesus did not merely say, "I am God," and then let it go at that. He said, "I am God come to save fallen humanity; I am the means of salvation; trust me with your life and your future." Jesus taught that God is holy and that we are barred from him because we are not holy. Our sin is a great barrier between ourselves and God. We cannot come into God's presence. Moreover, he taught that he had come to do something about our problem. He would die for our sin; he would bear our punishment. All who would trust in him would be saved. This is good news. It is even great news—but only if it is true. If it is not true, then we are of all men the most miserable and Jesus Christ should be hated as a fiend from hell. If it is not true, Jesus has condemned millions. He has sent generations of gullible followers to a hopeless eternity.

But has he? Is he a deceiver? Is this the only explanation that we can give of one who was known as being "meek and lowly"; who took the place of a poor itinerant evangelist in order that he might help the destitute and teach those whom others despised; who said, "Come unto me, all you who are weary and are burdened, and I will give you rest"? Somehow the facts do not fit. We cannot face the facts of his life and teaching and still call this man a deceiver. What then? Well, if he was not a deceiver and he was not mad, there is only one possibility left. Jesus is who he said he is. He is God, and we should follow him.

The Inescapable Christ

Do you believe that? I hope you do. Or, at least, I hope you are on the way to believing it. Who is Jesus Christ? The one thing you must try not to do is escape the question.

Some try to escape the question by running away. If you have been doing that, let me challenge you to be entirely honest with yourself on this question. You will not want to believe in Christ without evidence, but consider the evidence. Read one of the Gospels. Read it carefully and critically. Ask yourself: Is Jesus mad? Is he a deceiver? Is he God? And before you read, ask God to help you understand what is written. You do not even have to believe in God for certain.
Just pray, "God (if there is a God), I want you to know that I am an honest seeker after truth, and I want to understand who Jesus Christ is. I know that I cannot be impartial about so great an issue; therefore, I promise that if you show me that Jesus of Nazareth really is your Son and our Savior, I will obey and follow him." I assure you that if you will pray this prayer, God will lead you into his truth. Just a few verses farther on in John's Gospel the Lord himself declares this saying, "If anyone chooses to do God's will, he will find out whether my teaching is from God or whether I speak on my own" (v. 17).

Finally, you may be one who is already intellectually convinced of the truth of Jesus' claims, yet you have not yet committed yourself to him and thus come to know him personally. If you are in this position, you should know that your position is untenable. Do not delay. Honesty demands a response, and divine love draws you to Jesus. Say, "Jesus, I have tried to go my own way until this time. I have tried to avoid you. I was wrong, and I will do so no longer. From now on I accept your death on my behalf. I promise to be your follower."

Chapter 92.
Man's Doctrine, God's Doctrine

John 7:14-18

We come in this chapter to a second important question raised about the Lord Jesus Christ. The first question, which we looked at in the last study, concerned his person. It was expressed in the form: "Who is he?" In answering that question we saw that Jesus of Nazareth cannot be either a good man, a deceiver, or crazy. Hence, he must be God. The second question concerns his teaching: "Is it true? Can it be trusted?" This question was raised by Christ's contemporaries.

"Not until halfway through the Feast did Jesus go up to the temple courts and begin to teach. The Jews were amazed and asked, 'How did this man get such learning without having studied?' Jesus answered, 'My teaching is not my own. It comes from him who sent me. If anyone chooses to do God's will, he will find out whether my teaching comes from God or whether I speak on my own. He who speaks on his own does so to gain honor for himself, but he who works for the honor of the one who sent him is a man of truth; there is nothing false about him" (7:14-18). We realize from these verses that so long as Jesus was hidden from the crowds, as he was for the first half of the feast, the questions of the people concerned him personally. However, when he suddenly appeared and began to teach, the questions shifted from who he was to what he was saying. These were marvelous teachings. The people had never heard anything like them. They were coming from one who had never received formal training in the rabbinical schools.

"Where did he get this teaching?" Hidden within their question was the deeper question as to whether or not anything so radical and new could be trusted. We see the importance of this question when we realize that many persons ask it today when they hear true Christian teaching for the first time.

Not of Human Origin

It is interesting to note how Christ replied, for his reply stressed the enormous gulf that exists between all human teaching and that which is divine in origin. If we had been in this situation, we might have been inclined to stress our own originality, which, in a sense, Jesus himself might have done. However, if he had done that—if he had said that he was self-taught or that he needed no teacher—he would have been discredited at once. For no one in Christ's age prized originality. The rabbis taught by quoting other rabbis, particularly those who had lived before them. The Jewish Talmud today is composed largely of such rabbinic quotations. So Jesus did not do that. Instead, when he was questioned about it he replied, not by denying the need for external authority but by citing the highest authority of all. "My teaching is not my own," he said. "It comes from him who sent me." The tradition out of which Jesus spoke was God's.

This being true, however, it follows that there is an enormous gulf between human traditions and the revelation of God: in other words, between man's doctrine and God's doctrine. These are not the same. They are not even variations of the same basic principles. They are opposed.

Consequently, in all spiritual things we need revelation. And we need to be suspicious of any teaching that originates in man.

Many Differences

God says, in speaking to men, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways" (Isa. 55:8). This is true, and it can be seen by comparing the teaching and views of the world with God's teaching on all the great spiritual issues.

Take the doctrine of God himself. What does the world think about God? Well, the world has differing views. Some of them have been cited by the English writer and Bible translator J. B. Phillips in the book Your God Is Too Small. There is God the Policeman, God the Parental Hangover, the Grand Old Man, God the Managing Director, and so on. If we turn to the books of philosophy, we find definitions that are more carefully constructed but no better. God is the Ideal. He is the Prime Mover. In more modern terms he is the author of the "big bang" that got the expanding universe expanding. Basic to all these ideas, however, is the thought that God is not particularly involved in life now or that, if he is, he is not particularly righteous or fair in the way he goes about it.

How different this is from the Christian view. According to the teaching of Jesus Christ, God is the holy and sovereign God of all eternity and all history. He planned the world from before its creation. He brought each thing into being according to a perfect plan. He sustains life now and guides history. He came in the person of his Son to redeem a fallen humanity. He constantly intervenes to save men and women as an expression of his grace. Moreover, he will one day conduct a righteous and final judgment.

We may also see the difference between the views of human beings and the truth of God in regard to the doctrine of Scripture. What is the Bible? Many will answer that the Bible is a record of man's seeking after God and of his views about God—if indeed they do not say something worse. But God tells us that the Bible is his word about man and to man in his lost condition. Is the Bible human in origin? If so, it is dispensable. Is it divine? If that is the case, it is the only sure foundation for us in a faltering universe.

Unfortunately, even Christians sometimes get off the track on Scripture. This is true of enthusiasts, for instance—those who feel that fervor is the important thing and that teachings do not matter. But they do matter. Those who think this way are a bit like a couple who bought a house shortly after World War II. Houses were not being built too well in those days, but this couple finally thought that they had found a good one. Besides, they noted, it had a fireplace. That was a rare thing in a new home then. The first night in the house was a chilly and windy night, so the husband decided to build a fire in the fireplace. He did, and they watched it burn. Suddenly the fire dropped through the floor into the basement, and when they examined the fireplace they discovered that it had no base. There was nothing for the fire to rest upon except the floor. There is similar waste and uselessness for anyone who attempts to kindle the fires of religious enthusiasm on any other base than the firm teachings and principles of the Word of God.

Man's doctrine and God's doctrine also differ where man himself is concerned. Man's doctrine rates man by man's standards, and by man's standard he is not too bad. At any rate, most people are not too bad, and almost everyone can take comfort from the fact that he is better than someone else in something. If we were to express morality in inches, we would all acknowledge that there are Wilt Chamberlains as well as midgets, and take courage from the fact that we are (at least in our own opinion) somewhat above the average.

But God does not look at man from man's perspective. He looks from his perspective, and from that point of view all persons fall woefully short of his requirements. To return to the illustration of physical height, it is as though God were looking down on us from the top of the Empire State Building in New York. Down on Thirty-eighth Street people might be four, five, or six feet tall and that might seem important. But from God's perspective they all seem like midgets. The Bible says, "For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23).

If you doubt God's verdict upon you and question his evaluation of your character, you need to present your case before the bar of Scripture. Study the law. I am convinced that if you do you will accept yourself after the examination as being far more sinful than you previously imagined.

Sometime ago a San Francisco policeman stopped a car for having a noisy muffler. He found that it was not registered. When he called up the warrants bureau he found that there were fiftynine parking violations registered against the car and that the total charges were $1,217. Finally, he also learned that the driver was the son of Joseph Alioto, the mayor of the city. When word of the unpaid tickets reached the mayor he exploded, but he also ordered a check on the rest of his family. Imagine his surprise when he learned that eight different Aliotos —including the mayor himself, his wife, and four of his sons—owed $422 on twenty-two separate violations. He paid them. In the same way the law exposes our sin and teaches us our true standing before God.

The differences between human opinions concerning the Lord Jesus Christ and the Father's teaching about him are another example. The present chapter of John's Gospel is full of such human opinions. We find some calling Jesus "a good man" (v. 12). This is the most impossible view of all. Some called Christ a "deceiver" (v. 12). Others were willing to call him a "prophet" (v. 40). Some said he was possessed by a demon, another way of saying that he was crazy (v. 20). Some felt that he was very courageous (v. 26) and that he was what we would call a "spellbinder" (v. 46). The truth of the matter is that Jesus is God.

We turn to the death of Jesus Christ, and we find the same variation. Some say that the cross was a tragedy; others, an example of brave suffering. The Bible teaches that the cross was the place of vicarious sacrifice, that Jesus died there for sinful men, and that from before the foundation of the world this great sacrifice was planned as the means by which God would save those whom he had previously determined to save.

You say, "But that is hard to understand and accept." You are right, and that is the whole point. These things are hard to understand and accept. But for that reason God has taken time to explain them. It is why, in the case of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, God the Father began to teach about it back in Old Testament times. The Jewish people were no more prone to accept the idea of vicarious sacrifice than we are. But God used the animal sacrifices, which he established and regulated, to teach that one day the perfect Lamb, his Son, would come and die for the sin of the world.

Finally, we think of judgment, and we find that men scoff at it. "The only hell we shall ever know is the hell we make for ourselves on this earth," they argue. But the Bible says, "In the past God overlooked such ignorance, but now he commands all people everywhere to repent. For he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed. He has given proof of this to all men by raising him from the dead" (Acts 17:30-31). Can you dismiss this doctrine? Must you not rather receive it as the teaching of Christ and of the whole Word of God?

No Satisfaction

The tremendous difference that exists between man's doctrine and God's doctrine leads to a few conclusions.

First, it is only God's doctrine that satisfies. There is no comfort in the speculations of men, at least not in the moments of crisis. If we can be shaken, that which is the product of our minds or hands can be shaken also. The story is told of a Roman Catholic sculptor who lived in Europe years ago. He was dying, and so was visited by his priest. The priest talked to him and then, seeing how ill he was, prepared to give him final unction. "You are dying," he said. He held up a beautiful crucifix. "Look upon your God, who died for you."

The sculptor looked and then cried out, "Alas for me; I made it." There is no satisfaction in that which is the fruit of our own hands. Human theories will not satisfy in the hour of death. Only divine truth will stabilize.

Satisfaction

The second conclusion is that we can be sure of God's doctrine even though it is strange to us.
How? Jesus told how in these verses, showing that the key is to be found in a willingness to obey God and follow in the direction that true doctrine leads, even before we know what it is. He said, "If anyone chooses to do God's will, he will find out whether my teaching is from God or whether I speak on my own" (v. 17). God does not give assurance in spiritual things merely to satisfy curiosity. He does not teach divine truth to those who will not live by it. However, if a man determines in advance that he will live by it—that he is serious with God—then God will disclose the truths of his Word to him. In particular, he will disclose the truth concerning the Lord Jesus Christ to those who determine that they will follow him.

Harry Ironside tells of a young man who did that. He was a cowboy out in Arizona, and he had gotten away from God. For years he had ridiculed and rejected the Bible. But at last, when he was under deep conviction of sin, someone said, "Why don't you just go to God yourself and ask him to make it clear to you?" He took these words to heart. One night by the side of his bed he knelt and prayed, "O God, if there is a God and if you can look down on a poor lost sinner like me and if you can hear my prayer, if Jesus Christ is your Son, reveal this to me; for if you do, I promise that I will serve you for the rest of my days." The cowboy then began to search the Bible. Afterward he said that, although he could not explain it, a change took place and within three days he knew beyond a doubt that the Lord Jesus Christ was indeed the Son of God and his Savior. This man became a faithful servant of the Lord for many years, until God finally took him home to heaven.

If you say, "But I can't believe the Bible," I will tell you why you cannot. You have not yet determined to go the way God's truth leads. However, once you determine to go God's way, you will know these things are true. What will it be for you—God's doctrine or the doctrines of human beings? Will it be truth or error? Make truth your guest. God's truth is the best of all guests. Entertain it, and it will bless you as Abraham was blessed by the visiting angels.

Chapter 93.
Judging by Right Judgment

John 7:19-24

The fundamental spiritual error of the human heart is to think that a person can please God by his own natural efforts. But this error leads to others. It leads to errors in estimating the person and work of Christ, for example. If we are doing all right by our own efforts, or think we are, then we think that we are obviously not much different from Christ himself and certainly do not need a Savior. It also leads to errors concerning the law of God. We are encouraged to believe that the law was given to be followed as a way of salvation—which is nowhere taught in the Bible— rather than as a standard that is meant to condemn sinners and to drive the one who feels its condemnation to the Lord Jesus Christ.

This latter error—the error of thinking that the law was given to be kept as a way of salvation— lies behind the following story.

Christ in Judea

For a number of months, perhaps for the better part of a year, the Lord Jesus Christ had been carrying on a ministry in Galilee. Galilee was north of Judea, and, more than that, it was divided from it by the entirely different and independent land of Samaria. Therefore, what Jesus did in the north was of relatively little concern to the rulers of Judea. After the turning of public opinion in the north, however, and as the time of his prophesied crucifixion grew closer, Jesus returned to Jerusalem and thus at once plunged into the midst of the hostility of the authorities.

What Jesus had done in the north was not really much in the minds of these religious leaders. But there was not one of them who had forgotten that on his last visit to Jerusalem a year before, Jesus had violated their understanding of the sabbath by healing a paralyzed man. That was work, according to their understanding. The law said, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates" (Exod. 20:810). If Jesus could do such things on the sabbath, he was obviously dangerous. He was a sinner, and he was teaching others to sin. At the time of this miracle the leaders had, therefore, tried to kill him. Jesus had escaped. But he had now returned, and they remembered.

The common people as a whole did not recognize this malignant hatred on the part of their leaders. Jesus did, but they did not. Consequently, they did not understand why Jesus was speaking as he was in answering these leaders. Some of the ambiguities of the conversation vanish when we recognize this. Moreover, the purpose of the law becomes clear for us also. For Jesus told why God gave the law at the same time that he was teaching both what are the right and wrong attitudes men hold toward it.

This becomes personal for us, particularly toward the end of Christ's conversation with the people and leaders. For Jesus concluded, "Stop judging by mere appearances, and make a right judgment" (v. 24). To be sure that we do judge rightly, particularly where the law is concerned, we need to pay close attention to Christ's statements.

The Law Condemns

The first statement that the Lord Jesus Christ made was that anyone trusting in the law will be condemned by the law, for no one keeps it perfectly. I know that this is somewhat veiled in this specific conversation, due to the fact that Christ was speaking directly to those men who hated him. Yet this is the general teaching. Jesus said, "Has not Moses given you the law? Yet not one of you keeps the law. Why are you trying to kill me?" (v. 19). Would these men make the law their standard? Well, then, the law would condemn them. They would use the law to attempt to prove that Jesus Christ was a sinner, but even while they were doing it the law would condemn them for their hatred and murderous designs.

The law always does that. It condemns. Someone said to me once that you should never point a finger at someone else and say, "He is responsible." For every time you point a finger at another you have three fingers pointing at yourself. Will you attempt to find another guilty before God's righteous standards? You yourself are condemned. Will you attempt to live by the law? The law will pronounce its judgment upon you.

We find a great illustration of this from an incident in the life of King David. David had sinned in committing adultery with Bathsheba and then in having her husband killed. So God sent the prophet Nathan to the king. Nathan told the king this story. "There were two men in a city," he said, "one rich and the other poor. The poor man had nothing except one ewe lamb, which he had raised as a member of his family. The children played with it, and it ate from his own table. It was almost like a daughter to him. The rich man, on the other hand, had many sheep. One day, when a traveler came to the rich man, the man who had much was not willing to take one of his own flock to prepare it for the traveler but rather took the poor man's lamb and served it to his visitor." David became terribly angry, too angry, in fact. He said, "As surely as the LORD lives, the man who did this deserves to die!" Nathan allowed David to finish his speech, and then told him that David was the man. What does the law do? The law condemns. It shows that we have violated it. Thus, there can never be hope of salvation by observing the law.

There is another reason for this also. The reason is seen in the nature of God's law, which is to demand perfection. The law says, "Cursed is everyone who does not continue to do everything written in the Book of the Law" (Gal. 3:10; cf. Deut. 27:26). If salvation could come by any law, it would come by God's law. God's law is perfect. But no one keeps it. Hence, its very perfection condemns us. Christ's first point was an important one. Anyone trusting in the law will be condemned by the law. If we are to be saved, salvation must come by a different road entirely.

Second, Jesus showed that trusting in the law makes one a hypocrite. For the legalist will condemn in another what he excuses in himself. Here were Jewish leaders condemning Christ for healing a man on the sabbath, but they were refusing to see that they themselves did things that basically were no different. Jesus revealed this in regard to their enactment of the rite of circumcision.

His argument went something like this. It was the law of the Old Testament that a male child should be circumcised on the eighth day after his birth (Lev. 12:3). Naturally, the eighth day would often fall on the sabbath. But it was the teaching of the rabbis, recorded in the Mishnah, that "everything necessary for circumcision" could be done on the sabbath day. "Well," said Jesus, "don't you see what you are doing?

You say that you fully observe the law that was given to you through Moses, including the laws concerning the sabbath. The laws of the sabbath forbid work, and you have interpreted that to mean every kind of activity except that which is absolutely necessary to save life. Technically, this should exclude circumcision. Yet you permit it, and it is right that you do. Moreover, notice that circumcision is a form of mutilation. How hypocritical then for you to blame me for curing a man's body, making it whole, when you for the sake of religion actually mutilate it on the seventh day!"

This is an unusually intricate argument, suited to the particular type of hypocrisy prevalent in Christ's time, but the principle is no less true for ours. Legalism gives birth to hypocrisy. So for this reason also law cannot be the basis for a saving relationship to God Almighty. Besides, it makes men hard. Had the Jewish leaders understood the implications of the Mosaic provision for circumcision on the sabbath "they would have seen that deeds of mercy such as he had just done were not merely permissible but obligatory" for men, as Morris indicates. The Use of the Law

At this point, then, we have come to the end of Christ's specific teachings about the law in John 6. But we are still left with a question. If no one can be saved by the law and if trying to live by law actually tends to make one a hypocrite, why then did God give the law? Did God give the law to condemn? Does God take delight in the law's verdict upon sinful humanity? The answer is that the law was given to point men and women to Christ. The law was not given with the thought that anyone would ever keep it as a way of salvation. The law was a standard given in order to convince men of their true and hopeless condition so that they might turn from their own efforts at salvation and come to God for grace.

The law can be compared to a mirror. The function of a mirror is to show you your face and, if your face is dirty, to show you that it is dirty. The purpose of a mirror is not to wash your face. Imagine a person coming into the house after a hard day's work, looking in a mirror, and discovering that his face is dirty. Then imagine him taking the mirror off the wall and attempting to wash his face with it. How ridiculous! Yes, but it is no more ridiculous than the folly of a man who thinks that he can be made righteous by the law's righteous standards. The purpose of the mirror is to drive one to the soap and water. Similarly, the function of the law is to drive the one who discovers his sin by means of the law to Christ.

But how could he know about Christ? Particularly, how could a Jew living in Old Testament times know that there was to be a Savior? The answer is that at the same time God gave the law, he also gave the instructions concerning the sacrifices. At the same time that he gave Moses, he also gave Aaron, who was the high priest.

It is as though God in the same moment in which he declared, "Thou shalt not," also went on to say, "But I know you will, and so this is the way to get out of it."

Nearly all the sacrifices prescribed in the Old Testament point to Christ, of course. But the meaning of the sacrifice is made particularly clear in two sacrifices always performed in Israel on the Day of Atonement. The first sacrifice was that of a goat that was driven away into the wilderness to die there. This goat was brought to Aaron or to those high priests who followed him. The high priest placed his hands on the head of the goat, thereby identifying himself and the people with it. He then confessed the people's sins, symbolically transferring them to the goat, which was then driven out into the wilderness. The text says, "The goat will carry on itself all their sins" (Lev. 16:22).

The other sacrifice was the sacrifice made in the courtyard of the temple. After making a sacrifice for himself, Aaron was to take another goat, kill it, and then bring its blood into the Holy of Holies where it was to be placed upon the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant beneath the wings of the cherubim. All this was symbolic. The ark contained the stone tablets of the law of Moses, which were broken. The space between the outstretched wings of the cherubim represented the presence of God. Without the blood of the innocent substitute the picture is one of stern judgment and inevitable condemnation. God looks down upon the law that all men have broken. The broken law calls for death. But then, the blood of the goat is placed between God's presence and the law, and God's wrath is averted. Death has occurred. Sin has been punished. Now God looks in grace upon the sinner.

I do not know how much of the great plan of salvation concerning the birth, life, and death of Jesus Christ most of those living before his time understood. Some undoubtedly understood much; others, little. But I do know this: The sacrifices were given to show the way in which salvation was to come, so that when a person despaired of finding salvation by means of the law he might look for a Savior.

Jesus Christ is that Savior. He bore your sin upon himself, if you are one whom the Father has given to him. He carried away your sin, as the scapegoat carried away the sins of the nation. He intervened between the wrath of God and the law that you have broken, as the blood of the sacrifice intervened on the Day of Atonement. He died for you. He died that you might be made the righteousness of God in him (2 Cor. 5:21).

We sing it in many of our hymns.

> What can wash away my sin?
> Nothing but the blood of Jesus;
> What can make me whole > again? Nothing but the > blood of Jesus.
> O precious is the flow
> That makes me white as snow;
> No other fount I know,
> Nothing but the blood of Jesus.

Or again:

> Not the labors of my hands
> Can fulfill thy law's demands;
> Could my zeal no respite know,

Could my tears forever flow, All for sin could not atone;
Thou must save, and thou alone. Rock of ages, cleft for me, Let me hide myself in thee.

Cleansed from Sin

Many years ago, toward the end of the twelfth century, Scotland's great king Robert the Bruce was being chased by English soldiers. They were almost upon him, so when he realized that he was not making the speed he should he left the path and darted through the moorlands and thick forest, hoping to escape. Robert ran mile after mile. But then, just as he was telling himself that perhaps at last he had escaped the vengeance of King Edward, he heard a sound that made his blood run cold. It was the baying of his own bloodhounds. He knew that the English, fearing that they would lose him in the thicket, had let loose his own bloodhounds, putting them on his track. The animals that were supposed to protect their master faithfully were actually serving the English by running him down. Robert knew that it was all over for him unless he could succeed in putting something between himself and the hounds that might throw off his scent. Desperate now and exhausted, he stumbled on until suddenly he came to a clear mountain brook. At once he plunged in, allowed it to sweep him a mile or two downstream, and then came out on the other side of the forest, where he hid and listened as the hounds came up to the water and were able to go no farther. The scent was gone. The king had escaped from his enemies.

You can easily see the application. The law, which is supposed to do us good, actually serves to our hurt and betrays us. We are lost unless we plunge into that one stream that will wash out the scent of sin forever.

Jesus is that stream. Will you come to him? Will you drink of him? Will you allow his blood to cleanse you?

Chapter 94.
Who Has Done More Than Jesus?

John 7:25-31

It is a good thing to ask questions. But there is no point in asking questions unless what we ask leads to answers. Only a fool or a child asks questions just to ask questions. In the verses in John to which we now come there are three questions, each asked by a group of persons who had witnessed a part of the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ. Each of these is important; in fact, one of them is terribly important. Yet not one is answered. We turn, therefore, to the questions, not for the questions themselves but for the answers and, in particular, so that we may arrive at the all-important answer to that question that concerns our own personal estimate of the Lord Jesus Christ and our relationship to him.

Three Questions

The first question is found in verse 25. It is asked by a group of people who were knowledgeable about affairs in Jerusalem. Most of the people did not know of the hostility directed against Jesus by the religious leaders; but some did know of it, and these were puzzled by the fact that Jesus apparently was allowed to go on teaching. Their question was: "Isn't this the man they are trying to kill?" John does not give the answer to this question, but the answer is obvious. "Yes, it is!" Since Jesus is the sinless Son of God, this answer tells us much about the corruption of the human heart.

The second question follows immediately upon the first one as the result of a kind of reasoning by those who had asked it. "Have the authorities really concluded that he is the Christ?" (v. 26). The answer was, "No, they have not"—and that is because they did not wish to know. This answer exposes the truly lost condition of men and women, for none are so blind as those who will not see, or deaf, who will not hear.

Finally, there is a question by another group who, we are told, actually believed in Jesus. Their question deals with Christ's actions and is expressed as follows: "When Christ [that is, the Messiah] comes, will he do more miraculous signs than this man?" (v. 31). The answer at this point, although John once again does not give it explicitly, is: "No, he will not." Consequently, the conclusion must be that Jesus is the Christ, and that we should believe on him as the Savior.

Do you believe on him? Is he your Savior? If not, you must ask yourself this question: When the Messiah comes, will he do more—could he do more—than Jesus?

Christ and the Scriptures

Let me help you a bit with your answer, and let me do so by bringing to mind some of the things that Jesus has done. First, Jesus alone has fulfilled the Scriptures. This is his own teaching. He said, "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17).

It is also confirmed by observation. Toward the end of the brilliant ministry of John the Baptist, after he had been thrown into prison, John's spirits sagged. The time came when he sent friends to Jesus to ask whether Jesus was indeed the Messiah or whether he and his followers should look for another. Jesus did not answer directly but instead sent back a quotation from Isaiah in which he detailed the accomplishments of his ministry. He said, "Go back and report to John what you hear and see: The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the good news is preached to the poor. Blessed is the man who does not fall away on account of me" (Matt. 11:4-6). Jesus' claim was based on an appeal to the Scriptures, and his point was that he alone was fulfilling them. In time, as we know, he fulfilled them completely, even to the point of the prophecies concerning the specific details of his death and resurrection.

When the Messiah comes, will he do more to fulfill the detailed prophecies of the Old Testament than Jesus has done?

Jesus Is God

Second, because of fulfilling the Scriptures and for other reasons, Jesus has convinced millions that he is God manifest in human flesh and that he alone has answers to the deep problems of life.

We must not think that believing in an incarnate God came easy to Christ's contemporaries while it is hard for us today. It may have been easy for Greeks or Romans, for much of their mythology contained similar ideas. But it was not easy for Jesus' Jewish contemporaries, and it was among orthodox Jews that the gospel first gained a foothold. Here were people who had been raised in a culture based upon centuries of ardent monotheism. They declared in their synagogues, "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one LORD" (Deut. 6:4). They abhorred the polytheism of the gentile cultures of the day. Yet, through talking with Jesus and through observing him as he went about the countryside teaching and doing good, these men came to believe that he was more than man, that he was God incarnate. Many of them later died as martyrs rather than renounce that belief. Peter declared, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). Thomas called him "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28). Paul wrote that he was "declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4).

It is the same today. Millions confess Jesus to be the One whom he claimed to be. Centuries separate us from the time in which Jesus Christ lived and carried on his ministry. The weight of secular opinion, steeped as it is in skepticism, is against the conclusion that Jesus is God. Yet Jesus has spoken to us and convinced those of us who have studied his life and been moved by it that he is God and that he has the answers to life. Who else has convinced millions of this truth, as Jesus has done?

When the Messiah comes, will he convince more people of his godhead than have already been convinced by Jesus?

A Social Revolution

Third, Jesus has launched the only great and lasting social changes the world has ever seen. That is a categorical statement, but it is justified. At the time of Christ's coming the world was a place of great cruelty and horror. Slavery was universally practiced and accepted. Gladiatorial contests brought literal death before the eyes of millions for amusement. Unwanted children were exposed upon the hillsides to die. Pride divided the free man from the slave, Jew from Gentile, man from woman, Roman from Greek. It was a barbarous age, as Fellini has so well depicted in his Satyricon and Roma and as the historians of the time have reported.

But Jesus changed that. He came, not with a social program alone, but with a new ethic founded upon a new life that was his life within all who should follow him. The change did not happen at once. In the early years, the preachers of the gospel were fortunate if they were given an opportunity just to preach the gospel. But, in time, the life of the risen Lord took hold of at least some people, and a number of others, even those who were not Christians, responded.

The greatest changes took place during the reigns of the emperors Constantine and Justinian. Cruel sports, such as those of the arena, were checked, for Christians opposed them. Laws came into being that protected the slave. He could no longer be branded as a sign of ownership, for instance. He could no longer be killed at the whim of his owner. Children were given legal rights that they had never before possessed. Hospitals and orphanages came into being. At times the progress was slow. There were setbacks. The Middle Ages were in some ways a return to barbarism. Those who went by the name of Christian often did non-Christian things. Still, at the time of the recovery of the gospel during the Reformation period, the social conscience of Christianity was found not to be lost. So we find Zwingli instituting social reforms at Zurich, and Calvin creating jobs for the thousands of refugees who thronged the streets of Geneva.

Zwingli transformed the preacher's monastery into a poorhouse where food was dispensed each day to those who wanted it. Begging was abolished. Apprentices were subsidized. Poor children were clothed. The register in which the rules were recorded regarding the care of beggars still exists; and the inscription at the top of the page begins, "Be merciful, says the Lord, as your Father in heaven is merciful."

Please do not misunderstand me. I do not mean to say by this rehearsal of history that nonChristians have never done a charitable deed, still less that Christians have always done them. In ancient times there were acts of charity practiced by some individuals. In our day much is done by non-Christians in proper imitation of Christian standards. But Jesus is the starting point nonetheless. He alone has inspired men, not only to do, but to persevere in the doing of that which we call social concerns and actions.

When the Messiah comes, will he bring about greater social changes than those occasioned by Jesus?

The Emancipator

Fourth, Jesus has liberated the souls of millions. When Jesus was on earth, at the beginning of his ministry on one occasion he entered the synagogue at Nazareth where he had been brought up and was asked to read the Old Testament lesson. He took the scroll of Isaiah and began to read from the sixty-first chapter. He read: "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners and recovery of sight for the blind, to release the oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor" (Luke 4:18-19). He then declared, "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing" (v. 21).

In this Old Testament quotation two phrases speak of emancipation: "to preach deliverance to the captives" and "to set at liberty them that are bruised." This was one of the most important parts of Christ's ministry. In Christ's day men and women were in physical bondage, but an even greater truth is that in his day, as in ours, many more were in spiritual bondage. They were bound by sin. Never more than one-half or two-thirds of the people on earth have ever been held in physical slavery at any one time. But all men at all times have been held captive by sin. Jesus has set millions free. Some were held down by drink, but Christ freed them. Others were enslaved by drugs, but Jesus broke those shackles. He has freed men of pride, arrogance, selfishness, and thousands of other debilitating things.

Has he done that for you? Or are you still caught in something from which you cannot free yourself? He can free you. Above all, he can liberate your soul. Charles Wesley wrote a magnificent verse of a great hymn about it. The stanza goes:

> Long my imprisoned spirit lay
> Fast bound in sin and nature's night;
> Thine eye diffused a quick'ning ray,
> I woke, the dungeon flamed with light;
> My chains fell off, my heart was free, I rose, went forth, and followed Thee.

When the Messiah comes, will he provide us with a greater measure of true spiritual freedom than Jesus provides for those who come to him?

Healer of Broken Hearts

Finally, there is a phrase in these verses that points to Jesus as the healer of broken hearts. He said that God sent him "to heal the brokenhearted," and this he has done.

We do not often talk about broken hearts, for the subject is much too personal. Yet there are broken hearts, millions of them. They are all around us, and we often are touched in this way ourselves. There is no one who is exempt. I talk to men whose wives have been unfaithful to them. Sometimes they are in the ministry. I talk to women who have lost their husbands to other women, but who still love their husbands. Some have had their hearts broken by, death or by the fact that their children have left home and have to all appearances rejected Christ and Christianity. Some have failed in life. Some are homeless. These are the heartbreaks of human existence; and if Jesus Christ does not have the answer, there is just no answer.

But there is an answer, of course, and he has it. Jesus said that God sent him to heal the brokenhearted. Will Jesus Christ fail? Abraham succeeded in the task that God gave him. Moses succeeded. So did David and all the rest. Is Jesus Christ only to fail? Not at all. He has done what the Father sent him to do in millions of cases, and he is still doing it today. Heartbreak may be all too real, but those who have known Christ's love and power have been able to go on with their lives, rejoicing in him. Horatius Bonar sang,

> I have no help but thine, nor > do I need Another arm save > thine to lean upon:
> It is enough, my Lord, enough indeed;
> My strength is in thy might, thy might alone.

Jesus heals broken hearts. When the Messiah comes, will he heal more hearts than Jesus?

Come to Jesus

At the time of the Civil War in America a young man still in his teens was court-martialed by the Union Army and sentenced to be shot. He had gone to the war before he had to, because his friend had gone, and in friendship he had been willing to stand guard one night while his friend was somewhere else. Unfortunately, he had been on duty himself the night before; so, having been awake for two nights, he could not resist drowsiness and fell asleep at his post. For this he was sentenced to death.

When news of what had happened reached the boy's parents in New England their hearts were broken. To think that their only and beloved son should be shot! The boy's sister, a little girl who had read the life of Lincoln and knew from her reading how much he loved his own children, said, "If Abraham Lincoln knew how my father and mother loved my brother, he would not let him be shot." She determined that she would see the President. Security was not so strict in those days as it is today. So when the little girl reached the White House and told her story to the sentinel on duty, he was touched by her imploring looks, and passed her in. Mr. Lincoln's private secretary did the same thing. She was ushered into Lincoln's office and found herself in the company of Lincoln and his generals. The little girl told her simple story, stressing the grief of her parents. Lincoln was touched. He then wrote out a dispatch canceling the sentence and paroling the boy so he could return home to his father and mother.

This is a story of how a mere man can be moved by compassion. But it makes the point that if a man can be so moved, how much more compassionate and ready to heal hearts is Jesus Christ, who is more than man. Bring your need to him. Accept the comfort he can give you. And learn, as countless others have learned, that there is no one who can do more than Jesus.

Chapter 95.
"Where I Am, You Cannot Come"

John 7:32-36

It is impossible to read the first seven chapters of John's Gospel without becoming aware of the hostility that was building up against Jesus Christ on the part of the religious leaders and without beginning to anticipate the nature of the conflict that was to come. At the beginning of the Gospel we are warned that although Jesus came unto his own people, nevertheless "his own did not receive him" (1:11). Later we are told that the leaders of the nation repeatedly schemed to kill him. Up to this point, however, nothing overt has been done against Jesus. Now this changes, for an attempt is made to arrest him. John writes that when "the Pharisees heard the crowd whispering such things about him ... the chief priests and the Pharisees sent temple guards to arrest him" (7:32).

It is a strange mixture of good and evil, of light and shadow that we find in this chapter. On the one hand, we learn of a favorable response toward Christ by some of the people; this response precipitated the Pharisees' action. On the other hand, we hear of an official attempt at suppression. Here we see the Pharisees and chief priests—the phrase generally denotes the official body of the Sanhedrin in John's Gospel—sitting in judgment on Jesus. In the following verses we see one of their own number, Nicodemus, defending him. Even the attempted arrest presents the same ambiguity. For although in this section we see the officers dispatched to arrest Jesus, in just a little while we find them returning with the task unfinished. "Why didn't you bring him in?" they are asked.

The officers reply, "No one ever spoke the way this man does."

What is the situation at this point? It is an awakening of belief by some, accompanied on the part of others by the most intense hatred. In this situation it is of great value to study the response of the Lord Jesus Christ to his adversaries, for his response can help us when we are confronted by similar situations.

The most important verses are 33 and 34. Jesus said, "I am with you for only a short time, and then I go to the one who sent me. You will look for me, but you will not find me; and where I am, you cannot come."

"I Am with You"

There are many lessons that can be drawn from this response, but the first, and certainly one of the most valuable, is that the servant of God cannot be held back from his work or be killed before he has completed that which God has given him to do. Thus Jesus replies, first of all, that regardless of what they may try to do he will be with them "only a short time."

It would not be a great while, of course. It was only to be six months—the period between the Feast of Tabernacles in the fall of the year, around which these remarks are dated, and the Passover at which Christ would be crucified in the spring. Still, so long as those six months had not passed, no one could take him. His hour, as the evangelist says in verse 30, had not come.

It is the same today. Luther, who faced similar problems in his time, wrote on these verses: "Who is Christ's protector? Who fends off his enemies? No one.... Nothing is said about many thousands of mounted soldiers or about thirty thousand foot soldiers who defended him. No, his entire armor is a little hour granted him until his crucifixion. That hour was not yet at hand, and since it was not, all the designs of his enemies against him were futile." Luther then concludes by noting that it will be so always. Nothing can touch the Christian unless it coincides with God's explicit command and order.

This includes even the hatred and schemes of the devil. Let me illustrate this by one of the great stories of the Bible.

Back in the Old Testament, just before the Book of the Psalms, there is the story of Job, a man whom we would classify as a rich but otherwise insignificant gentleman farmer but who becomes great in spiritual things because of what God allowed to transpire in his life. God allowed a great struggle brought on by the assaults of Satan. Yet God only allowed it because he knew in advance that through the strength that he would give to him, his servant Job would triumph. The point of the story in which we are most interested is that Satan was unable to do anything to Job until God first permitted it and even then it was permitted only because God knew that Job would be the victor. In other words, the story is an illustration of 1 Corinthians 10:13: "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it."

God's Hedge

The Bible tells us that Job lived in the land of Uz and that he was fairly prosperous, though not by the standards of a very wealthy landowner or rancher in our time. His inventory was 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen, and 500 donkeys. Besides this, there were all the necessary servants for such a household. Job also had seven sons and three daughters. The Bible tells us that Job was "blameless and upright; he feared God and shunned evil" (Job 1:1).

The day came, however, when the sons of God with Satan in their midst came to present themselves before the Lord. God initiated the conversation, directing his initial question to Satan: "Where have you come from?" Satan replied that he had been going to and fro in the earth and had been walking up and down in it.

Then came the important question: "Have you considered my servant Job? There is no one on earth like him; he is blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil" (1:8). The question is important because it indicates that the sufferings of Job began not only by God's permission, which Satan certainly needed to have, but also by God's direction. For it was God and not Satan who brought Job into the conversation.

Satan had undoubtedly heard of Job. Perhaps a lesser demon had brought Job to his attention, or perhaps Satan had even investigated Job himself. We do not know the details. All we know is that Satan did know of Job by the time God asked the question. For when God asked, "Have you considered my servantjob?" Satan immediately replied, "Does Job fear God for nothing? ...Have you not put a hedge around him and his household and everything he has?" (1:9-10). He added, "But stretch out your hand and strike everything he has, and he will surely curse you to your face" (1:11).

The last part of this reply was untrue, of course, as the story shows. For Job did not curse God even when his substance was taken from him. Nevertheless, we must note that the first part was true and that it contained a great admission. Satan imputed the wrong motives to Job, to be sure. He implied that Job served God only because God protected him. But the true part—the interesting part—is that God had been protecting Job. Satan admits it. In other words, by admitting that God had placed a hedge about Job, Satan was also admitting that either he or one of his minions (or many of them) had been attacking Job but had been unsuccessful because of the protecting shield that God throws about all those who have put their trust in his grace.

Satan would pass over the hedge if he could. But he cannot. He would make the righteous fall if it were possible. But it is not. We see how God later shielded the people of Israel against the Egyptians, David against Saul, Peter against Herod, and the Lord Jesus Christ against all who would have sought to have hindered his ministry in any way contrary to the Father's will. In the same way we are protected.

The Assaults of Satan

Satan admitted that he could not touch Job, but he also made the accusation that Job remained faithful to God only because of that fact. So with great brevity God replies that in order to make the matter clear and to prove that Satan's accusation is untrue, he will lower the hedge. He will not remove it completely. But he will lower it so that Satan may touch all that Job has, excepting his person.

Now the full force of Satan's wrath falls against this aging saint. A servant arrives to tell him that marauders have carried off his oxen and donkeys and that they have killed the servants who were attending them. Another comes with news that lightning has killed both the sheep and those attending them. A third servant tells him that bandits have stolen the camels and that those servants have died. Finally, a messenger arrives to say that a whirlwind struck the house in which his children were eating and that they were killed in an instant. No doubt Satan steps back, waiting for his prophecy that Job would curse God to be fulfilled. But Job stands firm. He is filled with legitimate sorrow and great grief. But faith wards off the defeat that Satan is looking for. Instead of cursing, "Job got up and tore his robe and shaved his head. Then he fell to the ground in worship and said: 'Naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I will depart.

The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised'" (1:20-21). Job had triumphed, and God was vindicated.

Again the time came when the sons of God presented themselves before Jehovah, and the same questions were asked. "Where have you come from?"

"From roaming through the earth and going back and forth in it." This time the reply seems a bit evasive, for the heavenly host knew Satan had actually been in Job's backyard.

God continued, "Have you considered my servant Job? There is no one on earth like him; he is blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil. And he still maintains his integrity...."

Satan answered, "Skin for skin! ...A man will give all he has for his own life. But stretch out your hand and strike his flesh and bones, and he will surely curse you to your face" (2:1-5). This was also untrue, of course, as were aspects of Satan's former challenge. But God permits the challenge, this time giving Satan permission to touch Job's body, but not to take his life. At once Satan leaves and inflicts Job with boils which, we read, covered him "from the soles of his feet to the top of his head." What happened? Once again Job stood firm in his faith. And he did not falter even though his wife turned against him and his friends began to give him worldly counsel.

God's Blessing

We get to the end of the story and find that God again blesses Job and doubles all that he had given to him previously. When his friends were speaking to him, trying to convince him that he must have been guilty of some sin because of what had happened, Job replied to them argument by argument. But when at the last God spoke, Job remained silent. Job listened. Then he gave a great statement of faith and prayed for those friends who had given him bad counsel. At this point the Lord rescinded Satan's permit to attack Job and restored to him the outward marks of his favor. We are told, "After Job had prayed for his friends, the LORD made him prosperous again and gave him twice as much as he had before" (Job 42:10).

Incidentally, although it is extraneous to the point I have been making, we should not pass over the ending without noticing that it contains a lesson for all believers concerning their children. The lesson is that the children of believers can never be lost to them. For even if the children should die, the children are still theirs and will be reunited to them one day.

We see this truth by comparing the opening list of Job's family and possessions with the list that closes the book after God is said to have doubled them. Before, Job had owned 7,000 sheep; now there are 14,000. Before, there were 3,000 camels; now there are 6,000. Before, 500 each of yokes of oxen and donkeys; now, 1,000. But then we come to the list of children and find the numbers identical. Before, there were seven sons and three daughters; now there are seven sons and three daughters. Is something wrong? Not at all. It is merely God's way of saying that the original sons and daughters—unlike the animals, which did not possess immortal souls—were not lost to Job and that in the end he actually possessed fourteen sons and six daughters, though half of them were with God in glory. Thus it is for every Christian parent who has lost a child.

If you have lost a child, as Job did, never say that you once had a child but do not have one now. Say that you have a child and that he or she is in heaven.

Now Is the Time

This story has taken us far afield, but it has nevertheless illustrated the first great point of Christ's reply to his critics in Jerusalem. They were threatening to arrest him. He replies that nothing can touch him so long as he still has work to do. In other words, nothing can touch him (or ourselves) until it has first been filtered through the perfect and loving will of our heavenly Father. We are to take comfort in that and be strong in the work that has been entrusted to us.

There is one other lesson also. Jesus referred to himself by saying, "I am with you for only a short time." But then he went on to remind his hearers that although he would be with them for a short time, nevertheless, the day of God's grace for them would not last forever. "Then I go to the one who sent me. You will look for me, but you will not find me; and where I am, you cannot come." That was true in an obvious, historical way for Judaism. Christ was present among the Jews for three years. His three-year ministry was followed by a forty-year-ministry by those whom he had specifically chosen as apostles. But then Jerusalem fell to the Romans, and the Christians were scattered throughout the world to preach the gospel. In an ironic way they went to the persons mentioned in the question put by Christ's hearers: "Where does this man intend to go, that we cannot find him? Will he go to where our people live scattered among the Greeks, and teach the Greeks?" (v. 35). When the Christians did go to the dispersed Jews and to the Greeks the day of national opportunity ended at least for a time for Judaism.

It will end also for Gentiles when God in his own time brings this age to its close. It might end for you tonight. What is the state of your commitment? Have you sought Jesus and found him? Have you entered into that deep security that commitment to him brings? I hope you have or else that you will make that commitment now. He loves you. He died for you. He wants you to live for him. The Bible says: "Seek the LORD while he may be found, call on him while he is near" (Isa. 55:6). It says, "I tell you, now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2).

Chapter 96.
An Invitation and a Promise

John 7:37-39

During the course of a year each of us receives many invitations. Some of them are gladly received: invitations to a wedding of good friends, to an intimate dinner, to a concert, to an evening of quiet conversation. Other invitations are not so welcome, and we find ourselves asking, "Do I have to go there?" or, "How can I get out of responding to that one?" In this chapter we come to the most important and happy invitation you and I can ever receive, and the great promise that goes with it. It is in the words of Jesus. "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him" (7:37-38).

The Setting

By now we are acquainted with the setting in which these words, the last spoken by Jesus in this chapter, were uttered. Jesus had gone to the Feast of Tabernacles at Jerusalem and had begun to preach. Most were astounded at his teaching and were asking themselves if this might indeed be the Messiah whom all were expecting. The rulers, on the other hand, only increased their hatred of him and schemed how they might have him arrested and removed. Within a short time this enmity would build to a climax and Christ would be crucified. Moreover, since many had come up to this feast from other places and would soon be going back while Jesus remained in Judea, many would be seeing Christ no more.

As a result of this situation we find a new intensity in Christ's teaching. We are told that it was now the last day of the eight-day feast; on the next day the crowds would be gone. We are told that the invitation was given as Christ "stood and said in a loud voice." Here is intensity of appeal and great simplicity. Here is the core of the gospel. Other occasions would remain for deeper teaching and for secondary matters.

But this was not the time for that. This was the time to touch men's souls and to draw them to Christ for salvation. It was now or never for many. So the invitation is given. "Do you have a thirst?" Christ asks them. "Do you want salvation? Then come; come to me. Here and here alone is where you can find it."

What a day this would be if we, unlike that great crowd of a former day, should all come to Jesus and drink from him freely! And why should we fail to come to him? May the living Spirit of our God accomplish that as we examine both the extent of Christ's invitation and the nature of the promise in this study.

A Great Invitation

We must appreciate the extent of Christ's invitation. On the one hand, it is as broad as humanity, for Jesus says, "If anyone...." As in his day, so also in ours—all are included in the invitation.

We get a sense of the breadth of this invitation when we think of the extent of that original Jerusalem congregation. Who was there at the feast? Jews were there—Jews from every part of Palestine and from every part of the empire. Jews were always going to Jerusalem for these feasts. Moreover, Gentiles were there also—some no doubt as proselytes, others simply as interested bystanders. We have a feeling for the mixed nature of this multitude when we remember that on the day of Pentecost, as the result of Peter's preaching, Parthians, Medes, Elamites, Libyans, Romans, Cretans, Arabians, and Greeks of Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, heard him. A similar situation would have existed on this earlier occasion. Yet we do not find Jesus limiting his offer. "If anyone is thirsty, let him come!" All may come. Today the same sound flows forth from every true Christian pulpit and from all who bear a faithful witness to Christ in our land.

Have you heard it? Have you listened to that great invitation? I wonder if you have noticed that in this verse Jesus does not even detail the nature of the thirst. He might have been more specific. He once said, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness" (Matt. 5:6). He might have said, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after goodness or purity or holiness; for they shall be filled." He could have said, "If anyone is thirsty for me, let him come and drink." But he was not specific. There were no limitations. Is there a thirst? Then come! You are the one to whom the Lord Jesus Christ is speaking.

You may say, "But I am thirsting for pleasure, and the pleasure I am seeking is not Christian." Very well. But if you want real pleasure, pleasure that lasts and that truly satisfies, you will find it in Christ and not in the direction you are going. The Bible says, "At thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (Ps. 16:11 KJV).

Someone else may say, "I am not concerned for pleasure; I am concerned for wealth. Will I find wealth in Jesus?" In your sense, no. But in a better sense, yes. The Bible says that if we become God's children, then we are heirs, "heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:17). It also says, "What good is it for a man to gain the whole world, yet forfeit hs soul?" (Mark 8:36). Oh, that there might be men and women who thirst today, for even thirst after the wrong thing is better than apathy. Oh, that men and women might come to him!

In these words, then, there is an invitation as wide as humanity.

On the other hand, there is also a sense in which, sadly, the great scope of this text is realistically narrowed down. It is true that the Lord Jesus addressed the invitation to "anyone," but we can hardly miss the fact that he did so in the midst of a conditional sentence. He said, "If anyone is thirsty...." And that is as much as to admit that there may not be many.

I can imagine that at this point our Lord's eyes swept over the vast congregation listening to him. The expressions in the eyes that glanced back were like those of our day. Some showed callousness; some hatred —they were the ones intent on his destruction. Some showed indifference. Some eyes were blank and uncomprehending. All preachers experience this. I never stand to preach the gospel but I am made aware of the fact that there are many who do not understand the gospel and who, even if they do understand it, will not receive the Savior. To such we preach soul-satisfaction. We share Christ's invitation. But they, although they are in the midst of a spiritual desert of their own making, will not drink from this fountain. We warn them of their danger, and they dismiss it lightly. We speak of the law's condemnation, and they laugh at such old-fashioned notions. The mass of men never thirsts after salvation. Do you thirst?

You say, "I do not know whether I do or not." Well, find out. Turn your eye inward and ask, "Is there no thirst within me? Am I not dissatisfied about something? Is there not some area of my life in which I am unfulfilled?" If you are such a one, then God has placed that hunger and thirst within you. Rejoice! And come to Jesus! He said, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink.... streams of living water will flow from within him."

Come to Me

I have already anticipated my next point, as you will see, for it has to do with directions. What are they? They are directions that point you to Jesus. Do not say, "But what am I to believe?

What doctrines must I accept?" That will come in time, but it is not the step for you to take now.

If you are thirsty, come to Jesus. He said, "Come to me."

Above all, do not make the mistake of coming to the church as an institution or become preoccupied with its rites and ceremonies. Ceremonies are intended to point you to Christ. If you look to them in themselves, they will deceive you.

This was true in Christ's day and is well illustrated by the procedures that were taking place at this season. There were eight days to the great Feast of Tabernacles, and on each day certain public ceremonies were enacted. All were intended to remind the people of God's provision for them during the days of their desert wandering and to point them forward to the Messiah in whom they would all be fulfilled. On the eighth day, the day on which Jesus stood up and cried out this invitation, the ceremonies were particularly impressive. On that day the priests, accompanied by the worshipers, went outside the city to the pool of Siloam—the pool to which Jesus later sends the blind man. Here they filled golden pitchers with water. Then, returning to the city, they marched seven times around the altar and concluded by pouring the water from the pool upon it. Clearly, the ceremony reminded them of God's provision of water for the people during their forty years in the wilderness.

This was done on the last great day of the feast, as I have said; and it was against this background, perhaps at this very climactic moment, that the voice of Jesus rang out—"If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me." The ceremonies had value in reminding the people of God's past provision. We must not scorn them. But they also pointed to Jesus as the One who truly satisfied. Hence, he called upon the people to turn from the ceremonies and come to him.

Have you done what Christ's invitation requires? It is expressed in two parts, and the parts are synonomous. That is, they reinforce and interpret each other. First, you are to "come." That is not hard, especially when the One to whom you are to come is so lovely. And it need not be lengthy, for Jesus has already taken the greatest part of the journey in coming to you. "Come" means to believe, to have faith in him, to commit yourself to him. Will you do that? I wrote earlier that you will get to the fullness of the doctrines by and by. But you should notice even now that if you come to Jesus, you will be coming to the One who came to this earth to redeem you, who died on the cross for your sin, and who then rose again and was glorified by God, his Father. The author of the Gospel has this full picture of the victorious Christ in view, for the next verse alludes to it in the remark that "Jesus was not yet glorified." Second, you are invited to "drink" from Christ, as you would from a fountain. All that has been said about coming applies to this word too, but drinking involves one further idea. It involves appropriation. That which you drink becomes a part of you. If it is wholesome, it helps you grow. Thus does Christ want to become part of your life and personality.

Will you come? Will you drink? There is no other prescription for the thirst of the human soul. There is no other drink but Jesus. Do not delay in coming. You have not come before, and that was wrong. But you may come now. That is the great invitation.

A Great Promise

Finally, one should see that there is also a great promise. Jesus said, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink." Then he added, "Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him."

I wonder if you would have written the verse that way if you had been speaking or if you were (humanly speaking) the author of John's Gospel. I rather doubt it. Is it not true that if you or I had been writing, we would have tended to say, "And if anyone comes to me and drinks, he will be satisfied; his thirst will be quenched"? Of course we would. But that is not the nature of this promise. It is not the fact that we will be satisfied that Christ mentions. It is rather that we will become the means by which others, in addition to ourselves, will be satisfied. This means that to be Christ-centered is not to be self-centered. It is to be others-centered. It is to be made a blessing.

Now it goes without saying that we ourselves will be satisfied. In fact, we must be satisfied. Here Christ is telling us that we shall be overflowing vessels, but no vessel was ever overflowing until it had first been filled. Of course, we must be filled if this is to happen. But the point is that, if we drink of him, our minds of necessity will not be on our own satisfaction, but rather on the satisfaction of others.

It is at this point that much of our present-day Christianity is found wanting. To hear most Christians talk you would think that the sole purpose of Christ's coming was to save them and to satisfy them. That is one purpose, of course. But that is not the way in which I find the Christian life described in my Bible. That kind of Christianity—when not balanced by the truth we are considering—produces a shallow, experience-centered, introverted, and eventually selfish approach to life and to those around us. We are not called to that. Jesus did not die to give us warm feelings. The work of the Holy Spirit—for this promise is ultimately about the Holy Spirit—is to make you precisely as Christ was in this world. And that means getting outside yourself, getting interested in others, and becoming useful. Have you entered into this promise? Are others experiencing abundance of blessing through you?

If not, you need to ask God to make you, not only a satisfied believer who has drunk of Christ for himself and has found his own needs met, but also a useful believer who overflows his family, neighborhood, and church with blessing. I assure you that you will never know the true extent of your own satisfaction until you become the channel for such a blessing for other people.

A Flood of Blessing

What would happen if we were each—each one who knows Jesus as his Savior—to become such a blessing? I suppose that, if each one were to become such a river, we should have a veritable flood of God's blessing.

I long for such a flood, don't you? What a wonderful thing it would be! Spurgeon spoke of it back in the nineteenth century, comparing it to the incoming tides on the Thames that lifted the great river barges. When the tide was out nothing could move those barges as they lay in the mud of the river's bottom. A team of men could not move them. Machinery could never get them moved out to the sea. But then the tide would come, and soon they would be floating. When the tide returned, even a child could move them by his hand.

Oh, for a floodtide of God's grace! I know of some boats that need floating. They do not work for God. They are not interested in the spiritual wellbeing of others. They do not come out to prayer meetings. They do not witness. I cannot move them. They need to be set afloat. Pray with me that there might be such a flood of God's grace through deeply satisfied hearts that we all might be borne up together and that these along with many others might become active. God grant it, for their sake and for the world.

Chapter 97.
Christ, a Divider of Men

John 7:40-44

I am sure that I do not have all the answers to why the Lord Jesus Christ produces divisions among men, as he does. But this is the case, and I am not at all sure that it is to be regretted.

For one thing, Jesus himself prophesied that this was to be the case. He said, "Do not suppose that I have come to bring peace to the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword. For I have come to turn 'a man against his father, a daughter against her mother, a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law—a man's enemies will be the members of his own household'" (Matt. 10:34-36). For another thing, divisions are natural where truth is concerned. They go with strong doctrine. The great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon once wrote of the reality of this in his day, saying, "I have heard of a whole parish in which there were no religious bickerings because there was no religion; there were no religious strifes because nobody had anything worth striving for. And that," he added, "is not a state of things over which I can rejoice." Nor can anyone rejoice in such a situation. At the same time we must sorrow over the fact that any division between men and women over Jesus necessarily means that some will not believe in him or come to him for salvation. And we want many to come. This is the point of the verses to which we now come in our verse-by-verse study of John's Gospel, which tell us that at this point of Christ's ministry "the people were divided because of Jesus" (7:43).

A Division between Nonbelievers

In the first place, there was a division among nonbelievers because of him. Indeed, the verses talk primarily about this division.

There were those who thought him to be "the Prophet" (v. 40). This means that they were willing to accept a portion of his claims but not all of them. The prophet, of course, was the Messiah whose coming was foretold by Moses in Deuteronomy 18:15. But in popular usage in the time of Christ this phrase had come to denote that prophet who was expected to come as a forerunner of the Messiah (Mal. 4:5-6). In other words, the prophet was thought to be the one who would point to the answer to man's need but who, nevertheless, was not himself the answer. In calling Jesus by this title, the people were acknowledging that he was a good man who spoke wisely. They were even recognizing a certain grandeur about him that might indicate that he was sent by God. But they were not admitting the full import of his claims—that he was God and that men and women could find spiritual satisfaction only by coming to him.

There are many today who act in this way. We speak of Jesus Christ and his teaching, and those who act this way merely sort out what is said so that all that might possibly exert a personal claim upon them is excluded. They will come to Jesus for inspiring thoughts. Perhaps they will even go to church on a Sunday morning for the "good" it will do them—or send their children. But they will not follow Jesus. They will not acknowledge him to be their Lord.

Second, there were people among the crowd who went further. These were willing to acknowledge that he actually was all that he claimed to be. They said, "He is the Christ" (v. 41). However, although they admitted Christ's claims, they did not do that one additional thing that is absolutely necessary. They did not follow out the proper consequence of their belief by coming to him.

Is it too much to suggest that there are people in any congregation and in any Christian group who can be described in this manner? It is probably most always the case. That may be the case for you. You have heard the Christian gospel over a long period of time, and you understand what it is that we are talking about. You do not deny the truthfulness of the Scriptures. You affirm it. You do not doubt that Jesus Christ is the unique Son of God. You believe it. You do not question the factualness of the crucifixion nor the meaning of Christ's death for your life. You understand this. You know that he died for you. In fact, if you were to go elsewhere and hear a different gospel, you would know at once that it is different and would say, "But that is not what Dr. Boice has been teaching." All this is true, and yet you have never accepted Jesus Christ as your personal Savior. You have never determined to follow him. What a sad state! How tragic to have an orthodox head wedded to a rebellious heart! Why not make today the day in which you go the whole way and receive Jesus Christ as your Savior?

Third, there were people who rejected Jesus entirely and who did so apparently on a quibble.
Their friends had said, "He is the Christ." But they replied, "How can the Christ come from Galilee? Does not the Scripture say that the Christ will come from David's family and from the town of Bethlehem, the town where David lived?" (vv. 41-42). In other words, they thought that Jesus failed to satisfy one of the prophecies of the Old Testament about the Messiah. So they dismissed him. They had no further use for him or for his teaching.

How this reveals the true nature of their hearts! And with what irony John records their reaction! For instance, we cannot help noticing how this particular reaction revealed a great deal of pride in those who provided it. These people were largely from Jerusalem or from the outlying areas of Judea. Galilee was to the far north, "in the sticks" to their way of thinking. So when they said, "How can the Christ come from Galilee?" they really were implying that Jesus was just not sophisticated enough to be their leader. We see this reaction today in those who consider Christians to be uneducated persons and who think of Christianity as being beneath their social level.

Moreover, the reaction of this part of the crowd also reveals a strange hypocrisy. For they were dismissing Jesus on a quibble while at the same time refusing to investigate his claims, particularly whether or not he might actually have fulfilled this particular condition. The condition was twofold: that the Messiah be of David's line (he was to sit on the throne of David) and that he be born in Bethlehem (Micah 5:2). Jesus had fulfilled both parts. He had descended from David in a way that exhausted the Davidic line, combining in himself both the royal line through Joseph and the legal line through Mary. And he had been born in Bethlehem, though many did not know it due to the fact that he had grown up in Nazareth. Jesus fulfilled all the Old Testament requirements. Yet the people who objected to him did not bother to investigate these requirements.

Are you one who has been rejecting Jesus Christ on a quibble? Do you refuse to come because you cannot understand where Cain got his wife? Or how God can punish sinners? Or why we are to believe in a virgin birth or a resurrection? There are answers to these questions; you will come to know them in time. But they must not be used as excuses for a failure to come to grips with Christ personally. Investigate him. Study his life and claims. But do so honestly. Honesty demands a determination to follow him if his claims are verified.

What a change there would be if men and women would really investigate Christ's claims! Years ago a friend of Harry Ironside was forced to leave his mission work in India because of ill health. Some time after his return from the field he received a letter from an elder in his church in India saying how much they missed him and assuring him that in his absence they were doing a great deal more praying and reading the Bible. In fact, the letter said, they were having a real "reBible." Well, the elders were right. For where the Bible is prayerfully studied spiritual insight and a genuine "revival" will follow.

Finally, some of those who heard Jesus at the feast wanted to harm him. John says "Some of them wanted to seize him, but no one laid a hand on him" (v. 44). How are we to understand this group? There is no way to understand it. There is no way to understand men who would crucify the Lord of glory.

What shall we who know the Lord do? We must pray for those who cannot see the truth concerning him. God must open their eyes. We must help those who have seen in part but who have not yet made a commitment. We are to be witnesses, and we must love them. Indeed, we must love even those who are enemies. For by such love and through it God may call some.

Nonbelievers and Believers

There was clearly a division among nonbelievers then concerning Christ. But note: there is a far greater and categorical division between nonbelievers and believers.

It is impossible to overestimate this difference. On the one hand, we have the one who is not yet a Christian. He is described as "dead in ... transgressions and sins." He walks according to "the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air." He fulfills "the cravings of our sinful nature." He is a child "of wrath." On the other hand, we have the believer who through the grace of God is "alive" in Christ, seated "in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus," and "created in Christ Jesus unto good works" (Eph. 2:1-10). The difference lies in the relation of each individual to the Savior.

We can see the differences in the practical outworking of their lives. The believer trusts Christ. Indeed, Christ is all in all to him, the only one who can be trusted totally. The nonbeliever trusts either in himself or in other people.

The believer loves Christ. Indeed, how could he help but love him! Jesus is the One who gave up the glory of heaven, laying it aside, in order to become man and die for him. Love sent the Savior to die in his place. Now he loves him. "We love because he first loved us." The nonbeliever does not love the Savior.

The believer also serves Christ. He is called to service. Recognizing his past, that before Christ's coming he was in bondage to sin, and knowing something of the deliverance that Jesus has bought for him through his death, the Christian now recognizes himself to be no longer his own but the Lord's. He recognizes the truth of Paul's challenge: "You were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your body" (1 Cor. 6:20). The unbeliever does not have this orientation to life's service.

Finally, the Christian is striving to be like Jesus. He may not be much like him. At times he may be much unlike him. Still this is his goal, and he can say with Paul, "Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:13-14). The goals of the unbeliever are a product of this world's culture or of his own desires.

Where do you find yourself in that contrast? Do you trust, love, serve, and strive to be like Jesus? Or are you living for yourself and serving yourself? If it is the second of those pictures, I trust that something of the power, love, and character of Jesus himself may reach you, so that you will come to him and do so without delay. The danger in delaying is that the end may come—you may die or Jesus may return—and the divisions of this life will be established for eternity.

Unity for Believers

Finally, although it is true that Jesus is the cause of these divisions, it is true also that he is the cause of the most profound and happy unity among believers. Jesus divides? Yes. But for those who know him he is also that which draws us together.

He is the only one who can draw us together. We who are Christians do not come from only one walk of life, as though we could be drawn together by a culture that we hold in common or by our backgrounds. We do not come from one race, as though we could be united ethnically. We are not even all of one nation or sex or intellectual attainment or status. All the causes for the divisions of the world at large exist within the Christian church. But there is this difference. Within the church and for Christians these divisions simply cease to matter. We are one. As

Paul says, "There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28).

Let me share an early example of such unity with you. About the year a.d. 56, the apostle Paul was in Corinth where he had been dictating a letter to the Christians in Rome. While doing this he had been living in the home of a rich man named Gaius, who had presumably only recently been converted to Christ. He had been dictating through a slave who ranked number three among the slaves of that household. The slave's official name was Tertius, which means "three." Probably Paul had been composing this letter over a period of time, and as he had been dictating it various people had dropped by. Now, on this particular day, as he came to the end of the letter, some of these people came by again to hear him close it. They sensed its importance. Paul's fellow workers were there—Timothy, Lucius, Jason, Sosipater. Gaius was there, as well as his friend Erastus, an elected official in the city. Archeologists have since found Erastus's name, together with his office, inscribed in marble. And there are the slaves: Tertius (number three) and Quartus (number four).

Now observe what happens as Paul brings his letter to a close. Paul has already addressed the Romans, many of them by name. He has wished them well and added a benediction. Now he looks about him and begins to send greetings from those who are present in the room.

Timothy, my fellow worker, sends his greetings to you, as do Lucius, Jason and Sosipater, my relatives....

Paul pauses, but as he does so Tertius, the scribe, keeps writing, as slaves sometimes did in antiquity.

I, Tertius, who wrote down this letter, greet you in the Lord....

Then, as Paul picks up his dictation, Tertius continues on Paul's behalf.

Gaius, whose hospitality I and the whole church here enjoy, sends you his greetings. Erastus, who is the city's director, sends... greetings....

Here, Quartus, the least important person in the room but one who feels his brotherhood with the Christians in Rome, as do the others, and who is afraid of being left out, raises his hand to catch Paul's attention. Paul quickly adds, "And our brother Quartus." Now all have been included, from the most important elected official of Corinth to the least important slave in Gaius's household, and all have expressed their sense of belonging to the Roman Christians who live hundreds of miles away and whom most of them have never seen and would not see until they were united in heaven.

Here is a great example of the reality of unity in Christ and of Christian brotherhood. Christ is a divider of men. But he also is the source of a most blessed and transforming unity for Christians.

Chapter 98.
None like Jesus

John 7:45-52

Earlier in these sermons on the Gospel of John, verses were studied that spoke of the uniqueness of Jesus Christ, of the fact that by any measurement there is no one quite like him. The verses were in John 1 (vv. 15-18), and we saw as we considered them that Jesus is unique in his origin, in being the sole source of blessing for men and women, as being full of grace and truth, and as the only one in whom you or I may see God. In this study we come to verses that speak of his uniqueness in yet another sense—the uniqueness of his words. These verses contain the reaction of the temple guards to his teaching. No doubt they had heard plenty of prisoners. But although they had been sent to take him, they returned empty-handed, saying, "No one ever spoke the way this man does" (v. 46).

These words, which obviously are of great importance, will be the jumping-off place for the present study.

The Story

We are helped a bit in our appreciation of these words by realizing that the guards had been some time in their unproductive attempt to seize Jesus. The attempt itself, mentioned for the first time in verse 32, had been initiated by the Pharisees and priests because they had found Jesus to be a threat to their teaching. They had observed him for some time, and they had realized (correctly) that he was opposed to any thoughts of salvation by legalism, the system of religion on which they prided themselves, and that he was therefore a threat to them. Besides, he was a blasphemer because, as they could see, he was making himself equal to God.

At the same time, it also was true that Jesus was relatively popular. And since they could not run the risk of looking like men who were opposed to a true man of God, a prophet, they did the only thing they could. They sent their own temple guards—not Roman soldiers—with orders to observe Jesus and then to arrest him whenever the occasion was suitable. "Arrest him," they said, "but do it quietly." Six months later, at the Passover, they were following the same course of action when they actually succeeded in having Jesus arrested by night in the Garden of Gethsemane. We do not know how long it was between the giving of the order on this earlier occasion and the report of the guards to their superiors recorded here. But we do know that it must have been some time. For at least a day had gone by, according to verse 37, and it may well have been longer. At all events, the picture we have is that of the guards lingering on the outskirts of the crowds for some time as Christ taught the people.

It is dangerous to linger around the Lord Jesus for whatever reason. It is dangerous to be exposed to his teaching. As time went by, these guards became impressed with what he was saying, and being impressed they found themselves unable to proceed with their mission.

Sent from God

What precisely had these men heard Jesus teaching? One thing they had heard Jesus saying was that He had been sent from God. We read, "Yes, you know me, and you know where I am from. I am not here on my own, but he who sent me is true. You do not know him, but I know him because I am from him and he sent me" (vv. 28-29).

There are times in our study of the Word of God when it is necessary for us to give particular attention to the smallest of words. We have such a case here. To do it helps us to see something very important about Jesus. Notice that Jesus said he was sent from God. He did not say that he was sent by God, though that would have been true and also important. He said that he was sent from God. This implies a previous existence with God; that is, a life with God before his incarnation. This in turn points to his full divinity. There are many men who have been sent by God. All the Old Testament prophets fall into this category. John the Baptist is an example. So, in another sense, are all of God's people today, for we all are sent by God as witnesses to this world. Many have been sent by God. Only one, the Lord Jesus Christ, has been sent from him.

Moreover, this and this alone meets our deepest need and longings. We hear much talk today about the "image" of God. The question involved in such talk is this—"How are we to picture God or visualize him?" We know, of course, that the Old Testament firmly forbids any attempt to make an image of God, for that tends to idolatry. Instead, the Old Testament suggests that we think of God in terms of his names—Jehovah, Adonai, El Shaddai, El Elyon—which reveal his nature. But at the same time when we recognize the value of this, we also recognize that names are not quite enough for those who wish to know God in a deeper and more personal way. "Can we never see God?" we ask. "Can we not know him?" It is just at this point that Christ's statements about himself and his origin come into the picture, for it is in Christ that we see the Father. "No one has ever seen God," as John says earlier. Nevertheless, "God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known" (1:18). The fact that Jesus is from God and is God dispels whatever previous mystery there may have been and meets our longing.

When we see this about Christ's teaching we see that Jesus was saying something so extraordinary that it should properly make an impression upon us, just as it did upon the guards who had been sent to arrest him.

His Life Controlled by God

Second, having been sent from God, Jesus also knew and taught that the details of his life had been arranged and were controlled by God. That is, nothing ever entered into his life that was not sent into it by the Father, and he was doing nothing that deviated in any respect from the plan for his life that had been previously outlined in the Old Testament. In one sense, many of his words imply this. In this chapter, however, it is taught most explicitly in Christ's words to his brothers just before they went up to the feast. They wanted him to go up and try to recapture some of his declining popularity. He answered, "The right time for me has not yet come; for you any time is right" (v. 6).

What was the basis upon which Jesus could make such a statement? His brothers could go wherever they wished, and at any time, because their time was in their own hands. Their time had only the meaning they themselves were able to give it. Jesus, however, could not go to the feast at the time their question was asked, because his time was in the hands of the Father and received the significance that he alone gave it.

Words from God

Third, Jesus not only taught that he had been sent from God and that all the details of his life had been ordered from God. He also taught that his words were from God, so that anyone who heard him heard God. We read about it like this: "Jesus answered, 'My teaching is not my own. It comes from him who sent me. If anyone chooses to do God's will, he will find out whether my teaching is from God or whether I speak on my own'" (vv. 16-17).

This gives us the true answer as to why his words made such an impact upon his hearers and why they continue to influence and motivate people today. If Jesus' words were merely human words, they might be of historical or even inspirational value. But they would have no ultimate influence or lasting authority. However, since Jesus' words are words from God, they are unlike other words and indeed possess full authority. They are true, for one thing. God is truth itself, and words that are from him will always be true. We can count upon them. Moreover, the words are powerful, for they convey something of that creative energy seen in the creation of the world by means of God speaking.

Once a leper came to Jesus with the claim of faith: "If you will, you can make me clean." Jesus replied, "I will; be you clean," and the foul disease left him. Once Jesus was in the house of a man named Jairus, whose daughter had just died. Jesus said, "My child, get up," and at once she returned to life. At the tomb of his friend Lazarus Jesus called out in a loud voice, "Lazarus, come out," and Lazarus (who had been dead four days) came out from the tomb. What power! What love! It is a privilege to say that this power can be applied to you also as you respond to Christ's words, for he has promised forgiveness of sins and new life to all who ask him to be their Savior.

Hunger and Thirst

Fourth, Jesus declared that he was himself the answer to human need. He said, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him" (vv. 37-38). The same idea is present in Christ's earlier claim to be the bread of life.

What hunger and thirst there are in the hearts of men. There are times, of course, when the hunger and thirst are not evident. In times of prosperity people seem to have everything, and we find ourselves asking, "What more could they want?" Sometimes we ask, "What more could I want?" Still, the thirst is there and it betrays its presence through a general uneasiness, anxiety, and depression, sometimes even through suicide or other irrational behavior. At other times in history—perhaps we are moving into such a period even now—the hunger is obvious, and we find people searching everywhere for something with which to satisfy themselves and not being able to find it.

Christ satisfies! If nothing but those two words could sink into those who follow this study, I would be satisfied. Christ satisfies! He does this by removing sin, which is always at the heart of man's problems, and then on that basis restoring the relationships between the individual and God and between the individual and others, which sin has broken.

A Blessing to Others

Finally, Jesus also claimed to be able to make all who come to him a blessing to other people. In fact, this claim is involved in the verses I have just quoted. For he said that the one who would drink from him would find within himself a river of water that would be overflowing (v. 38).

I know of no other way in which the great problems of our world will be affected. What is the source of our problems, whatever they may be —hunger, disease, exploitation, bigotry, war? Where do they come from? It is not the environment, though that is a factor in some cases. It is not the inherent evil of the authorities, for the authorities are merely people like ourselves in positions of power. The cause is mankind itself and, in particular, the sin of mankind. Until that is dealt with there will be no strong or lasting solutions. Therefore, we must begin with our sin, yours and mine, and then, having our own sin dealt with and being filled with the joy that comes from knowing God, we will have something to offer others. When we are a blessing, then and only then will we be able to deal with those external problems that affect everybody.

The Words of Men

The words of Jesus are wonderful. They speak to us where we are. But how different they are from the words of men or from human teaching. This contrast is made for us in this story, for after we are told of the report of the temple guards—"No one ever spoke the way this man does"—we also are told some of the things the Pharisees and the chief priests said in responding to it. One of the responses to the guards was filled with pride. They said, "You mean he has deceived you also? Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed in him?" (vv. 47-48). They obviously thought they were better than other people. Another of their replies was filled with contempt for the common people. They said, "But this mob that knows nothing of the law— there is a curse on them" (v. 49). Actually, the people knew the law pretty well, but the Pharisees despised them because they had not had opportunity to be educated in the rabbinic schools, as they were. Moreover, it was also true that their replies were filled with ignorance even of the true situation. For no sooner had they denied that any of the rulers had believed on Jesus than Nicodemus, one of their very number, spoke up for him. And no sooner had they expressed scorn for those who were ignorant of the law than they were chided by Nicodemus for their own disregard of it—"Does our law condemn anyone without first hearing him to find out what he is doing?" (v. 51). Besides, in their answer to him, they showed ignorance even of the prophetic Scriptures, for they denied that any prophet could come from Galilee, when, in fact, Jonah—and perhaps others—had come from there.

There is pride, contempt, and ignorance in the best speeches of even the best of men. But many do not see this. In fact, no one does see it until he has first listened to and been enthralled by the Lord Jesus. Have you heard him? Have you recognized that there is indeed none like Jesus?

Hear him; he speaks to you. He says, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest." He says, "Come to me and drink." Let your heart respond with joy: "No one ever spoke the way this man does. I am coming, Lord Jesus!"

Chapter 99.
The Woman Taken in Adultery

John 7:53-8:11

When the rulers of the Jewish nation failed in their attempt to have Jesus arrested by the temple guards, they immediately devised a plot to trap him. This plot is the most despicable action by these men recorded in the Gospels. At the same time, it became an occasion by which Jesus not only revealed the depth of his justice, wisdom, and compassion but also provided a message of hope and great peace for those who come to him. The story is that of the woman taken in adultery. The problem of the story is how justice and mercy can be harmonized while, at the same time, neither encouraging sin nor condemning the sinner. In this respect it is a central, even a pivotal, point in John's Gospel.

Textual Problems

Before beginning our study of this story, I must be frank to admit that it involves us in a serious textual problem. The difficulty, simply put, is that the majority of the earliest manuscripts of John do not contain these verses and, moreover, that some of the best manuscripts are of this number. The best evidence for the story is its presence in Codex Bezae, of the fifth or sixth century, now in the University Library at Cambridge, England. But it is not in the older Codices Sinaiticus or Vaticanus, nor in the Washington or Koridethi manuscripts. In fact, of the older manuscripts, eight omit it entirely, though two manuscripts leave a blank space where it would have come. And not until the medieval manuscripts does it seem to have been included with any regularity. Some early manuscripts attach it at other places, such as at the end of the Gospel or after Luke 21:38.

Does that mean that we should just throw out these verses? Should we place them in the same category as the apocryphal gospels? Interestingly enough, very few scholars (even many of the liberal ones) seem willing to do this, and the fact that a good case can be made out for the other side, should make one cautious in how he deals with it. I am willing to deal with the story as genuine—though perhaps not a part of the original Gospel as John wrote it—for the following reasons:

While it is true that most early manuscripts omit this story, it also is true that the story itself is old, regardless of who wrote it or whether or not it was originally in John's Gospel. We find it in The Apostolic Constitutions (third century A.D.). And Eusebius, the church historian, tells us that Papias (who died not long after A.D. 100) knew a story "of a woman who was accused of many sins before the Lord." Later, Jerome unquestioningly included it in the Latin Vulgate.

A good case can be made for its inclusion at this particular place in John's Gospel. For one thing, without it the change of thought between the fifty-second verse of chapter seven and the twelfth verse of chapter eight is abrupt and unnatural. We do not know where Jesus is in John 8:12, nor to whom he is speaking. For another thing, the introduction of a story at this point seems to fit the pattern that John has been using in these opening chapters. In each case, from chapter 5 onward, a story is used to set the theme of the teaching that follows. Thus, the miracle of healing the disabled man, which begins chapter 5, becomes the text of the sermon that follows. The feeding of the multitude in chapter 6 leads into the discourse on Christ as the bread of life. The discussion between Jesus and his brothers about going up to the feast in chapter 7 is an introduction to Christ's words at the feast. So, likewise, is the story of his dealing with the adulterous woman an introduction to that speech on the combination of righteousness and freedom in Christ that the rest of the chapter declares that Christ brings.

Third, there is an excellent reason why the story may have been omitted in the early manuscripts. In a contest with paganism, it is easy to see how the story might have been used by enemies of the gospel to suggest that Christ condoned fornication. Indeed, this is the reason for its omission given by both Augustine and Ambrose in the late fourth and early fifth centuries.

The fourth and last reason for dealing with the section is the feeling, which many have had, that this story is indeed true to Christ's nature, in accord at every point with his perfect holiness, wisdom, and deep compassion.

As we turn to the story we must see three things primarily: first, the horror of sin; second, the mastery by God of all circumstances; and third, the word of the Savior to the sinner.

Sin's Horror

First, the story reveals sin's horror. And, of course, I do not mean the sin of the woman. I mean the sin of the rulers. Adultery is sin, certainly. The woman was guilty of adultery. But compared to the sin of the men who were using her in an attempt to trap Jesus, her sin was minimal—a mote in her eye compared to the beams that were in their eyes (Matt. 7:1-5).

To understand precisely what these men were doing we must understand that not only was their approach to Jesus a trap; they actually had already been active in trapping the woman. In fact, it could hardly be otherwise, on the basis of their testimony and in light of the very exacting requirements of Jewish law in this and other capital cases. Under Jewish law, as it was practiced by the rabbis in the time of Christ and later, it was necessary to have multiple witnesses to the act of intercourse before the charge of adultery could be substantiated, and even this was to be under the most exacting of circumstances. Thus, as one scholar points out, "There is absolutely no question of [the witnesses] having seen the couple in a 'compromising situation,' for example, coming from a room in which they were alone, or even lying together on the same bed. The actual physical movements of the couple must have been capable of no other explanation, and the witnesses must have seen exactly the same acts at exactly the same time, in the presence of each other, so that their dispositions would be identical in every respect."

Under these conditions the obtaining of evidence in adultery would be almost impossible were the situation itself not a setup. We are justified in supposing that the liaison had been arranged, perhaps by the very man who committed adultery with the woman. Was he a member of the Sanhedrin? Whatever the case, the arrangement must have involved the posting of witnesses in the room or at the keyhole.

We see the horror of the sin of these men in another way too. For the fact that only the woman was brought to Jesus reveals their dishonestly. If adultery could be proved only by the testimony of witnesses who had seen the couple in the very act of adultery and if this is what the rulers were claiming, as they were, where then was the man in the story? Why was he not brought with the woman? At the least, the rulers allowed the man to escape. At the worst, the man had been in on the plotting and had been granted immunity beforehand. How horrible! Yes, but it is only the old case of the double standard that exists still today. Men should take their stand with the women in such cases, confessing their share of the guilt, which is usually greater anyway. But they do not. The poor woman had to bear the shame alone.

God of Circumstances

The horror of sin is not the only subject these verses introduce, however. They also reveal the mastery by God of all circumstances.

We will appreciate this aspect of the story better if we realize that this was a serious problem with which the Lord was confronted. This was not like the problems with which he had been challenged before. On an earlier occasion the Sadducees, who did not believe in the afterlife, had come to him with a trick question about the resurrection. They imagined the case of a woman who had married seven brothers in turn, each one having died and having left her with no children. "In the resurrection, therefore, when they rise, whose wife will she be?" they asked. It was a stupid, almost infantile question. So Jesus answered that they had erred, knowing neither the Scriptures nor the power of God. On another occasion some of the rulers tried to trap him with a question regarding taxes. But again this involved only the conflict between public sentiment and the law of Rome, and Jesus dealt with it easily.

It was not this way with this problem of the adulterous woman. In this case three important matters were at stake: (1) the life of the woman, (2) the teaching of Jesus about the compassionate nature of his kingdom, and (3) the divinely given law of Moses. The way the matter was posed —so it seemed to the rulers—there was little doubt that Jesus would have to relinquish one of these items.

Everyone knew that the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ had been marked by compassion. He had moved about among publicans and sinners. He had befriended the outcasts. He had said, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened" (Matt. 11:28). But if he was consistent with this teaching and if, on the basis of his compassion for the woman, he actually waived the law of Moses, then the rulers could rightly denounce him as a dangerous and false prophet. What prophet could speak against the law? Jesus had already been suspected of this because of his attitude toward the sabbath regulations. If he rejected Moses' judgment, they had him. On the other hand, if Jesus upheld the law—if he said, "Kill the woman"—then they were also sure that they had him. For they reasoned, "If he says that, then we will ridicule him to the end of his days. We'll say, 'Sure, he says, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened," but he neglects to tell you that when you do come he's going to stone you.'" With devilish insight these men had hit upon the problem of all problems in respect to the relationship of a sinner to God. How can God show love to the sinner without being unjust? Or, as Paul states the problem: How can God be both just and the justifier of the ungodly (Rom. 3:26)? From a human point of view the problem is unsolvable. In this the rulers were right. "Even if Jesus wants to show love, he cannot," they argued. But they were not aware that they were not dealing with a mere man when they dealt with Jesus. They were dealing with God, and with God all things are possible.

At first Jesus appeared to ignore them. Instead of replying he simply bent down and began to write on the ground.

I do not know why he wrote on the ground, and, what is more, I do not believe that anyone else does either. I have read numerous commentaries on these verses, and I have been surprised to find that nearly every one of them gives a different answer. Some have suggested that Jesus wrote on the ground to gain time. Others argue that he did so to force the accusers to repeat their charges, drinking that perhaps the shame of the situation might become evident even to them as they said it. Lawyers sometimes follow this procedure in courts of law. One person has suggested that Jesus was himself overcome with shame and horror in much the same way as he shuddered at the tomb of Lazarus or wept over the city of Jerusalem. Some suggest that this was a symbolic action, intended to remind the accusers of Jeremiah 17:13—"O LORD, the hope of Israel, all who forsake you will be put to shame. Those who turn away from you will be written in the dust." Perhaps, since Jesus knew their hearts, he was writing out their sins. Perhaps he wrote the words he later spoke. Whatever the case, the fact of Christ's writing had no effect on the rulers, who rudely continued to press for an answer. One of the sad effects of sin is that it hardens the sinner.

After a while Jesus stood up and replied, "If any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her" (v. 7). How simple and, at the same time, how disarming! So we read that "those who heard began to go away one at a time, the older ones first, until only Jesus was left, with the woman still standing there" (v. 9). Obviously, there was something in the gaze of the Lord Jesus Christ, or in the tone of his voice, or simply in the power of his presence that got through to these men, unrepentant as they were, and left them powerless. Think of the efforts they had gone through! Think of the plotting! Yet they were destroyed in a moment when they were confronted by the God who masters circumstances.

Words to the Sinner

At last, Jesus turned to the woman and for the first time addressed her directly. "Woman, where are they? Has no one condemned you?"

She answered, "No one, sir."

"Neither do I condemn you," said Jesus. "Go now and leave your life of sin" (vv. 10-11).

On what basis did Jesus make the statement, "Neither do I condemn you"? Some have suggested that at this point Jesus took advantage of the requirements of the law itself according to which it was necessary to have two or three witnesses in any judicial hearing. Jesus was one accuser perhaps, because he knew all things. But the others were gone, and so the requirements of the law could not be met. This may be right in part. Certainly it freed Jesus from having to condemn the woman. Yet to handle the matter like this is to miss the real meat of the story. For when we ask, "Why did the Lord Jesus Christ not pronounce judgment?" the only substantial and ultimately satisfying answer we get is that he did not pronounce judgment against the woman for precisely the same reason that he does not pronounce judgment against those who come to him in faith. It was because of the cross upon which he was about to bear the full penalty of God's wrath against every sin ever committed by those whom the Father had given to him. He did not give forgiveness easily. He did so only because he was about to make forgiveness possible by the act of suffering in place of the sinner. This is the gospel. This is the only solution to the problem of how God can remain just and also excuse the sinner. To us, salvation is free. But it is free only because the Son of God paid the price for us.

Finally, Jesus told the woman to stop sinning. This always follows upon divine forgiveness, for we cannot be saved by God and then continue to do as we please. We must stop sinning. At the same time, we can be glad that the order is as Jesus gave it. For if he had said, "Go, sin no more; and I will not condemn you," what hope would there be? We all sin, so there would be no forgiveness. Instead he says, "I forgive you on the basis of my death. Now, because you are forgiven, stop sinning."

I hope this has been your experience. I hope you have heard and understood these words of Jesus.

You must place yourself at some place in this story. Are you like the crowd, who stood watching? These witnessed forgiveness, but they did not enter into it. Are you like the rulers? These were sinners, like the woman, but they went away from Jesus without even hearing the words of forgiveness. Or, finally, are you like the woman, who not only heard but also received the gospel message? Of all who were there that day by far the best one to be is the woman. The crowd was indifferent, as crowds always are. The rulers went out from Christ into darkness and six months later were killing the sinless Son of God. But the woman—well, the woman was forgiven through Christ, who died for her sin and for yours, whoever you may be.

Chapter 100.
Never a "Thing"

John 7:53-8:11

There are two worlds, the impersonal world and the world of persons; not so much a world of things and a world of men, as a personal and an impersonal view of both men and things. Between these two worlds there is an invisible frontier which is within ourselves, and it is very difficult to cross."

These words by the noted Swiss physician and author, Paul Tournier, speak to a great problem of our time, the problem of treating persons as things and vice versa. And they suggest, quite rightly, that the source of the problem, as with nearly all problems confronting us, is in ourselves. People are not things, of course. They were not created as things by God. God himself does not regard them as things. Yet we often treat other people as things—whenever we try to use them for some end of our own, fail to listen to them, or refuse to see them as those for whom Christ died. Have you never heard said, "I'll be all right if I can just get Mary to do so and so"? Or perhaps, "Why worry about Joe? He doesn't matter"? Or, "Let's just ignore him"?

If you have ever said these things or something like them, then you are guilty, as we all are, of that which Tournier is describing; and the attitude of the Lord Jesus Christ toward people, which we find so brilliantly illuminated in the story of the woman taken in adultery, is for you and should prove helpful.

The Attitude of the Rulers

The first point we need to notice is the attitude of the religious leaders toward the woman, for it was the opposite of Jesus' attitude. In brief, the rulers tried to use the woman. We see this in the fact that the situation itself was a setup. Under rabbinic law it was next to impossible to secure a death penalty in a case of adultery. There had to be witnesses—two or three of them—and these had to observe, not merely a compromising situation but the very act of adultery. Moreover, in their testimony they had also to agree in every particular. An illustration of the failure to do this is found in the apocryphal story of Susanna in which the innocent Susanna is acquitted when the witnesses, who had conspired to perjure themselves against her, fail to agree in naming the tree of a garden under which the act supposedly was committed.

Under such circumstances it is almost self-evident that the rulers must have arranged the liaison, having stationed the witnesses in the room or at the keyhole. It was a situation quite similar to the use of private investigators and photographers in order to prove adultery today.

Moreover, the horror of this insensitive use of the woman is heightened by the probability that the woman was young. This is impossible to prove, of course, but it is suggested rather forcibly by the significance of the particular penalty called for by the woman's accusers. These men were calling for death by stoning, and the importance of this is that stoning was the penalty specified in the case of adultery by a betrothed bride, who usually would be young.

The general text prescribing death in the case of adultery is Leviticus 20:10, which says, "If a man commits adultery with another man's wife —with the wife of his neighbor—both the adulterer and the adulteress must be put to death." Here the penalty is death, but the means of inflicting death are not specified. In Jewish practice at the time of Jesus the penalty was death by strangulation. On the other hand, in Deuteronomy 22:23-24 the penalty is death by stoning; but in this case the punishment applies only to a case involving an engaged girl who has proved unfaithful to the engagement by having relations with another man. Since engagements almost invariably involved young people, perhaps as young as thirteen or fourteen years old, we are justified in thinking that this was probably the case of the woman brought before Jesus. So we have a young girl, caught in what may have been her first offense, perhaps seduced and betrayed, if indeed this is what was required to secure her conviction. All this makes the situation more horrible.

Furthermore, we need to notice that, as the rulers used this woman, they were even found quoting Scripture, for they referred to the law and its punishments. It is sad and ironic, but so it was; and so it is for many who use the Word of God as they use people—for their own ends and apart from the grace and mercy of God that the Word communicates.

It is too bad that the rulers did not give even more attention to the Old Testament, rather than less. For if they had understood the full teaching of the Scriptures, they would have understood that in the sight of God each person is an individual, created by him for a specific purpose, and that the Word of God is not supposed to be used as merely one more tool to manipulate people.

In A Doctor's Casebook in the Light of the Bible, Paul Tournier, whom I quoted earlier, speaks of what he calls the extraordinary "personalism" of the Bible. "What distinguishes the God of the Bible from the divinities of every other religion is that He is a personal God, who speaks personally to man," he argues. God called Abraham by name, taking him out of his own country into a new land. "He makes a person of him through his personal obedience to a personal command. The personal God makes man into a person." Tournier shows how God called to Moses, saying, "I know thee by name" (Exod. 33:17). He said to Cyrus, "I [am] the Lord, who call thee by thy name" (Isa. 45:3). "One is struck, on reading the Bible, by the importance in it of proper names," Tournier observes. "Whole chapters are devoted to long genealogies. When I was young I used to think that they could well have been dropped from the biblical canon. But I have since realized that these series of proper names bear witness to the fact that, in the biblical perspective, man is neither a thing nor an abstraction, neither a species nor an idea, that he is not a fraction of the mass, as the Marxists see him, but that he is a person."

Tournier is clearly right. And he is right when he calls upon Christians to share the biblical attitude. "If I forget my patients' names," he adds, "if I say to myself, Ah! There's that gallbladder type or that consumptive that I saw the other day,' I am interesting myself more in their gall-bladders or their lungs than in themselves as persons."

The religious rulers were obviously guilty of precisely this and worse. And we are also guilty, though on different levels. To them the woman was just a case. She had no feelings, no future, no need for saving. It was only in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ that she found mercy and regained her identity.

The Attitude of Jesus

This brings us to the attitude of the Lord Jesus Christ toward the woman, and we find ourselves asking: What characterized his attitude? There are a number of answers.

First, the attitude of the Lord Jesus Christ was characterized by understanding. This is the point at which everything else begins, for Jesus clearly knew what was going on both in the attitude and actions of the men and in the life of the woman. He was not fooled by circumstances nor by appearances. He was not deceived by the religious talk of the leaders, nor by the unrighteous actions of the victim. The expectations of the crowd did not move him. In short, he saw both the good and the evil and moved accordingly.

We need to grow in such understanding if we are to become like Jesus. Apart from this understanding there are two errors into which we fall in dealing with men and women. The first is naivete. This is the error of believing that people are better than they are; it comes about by overlooking sin and evil. A person who is guilty of this error may be excessively optimistic. He may be loving and think well of all people and, as a result, be taken for a ride in many of his personal relationships. He will be used by the less scrupulous or more realistic. If such a person becomes disillusioned, however, he then runs the risk of falling into the other error, which is cynicism. This results in suspecting low motives in the best of actions and, in extreme cases, in refusing to enter into meaningful relationships with others at all.

In avoiding these errors—both naivete and cynicism—Jesus becomes our pattern. For he was able to look the worst of life in the face without being astonished or embittered and at the same time retain the purity out of which he was enabled to move in love toward the sinner. Earlier John tells us that Jesus "knew all men. He did not need man's testimony about man, for he knew what was in a man" (2:24-25).

Naturally, we will never be able to understand other people completely, for our knowledge is limited by sin and by our human perspectives. Still, it is true that we can know people much better than we do and can be a help to them because of our understanding. Where does such understanding come from? It comes from the Word of God, for it is only in the Word that we can gain accurate insight into human nature and human problems. The Scriptures will show both the depravity of man, with all its complications in individual and corporate life, and the destiny of the redeemed as the result of God's perfect remedy for sin in Jesus Christ.

Second, the attitude of the Lord Jesus was characterized by compassion. This was linked to his understanding. Jesus knew the woman intuitively. He knew her sin and shame. He knew her potential. Because he knew her, he loved her. It was always thus with Jesus. He saw people as sheep without a shepherd, as sinners without a Savior; from that understanding came compassion.

It is impossible to explain such compassion. We may point to its link with understanding, but that does not explain its real origins. It does not explain it in ideal situations, let alone in this one, or in any situation that involves the love of the righteous God for a sinner.

Imagine for a moment that you are a parent and that you have one of your children sitting upon your lap. The child says, "Daddy [or Mommy], do you love me?" You say, "Yes, I do," and you give the child a kiss.

Then the child says, "Why do you love me?" Well, what do you say to that question? There is just no answer. You cannot say, "I love you because you are good," for that is not true, and it may even be harmful. You would love the child even if he were bad, which he certainly will be sooner or later. And you would not want the child to think that your love depends upon his being good, for he would then doubt your love when he disappoints you. Then again, you cannot say, "I love you because you are beautiful." You would love the child even if he were not beautiful. You would love him even if he were retarded or deformed. Nor can you say, "I love you because you are mine," for you would love the child even if he were adopted. Why do you love him? Well, you love him in part because you understand him, but that does not explain your love. Love is unexplainable. The best you can say is that love is divine and that you love him because God himself has loved us.

Apply this to Christ's love for the woman. What can explain it? It is beyond reason, for every argument from reason would suggest that Christ should condemn her. She had broken the law. She had debased her own person. She even had violated that great illustration of Christ's love for the church and of the church's love for Christ: marriage. For marriage was given by God to illustrate that greatest of all relationships.

And yet, Christ loved her. He wanted to spare her, to save her. There was no love in the attitude of her accusers.

Third, the attitude of the Lord Jesus Christ was characterized by forgiveness. This was his desire from the beginning—from the moment at which he stooped and wrote on the ground to the final moment in which he said to the woman, "Neither do I condemn you. Go now and leave your life of sin."

But it was not an easy forgiveness. It was not what Dietrich Bonhoeffer has aptly termed "cheap grace." It was costly, for it meant that Jesus would himself have to bear the justified wrath of God against the sinner. The Bible tells us that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), and it was precisely this that the Lord Jesus Christ bore for those whom he desired to forgive. Death means separation. In the physical sense death means the separation of the soul and the spirit from the body. In the spiritual sense it means the separation of the soul and the spirit from God. This, Jesus bore in our place. We probably will never understand in its fullness what this meant to the Savior, but we gain a sense of what it meant in that awful cry of dereliction wrung from his lips on the cross —"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" In that moment God the Father turned his back on God the Son so that Jesus knew the reality of spiritual death and separation. At the time of his talking to the woman this was before him, but it was on the basis of what was coming that forgiveness was given. Today we look back on Christ's sacrifice, and the horror of what He bore for us compels us to come to him. Someone has said, "No other god has wounds." It is true. No other god ever was able to give himself in death for the sinner.

Fourth, the attitude of the Lord Jesus Christ was characterized by a challenge. He said, "Go now and leave your life of sin." This was not the same thing as merely allowing the woman to go her way, forgiven but free to do as she might choose. She was forgiven, but she was told to do better. It was, in short, the challenge of the sinless life. In the same way, Jesus confronts us. He understands us, loves us, forgives us; but he does this in order that we might not sin. Moreover, the element of challenge is also to characterize the Christian's relationships with other people.

Persons or Things?

The conclusion of this is that our attitude toward others should be that of the Lord Jesus Christ toward us and not that of the rulers who had accused the woman. They had used the woman. Jesus had saved her. What made the difference? We can say that the men were only sinful human beings while Christ was divine, of course. That is correct. But it is not very helpful. What is helpful is to notice that before this incident Jesus had spent the night upon the Mount of Olives, where we know from other sources he was accustomed to spend the time praying, while the leaders for their part had spent the night scheming with one another and (some of them) in peeping through keyholes.

Where does this compassionate attitude toward other persons come from in practical experience? It comes only from communing with our heavenly Father. We are personal with others only when we know ourselves to be persons. We know ourselves to be persons only when we see ourselves as persons before God.

Chapter 101.
"I Am the Light of the World"

John 8:12

It is not an accident that the claim of the Lord Jesus Christ to be the light of the world occurs immediately after the story of the woman taken in adultery, the story that introduces the eighth chapter of John's Gospel.

The story of the woman taken in adultery may not have been in the original text of John's Gospel, that is, in the first copy of the book as John wrote it. But whether it was there initially or not, few can doubt that the place where it finally was put was well chosen; for it follows well on the failure of an original plan by the rulers of Israel to arrest Jesus, and leads naturally into Christ's statement about being the light of the world. The story of the woman and her accusers is a greater revelation of the dark nature of sin than anything yet recorded in John's Gospel, and in it the purity and brightness of Jesus shine through abundantly.

It is appropriate to turn from the story itself to hear the Lord say, "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life" (8:12).

Jesus already has been described as light in John's Gospel. In the opening chapter John wrote, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men" (v. 4). He spoke of the light six times in that context. In chapter 3 there is a similar reference. John said, "This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil" (v. 19). This verse and those immediately following refer to light five times in reference to Jesus. In each of these cases the image is in John's words only, however. So we read these verses and, if we have not read further, we find ourselves asking, "But why does John refer to Jesus in this way? Where did he get this image? How did he develop this idea?" It is only when we get to our present text that we discover the answer. John refers to Jesus as the light because Jesus referred to himself as the light. Indeed, John obviously remembered this and so developed the images even further in this Gospel and in 1 John.

Jesus' claim to be the world's light is the second of the seven great "I am" sayings that are a unique feature of this book. The others are: "I am the bread of life" (6:35), "I am the gate" (10:7,9), "I am the good shepherd" (10:11, 14), "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25), "I am the way and the truth and the life" (14:6), and "I am the true vine" (15:1, 5).

The Cloud in the Desert

If we are to understand the full import of what Jesus was claiming when he claimed to be the light of the world, we must understand this verse in terms of that to which Jesus was undoubtedly referring. This is particularly important because it is not what we would most naturally think. We read this verse—"I am the light of the world"—and we think of the sun. Indeed, we are encouraged to do that by uses of this image elsewhere, as in Malachi where the coming Messiah is spoken of as the "sun of righteousness... with healing in its wings." This is not a bad thing to do. There is even much to be learned from it. But it is not the image Jesus is using in John 8:12.

To understand what Jesus had in mind as he spoke to the people we must remember that these words were spoken shortly after the Feast of Tabernacles in the courtyard of the temple area (v. 20) where the ceremonies that were a part of that feast were conducted.

We already have noted one of these ceremonies. On each morning of the eight-day feast the priests of Israel joined in a procession to the pool of Siloam from which they drew water in golden pitchers. Then, returning to the temple area, they poured this water upon the altar of sacrifice. As they did this the people, many of whom accompanied the priests, sang and chanted. One verse used was Isaiah 12:3: "With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation." Another was Psalm 114:7-8: "Tremble, O earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob, who turned the rock into a pool, the hard rock into springs of water." The use of Psalm 114 shows that the ceremony was conceived primarily as a remembrance of God's provision of water for the people of Israel during the years of their wilderness wandering, though it also pointed forward to the spiritual water that men would draw from God in the day of God's future visitation. It was probably at the high point of this ceremony that Jesus broke into the festivities by crying, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him" (John 7:37-38).

The second ceremony was similar. On the first night of the feast, and probably on succeeding nights also, after the sun had set, two great lamps were lighted in the courts of the temple. These were said to have cast their light over every quarter of the city. The lamps were meant to recall the pillar of cloud and fire that had accompanied the people in their wanderings in the desert. This was the cloud that had appeared on the day when the people left Egypt and had stood between the Israelites and the pursuing armies of the Egyptians the night before the crossing of the Red Sea. It kept the Jewish people from being attacked. Later it guided the people through the wilderness. It also spread out over them to give shade by day and light and warmth by night. I believe that it was in clear reference to the ceremony of lighting the lamps and naturally, therefore, also to the miraculous cloud itself that Jesus referred when he claimed to be this world's light.

This conclusion is supported by the fact that if it is so, then we have a striking succession of three great wilderness images in chapters 6, 7, and 8 of John's Gospel. In 6, Jesus is the new manna sent down from heaven. In 7, he is the water miraculously provided from the rock. In 8, he is the cloud. We therefore turn to the cloud itself and to its functions in order to determine the full meaning of this second of the "I am" sayings in John's Gospel.

God's Presence

Why was the cloud important? The most obvious way in which the cloud was important was that it symbolized God's presence with the people. This would be obvious from the fact that the cloud gave off light. For in an age that did not know an abundance of artificial light, light would always suggest God's presence. Besides, the cloud was so huge and so striking that this in itself would suggest a theophany.

We see this in the texts that refer to this unique phenomenon. For instance, the first reference to the cloud in the Old Testament clearly identifies the presence of the Lord with it. "By day the LORD went ahead of them in a pillar of cloud to guide them on their way and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light, so that they could travel by day or night" (Exod. 13:21-22). Other passages tell us that God spoke from the cloud and that he sometimes broke forth from it in judgment upon the sins of the people. In one striking passage the cloud is even addressed as God, for God is said to have raised himself up when the cloud rose and to have descended when the cloud descended. "Whenever the ark set out, Moses said, 'Rise up, O LORD! May your enemies be scattered; may your foes flee before you.' Whenever it came to rest, he said, 'Return, O LORD, to the countless thousands of Israel'" (Num. 10:35-36). At no time in their wandering were the people of Israel able to forget that the presence of God went with them and overshadowed them in all they did.

Apply this now to the claim of the Lord Jesus Christ. Long years before, the cloud of God's glory had departed from Israel. It once had filled the Holy of Holies of the temple before which Christ was standing. Now the innermost shrine was empty, and even the lamps that commemorated the departed cloud had gone out. In this context and against this background Jesus cried, "I am the light of the world. I am the cloud. I am God with you." Here was God once again with his people.

Have you found God in Jesus? Is Jesus, God with you? There is no other place in which you may find him. Come to him if you have never done so, and learn to say with John and the believers of all ages: "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14).

Protection

Second, the cloud was important in that it was the primary means by which God protected the people. Without it the people would have perished many years before they entered Canaan, either from their human enemies like Pharoah and his armies or from the natural dangers of the desert.

We must remember at this point that when the people of Israel left Egypt there were probably about two million of them. The Bible says that there were 600,000 men, but, of course, wives and children need to be added to that number. This vast company of people was being led out into a desert region that, as anyone who has ever been there can tell you, is one of the most inhospitable regions on earth. In the daytime the temperature can easily reach 140 or 150 degrees, and at night it can fall below freezing. To survive in such a region the vast host of Israel needed water and a shelter from the sun. The rock, which Moses was instructed to smite with his rod, provided water. Shelter was provided by the cloud, which spread out over the camp of the people to give them protection. Without this special and miraculous provision the people would have died.

We sing about God's protection of the people in one of our hymns, a hymn that many who sing it probably do not understand.

> Round each habitation hov'ring,
> See the cloud and fire appear For a glory and a cov'ring,
> Showing that the Lord is near!
> Thus, deriving from their banner
> Light by night and shade by day, Safe they feed upon the manna
> Which he gives them when they pray.

In the same way the Lord Jesus Christ is a protector for all who come to him and follow him.

The Moving of the Cloud

Third, the cloud was important because it was the primary means by which God guided the people while they were in the desert. There were few, if any, landmarks in the desert, and the people would not have recognized landmarks even if they had seen them. Besides, the heat of the desert produces mirages, distorts distances, and makes most terrains indistinguishable. How were the people to find their way? How were they to avoid wandering into hostile territory or around in circles? The answer God gave was the cloud. When the cloud moved they were to move; indeed, they had to move, for if they had remained where they were they would soon have died from the heat of the desert by day or from the cold at night. When the cloud remained in one place, they remained.

One long passage in Numbers makes this particularly clear. "Whenever the cloud lifted from above the Tent, the Israelites set out; wherever the cloud settled, the Israelites encamped. At the LORD'S command the Israelites set out, and at his command they encamped. As long as the cloud stayed over the tabernacle, they remained in camp. When the cloud remained over the tabernacle a long time, the Israelites obeyed the LORD'S order and did not set out. Sometimes the cloud was over the tabernacle only a few days; at the LORD'S command they would encamp, and then at his command they would set out. Sometimes the cloud stayed only from evening till morning, and when it lifted in the morning, they set out. Whether by day or by night, whenever the cloud lifted, they set out. Whether the cloud stayed over the tabernacle for two days or a month or a year, the Israelites would remain in camp and not set out; but when it lifted, they would set out. At the LORD'S command they encamped, and at the LORD'S command they set out. They obeyed the LORD'S order, in accordance with his command through Moses" (Num. 9:17-23).

We can easily see how this applies to Christ's statement. For when he claimed to be the light of the world in clear reference to the cloud of Israel's wandering, he was claiming not only that he was God with his people, or that he was the one who would protect them, but also that he is the one who gives guidance. Thus, when Jesus moves before us we are to move. When he abides in one place we, too, are to remain there.

Moreover, we are to avoid two errors. The first error is to be overly hasty in following him; that is, to follow so closely upon the moving of the cloud that we mistake its moving and find ourselves going in another direction. If we tend to make this mistake, we must remember that there was to be a clear space between the guiding ark over which the cloud rose and the people— about "two thousand cubits" (three-fifths of a mile)—that there be no mistakes about the road. Alexander Maclaren, who writes on this theme, observes, "It is neither reverent nor wise to be treading on the heels of our Guide in our eager confidence that we know where He wants us to go."

On the other hand, we are not to be slow either. For, as Maclaren states, we are not to "let the warmth by the camp-fire, or the pleasantness of the shady place where [our] tent is pitched, keep [us] there when the cloud lifts." The only place of true blessing is under the shadow of God's presence.

Will You Follow?

To summarize: When the Lord Jesus Christ claimed to be the light of the world he was claiming to be these three things for his people—God with them, the source of protection, and the One who guides. These are great claims. But we must not overlook the fact that they are only for those who follow him. He said, "Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life." To follow Christ is almost synonomous with believing in Christ; for in another, parallel passage Jesus uses the same image in declaring, "I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness" (John 12:46). Faith in Christ is following Christ, or at least leads to following Christ. And following Christ is possible only for those who have faith in him.

Do you have faith in Christ? Are you following him? You should; for if you are, you have Christ's promise that you will no longer be walking in darkness but will possess the light of life. The last phrase is another way of saying that you will possess Christ himself, who thereafter will become all things to you. The Bible says that he is made unto us "righteousness, holiness, and redemption," and that it is a joy to follow him (1 Cor. 1:30).

Chapter 102.
The Witnesses Agree

John 8:13-18

If you were an unscrupulous person and were about to be accused of a crime in court by a certain witness, what would you do to eliminate the impact of his testimony? Most of us would do nothing, of course, especially if we were innocent. But if you were guilty and were also unscrupulous, I suppose you would have three courses of action open to you. First, you could eliminate the witness; you could have him killed, perhaps, or else threaten him so that he would keep quiet. This has happened many times in actual criminal trials, as we know. Second, you could seek to discredit the witness. That is, if you could show that he does not possess good character, perhaps that he has lied in court before, you could get people to discount what he has to say on this occasion. Third, you could seek to have his testimonv thrown out of court on a technicality.

Here are three lines of attack for anyone who is unscrupulous, and I mention them now because they are precisely the lines of attack followed by those who tried to discredit Jesus Christ in that testimony he bore to men of God's nature and of man's need for salvation.

The first line of attack was to eliminate him. We saw an attempt at that in the closing verses of John 7, for these verses record an attempt by the leaders of Israel in Christ's time to have him arrested. They failed on that occasion, but they succeeded later, with the result that Jesus was brought to trial and executed. Second, they tried to discredit him by throwing such doubt upon his character that no one would listen to him regardless of what he had to say. This was the object of the abortive attempt to trap Jesus in the incident concerning the woman taken in adultery. The final attempt was to eliminate the force of his testimony as the result of a technicality. It is this to which we now come in our verse-by-verse study of John's Gospel.

Two or Three Witnesses

In the last verse we studied we found the Lord Jesus Christ making a stupendous claim. To be sure, he has made many stupendous claims thus far in the Gospel, but in this particular verse he states something that is very close to a claim to be God. He says, "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life" (8:12). Since God was thought of in terms of light and life, and since this claim referred to the cloud of Israel's desert wandering that symbolized God's presence with the people, Christ's words must have seemed almost blasphemous to his listeners. By any standard it was at least a claim to his right to have men and women follow him. The leaders rejected both inferences.

But how were they to eliminate this testimony? They had already tried to have him arrested, and that had failed. He had proved too smart for them in the matter of the woman. Perhaps a technicality would do. At all events, they would try it.

In Jewish law there was a maxim to the effect that no one could ever be convicted on the testimony of a single witness. Always two or three witnesses were required. This principle was expressed in Numbers 35:30: "No one is to be put to death on the testimony of only one witness"; Deuteronomy 17:6: "On the testimony of two or three witnesses a man shall be put to death, but no one shall be put to death on the testimony of only one witness"; and Deuteronomy 19:15: "At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established." This had been interpreted in the broadest possible way by the rabbinical authorities so that it came to be applied eventually to all testimony. Nothing was to be believed unless more than one person could attest to it. And, of course, no one could testify concerning himself. The rulers now applied this to Jesus, their point being that whether or not his claim was true, at least insofar as evidence was concerned it was invalid. It was the testimony of just one man concerning himself and should be discounted. John tells us, "The Pharisees challenged him, 'Here you are appearing as your own witness; your testimony is not valid'" (v. 13).

I must admit at this point that in some ways the subject we are covering is both technical and related to a past age. But in other ways it is simple and relevant to people today. There are many who would discount Christ's witness, not because it is untrue necessarily, but because according to their way of evaluating evidence, there is no way of telling whether it is true or not. They do not really disbelieve Christ, but so far as he is concerned they are agnostics. To such people particularly, and indeed to all of us, Christ's answer to the charge of the rulers is of great importance.

Superior Knowledge

In answering the charge that his testimony concerning himself was invalid on technical grounds, Jesus makes three points, the first being that in terms of the kind of matter to which he is testifying only a person with a superior source of knowledge can qualify and that he and only he possesses such knowledge. In his own words the reply was, "Even if I testify on my own behalf, my testimony is valid, for I know where I came from and where I am going. But you have no idea where I come from and where I am going" (v. 14). In other words, if this were only a matter of something within the framework of human experience and apprehension, then the rabbinic maxim would hold true and would be useful. But in terms of knowing God, only God can testify. In this case, God the Son is bearing witness both to himself and to God the Father, and the testimony should be accepted because of these unique circumstances.

Perhaps there is even an indirect reference to another Jewish legal principle in this answer. For it was another principle that the character and status of the witness were involved in accepting or not accepting his testimony. This principle expresses itself largely in a listing of those who for their personalities, professions, or questionable activities were discounted as witnesses. Among such persons were thieves, shepherds (because they seem to have permitted their sheep to graze on another person's property), violent persons, and all suspected of dishonesty in financial matters, among whom were tax collectors and customs officials.

Now, so goes Jesus' argument, if the rabbis reject the testimony of men whom they consider unreliable, and if they accept the testimony of an upright man when substantiated by that of another upright witness, why should they not then in Jesus' case accept the testimony of One who is more than a man? Jesus knows his origins and destiny, things that no other can know (v. 14). He judges according to truth and not, as do his opponents, according to the flesh (v. 15). He works in complete spiritual unity with God the Father (vv. 15-16).

This understanding of the passage is encouraged also by the fact that in the citation of the legal principle in John 8:17, Jesus is quoted as changing the original phrase "two witnesses" to "two men," thereby stressing the great gulf that exists between merely human and, therefore, limited testimony and his own.

Do you recognize this distinction? Have you seen that if Jesus is who he claims to be, then he is able also to bear testimony about God and to certain things about man that we could learn about in no other way? If he is not God, then we have no sure knowledge of God. If he is God, his statements and claims can be trusted.

Impartial Testimony

Second, Jesus defended his right to give testimony about God and man on the basis that his testimony is impartial. This is what he means in verses 15 and 16, where he says, "You judge by human standards; I pass judgment on no one. But if I do judge, my decisions are right." The "human standards" in this verse stand for all that is human in man as opposed to that which is of God; it involves the limitations of being human, including limitations in knowledge and in objectivity. Here were men who were testifying about men. They were partial in their estimate of men. They excused themselves and others. In opposition to this, Jesus declares that his judgment is not limited as theirs is, but rather is impartial.

Moreover, it also is sinless. For being of "human standards" in biblical language also implies being sinful; and this, too, Jesus is denying. He is the sinless One. So the distortions of sin do not enter to invalidate his testimony.

Sin always enters where human testimony and judgment are concerned. The story is told by lawyers of a not altogether honest judge from Virginia. He had been asked to decide a case concerning two railroads, and when the briefs came to him from the two lawyers representing the two railroads, they contained bribes. The first lawyer had sent a check for $10,000. The second lawyer had sent a check for $15,000. The judge looked at the two checks, thought a moment, then called his secretary. "Make out a check for five thousand dollars," he said, "and send it to the lawyer representing the second railroad. We're going to decide this case on its merits."

Men, even at the best, are sinful. So we should clearly accept the testimony of the sinless One over testimony rendered by any man or woman.

The Witness of the Father

Finally, the Lord Jesus Christ also pointed out, as he had done earlier in his ministry, that in the final analysis his testimony did not stand alone but actually was supported by the word of God the Father, thereby satisfying the rabbinical requirement that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word should be established. We find him saying, "In your own Law it is written that the testimony of two men is valid. I am one who testifies for myself; my other witness is the Father who sent me" (vv. 17-18). The witness of God the Father consists of a witness through John the Baptist (5:33-34), the witness of Christ's signs (5:36), and the witness of the Old Testament Scriptures (5:39-47).

What, then, can we say of Christ's testimony? When we put it all together we have the testimony of Jesus himself, characterized by superior knowledge and impartiality, corroborated by the witness of the Father. Two great, two superior witnesses! And the witnesses agree!

Who can discredit such testimony? No one can discredit it; and no one has, though many have tried.

Three Applications

There are a few important applications to our own lives from these teachings. First, we must not trust our own judgment in spiritual matters. Our knowledge is limited. We are not impartial. We must not trust our own way of looking at things. This is the point of Proverbs 3:5-6, which says, "Trust in the LORD with all your heart and lean not on your own understanding; in all your ways acknowledge him, and he will make your paths straight."

Second, we should trust the word of the Lord Jesus Christ implicitly. We should not trust our own understanding, but we should trust him because of who he is. There may be much in the Christian faith that we do not understand. There will be aspects of Christian truth that we will not like and wish could be eliminated. But that is not an option for us. Whatever Jesus says must be believed without question, and our own reasonings on spiritual matters must be subordinated. The Bible speaks of our duty along these lines by pointing to the proper goal of " [demolishing] every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and ... [taking] captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5).

Third, if the word of Jesus Christ is true, then we should accept him as our Savior and follow him as our Lord. Have you done that? If not, let me challenge you to test his testimony and then to follow him if that testimony is valid.

The great Bible teacher and lecturer Reuben A. Torrey tells of a man who accepted this challenge. Torrey had been lecturing to a number of his students in Chicago and had been confronted at the end of the lecture by a man who claimed that his experience contradicted everything that Torrey had been saying. Torry had been telling how doubt in spiritual matters could be overcome, and this man felt that he had done everything Torrey had suggested and yet was unconvinced.

"Let us be very definite about this," Torrey replied. So, calling his secretary, he dictated, "I believe that there is an absolute difference between right and wrong, and I hereby take my stand upon the right to follow it wherever it carries me. I promise to make an honest search to find if Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and if I find that He is, I promise to accept him as my Savior and confess him publicly before the world." The secretary brought two copies. "Will you sign this?" Torrey asked.

"Certainly," said the visitor, as he signed one copy and returned the other to Torrey. "But there is nothing to it," he added. "My case is very peculiar."

"Now, another thing," said Torrey. "Do you know that there is not a God?"

"No, I do not know that there is not a God," was the answer. "I am an agnostic in the matter. I neither affirm nor deny."

"And in that case, you also do not know that God does not answer prayer," Torrey continued.

"That is correct."

"Well, then," said Torrey, "here is a clue for you in your search to discover if Jesus Christ is the Son of God. You must pray. Pray something like this, 'God, if there is a God, show me if Jesus Christ is Your Son or not; if You show me that He is Your Son, I promise to accept him as my Savior and confess him to be such before the world.' Will you do that?"

"Yes, I'll do that, too," the man answered. "But there is nothing to it. My case is very peculiar,"

"There is also one final thing. In John 20:31, John says, 'These [things] are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name.' Here John tells us that his Gospel was written to show men the proof that Jesus is the Christ and God's Son. Will you read the proof? And will you pray the prayer I have suggested each time before you begin to read it?" The man replied again that he would. But he added once more that there was nothing to it.

The two men parted, and each went about his own affairs. Two weeks later the two met again in Torrey's lecture hall. But this time the skeptic said, "You know, there was something to that. Ever since I have done what you suggested I feel as if I have been caught up and am being carried along by the Niagara River. The first thing you know I shall become a shouting Methodist."

Torrey became one for the occasion and cried, "Praise the Lord!"

Again several weeks went by, in which Torrey lectured in the East, but when he returned, the man was waiting for him. He had become a Christian. His testimony was, "I can't understand now how I ever listened to anything else."

If you are not yet a Christian, this can become your story if you will face the evidence. Will you face it? God does not want you to be in confusion but to be certain in your knowledge of Christian truth.

Chapter 103.
Three Questions

John 8:19-27

Once, when a member of Tenth Presbyterian Church and I were joking about the course of much theological discussion, we pointed out how such discussion often goes downhill in quality and ends up in personal invective. We were imagining how it might be between the pulpit of this church and an opponent, whom we shall call John Smith. Smith disagrees with the doctrines of the Reformed faith that he hears me teaching; so he writes a book questioning them. It is called Calvinism Surveyed. The second step in the debate is my reply; it bears the title Arminianism Refuted. Now John Smith gets lengthy. He compiles a three-volume work entitled The Teachings of James Montgomery Boice Exposed. I reply with The Heresy of John Smith. The final work in the debate is by the man who started this controversy; it is a pamphlet called "Come out from among Them and Be Ye Separate."

We were only being humorous, of course. I don't even know a John Smith. But what we were saying unfortunately does illustrate the course of much theological discussion. What is more, it illustrates a point that I would like to make in connection with the eighth chapter of John's Gospel.

Scorn of the Pharisees

We need to understand, if we are to enter fully into the spirit of this chapter, that the relationship between Jesus Christ and the rulers of the people was deteriorating. At least that is the way we would describe it from a human point of view. These chapters (chapters 5 through 8) record the rejection of Jesus by the leaders, beginning with their opposition to him on the sabbath question in chapter 5 and ending with a complete break in chapter 8. In fact, the next chapters will begin a new theme: the relationship of Jesus to those whom the Father has given him and his provision for them. At this point, however, John is still tracing the deteriorating relationship between Jesus and the leaders and is showing us that it reached a new low.

It had sunk quite low already, of course. First, there was the attempt to arrest Jesus (7:32). This failed. Next there was the attempt to trap him in the matter of the woman taken in adultery (8:311). Jesus showed himself to be too smart for the rulers in this situation. Third, there was the attempt to have his testimony discounted on the basis of a legal technicality (8:13). He had an answer even for this. So, after Jesus had escaped arrest, overcome them in the test, and answered their objection to his testimony, the Pharisees and other leaders sank to the lowest level of all and began to make fun of him personally. They did this by asking insulting questions.

There were three questions. The first was, "Where is your father?" (v. 19). At the least this was a scornful rejection of Jesus' statement that there was a second witness to his claims. But it may also have been a reference to the peculiar nature of the facts surrounding his birth and to their belief—with insulting and demeaning overtones—that Joseph was not Christ's father. This slur may also be evident in the saying recorded later: "We are not illegitimate children" (v. 41).

The second question was, "Will he kill himself?" (v. 22). The force of this query is seen in the Jewish belief that those who killed themselves went to the lowest part of Hades. Jesus had just said, "Where I go, you cannot come." They had correctly understood that he was speaking of his death, but they reasoned that since they would surely be going to heaven he must be going to hell, and the lowest part at that.

The final question, "Who are you?" (v. 25), had the effect of calling him a nobody. It implied a rejection of all the things he had said about himself previously.

What was Jesus' response to such questions? What was his reaction to the scorn they expressed? It is interesting that Christ answered by the strongest series of statements about the fate of the unregenerate person that we have thus far in John's Gospel.

God Gave Them Up

The first thing the Lord Jesus Christ said when faced by the scornful questions of these men is that such questions are not asked by those who know him and that, therefore, those who ask them do not know either him or God the Father. This point was so important that Jesus repeated it in different terms after having said it the first time. He first said, "You do not know me or my Father... if you knew me, you would know my Father also" (v. 19). Then he added, "You are from below; I am from above. You are of this world; I am not of this world" (v. 23). In other words, these men (despite their position and learning) did not know God, and it was because of this that they asked such scornful questions.

This is quite interesting for us, because it runs counter to our natural way of looking at things. To our way of thinking, asking questions is good. We say, "How are we going to learn if we don't ask questions?" That is right, to a degree. Even in Bible study it is right, for we need to ask, "To whom is this written? Who is speaking? What does it say? How does it apply to me?" and so on, if our Bible study is to be helpful. At the same time, we need to recognize that in spiritual matters there is a type of question that is not at all helpful. This type of question is aimed not so much at finding out the truth but at resisting the truth. It really is an attempt to justify a refusal to believe what God has already made known to us.

This is what God is speaking about in the first chapter of Romans where we are told that God gave certain men over to a reprobate mind because "they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God" (1:28). Certain things about God are known to all men. Romans 1:20 speaks of them. But because men and women do not like what they know and do not want to recognize the conclusions that flow from it, they refuse to retain this knowledge of God and therefore willfully reject him.

David tells us why in slightly different language. He writes in Psalm 77:3: "I remembered you, O God, and I groaned." God will always trouble those whose hearts and minds are not at peace with him through the death of Jesus Christ. Therefore, since men do not like to be troubled in their minds and pricked in their consciences, they do everything they can think of to banish God from their knowledge. One way is to ask questions, even the kind that are asked by many theologians and ministers: Who is God? What was Jesus really like? What is the meaning of the cross to men today? The sad thing is that this is unnecessary, for the knowledge of God exists to be seized by those who will have it since God is revealed in the person of Jesus Christ and in the Scriptures.

The first chapter of Romans reminds us of one more truth. The truth is in the form of a warning of what God does to those who will not retain the knowledge of him. We are told that God "gave them over." The Greek suggests the thought that since men have abandoned God, God has abandoned them. They gave God up, so God gave them up.

This is a terrible phrase: "God gave them over." It occurs three times in Romans 1. In the first instance we are told that because men refused to glorify God as God and were not thankful, God gave them over to uncleanness (v. 24). The reference is to sexual sins. Second, we are told that because men exchanged the truth of God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator, God gave them over to vile affections (v. 26). This refers to sexual perversions—homosexuality, lesbianism, and so on. Finally, after it is said that they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, we are told that God gave them over to something that is far worse than these sexual sins. God gave them over to a reprobate mind (v. 28). That is, he abandoned them to their own corrupt judgment. This is a terrible fate, as is proved by the horrible list of sins that follows this verse, which sins, God says, flow from man's reprobate judgment.

The Day of God's Grace

Second, Jesus taught that the day of God's grace would not last forever. He taught this in two ways: first, by reference to his own death and departure, after which they would seek for him and would not be able to find him and, second, by reference to the fact that they would die also (8:21). The day of God's grace either in historical or personal terms is not endless. Hence, the personal act of entering into a right relationship with God through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ should not be delayed. To delay is folly.

Why is it that people will exercise common sense in a thousand matters of daily need in this life but will not exercise common sense in the matter of eternity? People will provide for themselves financially, saving up for the day of retirement when they no longer will be able to continue working as before. They will provide for their health. Not only will they go to the doctor when ill; they will exercise preventive medicine by following a series of regular checkups, tests, and inoculations. They eat well. They take vacations and provide for periods of exercise. In all these matters, men and women will exercise the most commendable common sense. But they will not prepare to meet God in this, the day of his grace.

Years ago an evangelist preached a sermon on the text, "Prepare to Meet Thy God," and his first point was this: "The greatest reason why you should prepare to meet your God is that you must meet your God." That is true. Unless your case is settled out of court through your personal response to Jesus Christ, you must appear before the judgment bar of God the Father and answer for your rejection of Christ. Will you respond to him? The Bible declares, "Now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2).

No Excuse

Third, Jesus replied to the scorn of the Pharisees by the truth that if they would not believe on him as their Messiah and Savior, they would die in their sins (vv. 21, 24). There are two ways to die, according to the Bible. You may die "in the Lord"—Revelation 14:13 says, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on"—or you may die "in your sins." To die in sin means to die with the burden of one's sin upon oneself and, as a result, to be forced to bear the penalty of sin, which is spiritual death. God says that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). Physical death is the separation of the soul and the spirit from the body. Spiritual death is the separation of the soul and the spirit from God. To die in sin is to die separated from God and to remain so forever.

Moreover, it does not at all matter whether or not you are aware of this. It is true nonetheless. You may try to forget about this, but the day of God's judgment will reveal the sin that many have tried to cover over with the world's values and activities.

What people have tried to do may be illustrated by a particular type of manuscript called a palimpsest. A palimpsest is a manuscript with two entirely different writings on it, one over the other. When the manuscript was first written it was written as any other manuscript is written, with line upon line of characters reproducing some ancient text. Later, however, when the earlier writing had faded somewhat and paper was scarce, someone took the old parchment or papyrus, turned it sideways, and wrote a new text over it. These palimpsests vary in quality. In some, both writings can be clearly seen. In others, the newer writing has almost entirely replaced the old. Scholars often recover this older and more valuable writing by using acids, ultraviolet light, and X-rays. So it is with the heart of man. In the early ages of the human race God wrote his standards of conduct upon the heart of man. But when man violated God's standards and when his conscience was troubled by that fact, man allowed the original writing to fade and eventually, turning the page sideways, wrote over God's writing with the darker ink of his own dark deeds. Some day, however, the acid of God's judgment will eat away the newer writing, and men will be exposed as sinners to be judged by that standard that God originally placed within the life and conscience of all.

Separation from God

Finally, Jesus said the most sobering thing of all. He said that if the men who refused to believe in him continued to refuse him and therefore died in their sins, they would go to hell and not to heaven. It is true, of course, that Jesus does not mention hell by name in these verses, though he does elsewhere. But the existence of hell and the fact that hell is the destiny of those who refuse him is still stated. Jesus said, "You will die in your sin. Where I go, you cannot come." Where was he going? He was going to heaven. So if they could not come where he was going, they could not come to heaven and would remain without God and apart from God forever.

The frightening thing about this statement is that there is no escape from it. If it were only a matter of human judgment, then there would be a possibility of escape at least. For instance, a criminal might escape prosecution if his crime should go undiscovered or if no one should discover that he is the criminal. Apparently this happens often, for in many cases police are unable even to find a suspect though a crime has been committed. Or again, a criminal may escape from the sphere of the law's jurisdiction, as the financier who fled to South America in order to escape prosecution on charges of tax evasion. Finally, a criminal may escape on a technicality.

Here are three ways in which a criminal by human law may escape the law's judgment. But there is no escape from God's judgment. Do you think that a crime and the one who has committed it are unknown to God? Do you think that you can escape God's jurisdiction? Do you think that a technicality can get you off? These abuses of the law may pass on earth, for human judgment is imperfect. But they will not pass in heaven. There is no escape. No escape! You must meet God and answer for your sins.

Someone will say, "But that is frightening. Are you saying those things just to frighten me?" In a sense I am, for I would like you to be so frightened by the warning the Lord Jesus Christ gives that you will turn from your sin and cleave to him. The gospel tells us that Jesus died for your sin. He died both physically and spiritually—he was separated from God—so that you and everyone else might not have to die spiritually. He removed our sin, so that all who believe on him might have eternal life and be able to follow him to heaven.

You can assess your relationship to the Lord Jesus Christ by the way in which you would answer the questions that were posed by the Pharisees and with which we began. "Where is your father?" Can you say, "Your Father is God Almighty, and you are his Son"?

Will he kill himself? Can you say, "In one sense, yes, for he gave himself for us"?

Who are you? Can you say, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God; you are my Savior"?

Chapter 104.
The Uplifted Christ

John 8:28-29

Our text tells us that the Lord Jesus Christ was to be "lifted up" and that, when he was lifted up, certain consequences would flow from it. These two words—"lifted up"—introduce us to some wonderful truths from John's Gospel.

We should notice from the beginning that John in three different places speaks of Jesus being lifted up and that these should rightly be taken together in order to gain the full force of his teaching. The first text is John 3:14-15: "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up, that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life." The verses stress the necessity of Christ's crucifixion. The second text is the one to which we have now come in our study, John 8:28-29. Jesus says, "When you have lifted up the Son of Man, then you will know that I am the one I claim to be, and that I do nothing on my own but speak just what the Father has taught me. The one who sent me is with me, he has not left me alone, for I always do what pleases him." The last passage is the well-known cry of Jesus in John 12:32: "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself."

These three passages, all of which stress the truth that Jesus was to be lifted up, carry us to the heart of the gospel and stress its consequences. We should therefore explore this theme by a careful study of each passage.

Jesus Must Die

The first text, then, is John 3:14-15. It is a good one with which to begin, for it makes clear precisely what is meant by this unusual phrase. Sometimes preachers have used the last of these three verses—"But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself"—as though the phrase referred to our need to lift Christ up in our preaching. We do need to lift Christ up in our preaching, of course. But while it is true that if we lift Christ up in preaching he will indeed draw men and women to himself, this is nevertheless not the primary sense of the metaphor. To be lifted up means to be lifted up on the cross in death. It is a reference to Christ crucified. Consequently, John 3:14 compares Christ's being lifted up to the lifting up of the serpent upon a pole in the wilderness when the wandering Israelites were afflicted by the poison of deadly serpents and were dying. John 12:33 says simply, "He said this to show the kind of death he was going to die."

Moreover, the first of these verses also stresses the divine necessity in Christ's death, for it says, "So the Son of Man must be lifted up." Why is this so? Why was it necessary for Christ to die?

One answer to that question is that it was necessary because Christ's death was part of God's eternal plan to save sinners. But that is too general to be of much help. A far better answer is that it was necessary because nothing else could accomplish God's purpose. In the first place, no other person existed who could pay the price of our sin so that we might be forgiven for our sin and go free. No man could do it. Men are sinners, and each one (except those who are Christ's) must pay the price of his or her own transgressions. Only Jesus, who is more than a man and without sin, could pay the price of sin and so save us. This he did, as we correctly sing:

There was no other good enough To pay the price of sin;
He only could unlock the gate
  Of heaven, and let us in.

It was necessary for Christ to die, for no one else was able to die that death that would save sinners. Moreover, it was necessary for Christ to die also because nothing but a crucified Christ will draw men to God. Nothing but this will even draw men to hear preaching. Liberalism does not draw men. The cults do not draw men in great quantities. Men and women will not long attend a mancentered religion. But preach Christ crucified—preach him in the power of the Holy Spirit—and men and women will begin to come to him. They begin to leave their comfortable homes in the suburbs and come to city churches, where they would have come for no other reason. They begin to take weeks of their vacation time and attend seminars or attend Bible conferences. At times they will even mass in the millions as they did in Korea for the Billy Graham crusades in that country.

Preach any Christ but a crucified Christ, and you will not draw men for long. But preach the gospel of a Savior who atones for the sins of men and women by dying for them, and you will have hearers. Moreover, as Christ is lifted up, many of those who hear will believe.

Source of Knowledge

The second text is John 8:28. Here the emphasis is upon the fact that the leaders of the people would come to know certain things about Christ, the truth about Christ, only after they had killed him. Consequently, the verse points to the cross as the only basis for true knowledge in spiritual things. Jesus said, "When you have lifted up the Son of Man, then you will know that I am the one I claim to be and that I do nothing on my own, but speak just what the Father has taught me."

There are two senses in which this is true. First, it is true because it is only at the cross of Christ that the stubborn and rebellious will of man is conquered. Since a rebellious will is the major barrier to a reception of God's truth and since it is only at the cross that the barrier is removed, it is therefore only at the cross that the light of God's revelation is enabled to illuminate the soul. Jesus said, "If anyone chooses to do God's will, he will find out whether my teaching is from God or whether I speak on my own." It is at the cross that we are enabled to will it.

But then, too, it is in the glory of the cross and in those manifestations of God's power that surround it (particularly in the resurrection) that we have the fullest proof of Christ's divinity and teaching. So the evidence leads people to knowledge. This is indicated in the word that John uses when he says that Jesus was "lifted up." There are different words in Greek that are translated as "lifted up" in English. Most common are airo and various compounds based upon it—egeiro, espairo, and so on. John does not use these words in the verses we are studying. Instead, he uses the verb hupsoo, which means "to exalt" or "to elevate." The overtones of this word show that John is thinking of Christ's glorification even as he writes of his crucifixion, thereby indicating that the cross, as the first step in that glorification, becomes a proof of Christ's teachings.

Jesus said that after he had been lifted up—by the crucifixion and eventually to the Father by means of the resurrection and the ascension—the rulers of the people would no longer be in ignorance of who he is but would know that he is indeed Jehovah. These are sobering words. If they are true—and they must be true if Jesus said them—they mean that the rulers were later found to be rejecting Christianity in large measure not for a lack of knowledge about him but because of sin. They knew who he was, many of them at least, and yet they would not have him as their Savior.

Perhaps the situation is repeating itself today, for there has never been a period in history when there was more knowledge about Jesus Christ and yet in which so few seem willing to follow him. Lack of knowledge can hardly be pleaded as an excuse by those of our well-educated and informed generation.

The Great Attraction

The final verse of the three we are considering is most important, for it speaks of the drawing power of the uplifted Christ. It tells us that he is the great attraction. "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself." Why is it that Jesus as the crucified Son of God draws men and women to him? There are two reasons. Let me share them with you from a great message on "The Uplifted Christ" by Reuben A. Torrey.

"First of all," Torrey writes, "Christ crucified draws all men unto Himself because Christ crucified meets the first, the deepest, the greatest and most fundamental need of man. What is man's first, greatest, deepest, most fundamental need? A Savior? A Savior from what?
Underlying all else, a Savior from the guilt of sin. Every man of every race has sinned. As Paul in Romans 3:22-23 says, 'There is no difference: For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' There is no difference between Jew and Gentile at this point, nor is there a difference between English and German at this point. There is no difference between American and Japanese at this point, no difference between European and Asiatic, no difference between the American and the African. 'There is no difference: For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' Every man of every race is a sinner; 'there is no difference' at this point. Every man shall have to answer for his sin to the infinitely holy God who rules this universe. Therefore, all men need an atoning Savior, who can by His atoning death make propitiation for, and so cover up our sins....

"In all the universe there is no other religion but Christianity that even offers an atoning Savior. Mohammedanism offers Mohammed, 'The Prophet,' a teacher, but not a savior; Buddhism offers Buddha, supposedly at least a wonderful teacher, 'The Light of Asia,' but not an atoning savior; Confucianism offers Confucius, a marvelous teacher far ahead of his time, but not an atoning savior. No religion but Christianity offers an atoning Savior, offers an atonement of any real character. This is the radical point of difference between Christianity and every other religion in the world; yet some foolish preachers are trying to eliminate from Christianity this, its very point of radical difference from all other religions.

"But such an emasculated Christianity will not reach the needs of men and will not draw men. It never has and it never will. The Bible and history are one at this point. Jesus Christ offers Himself lifted up on the cross to redeem us from the curse of the law, by becoming a curse in our behalf, 'Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree' (Gal. 3:13). People know their need; they may try to forget it, they may try to deny it, they may try to drown their sense of it by drink and dissipation or by wild pleasure-seeking or wild money-getting, or by listening to fake preachers in supposedly orthodox pulpits.... But in spite of all our attempts to drown or stupefy or silence our sense of sin, our consciousness of guilt before a holy God, we all have it, and like Banquo's Ghost it will not quiet down. Nothing gives the guilty conscience abiding peace but the atoning blood of Jesus Christ. So, Christ lifted up draws all men unto Him, and even wicked ministers of Satan ...sometimes come to their senses and flee to the real Christ, Christ crucified, as I hope they all may.... Happy the man or woman who yields to that drawing. Woe be to the man or woman who resists that drawing; final gloom, despondency and despair are their lot."

Drawn by Love

"In the second place," continues Torrey, "Christ lifted up on the cross, Christ crucified, draws all men unto Him, because lifted up there to die for us He reveals his wonderful love, and the wondrous love of the Father for us. 'Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us' (1 John 3:16), and 'God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Rom. 5:8). There is nothing that draws men like love. Love draws all men in every clime, but no other love draws like the love of God. John 3:16, 'For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life,' has broken thousands of hard hearts."

Torrey then tells this story. "Many years ago in Chicago at a Christian workers' Convention, I preached in the First Methodist Church on Sunday night. When I gave out the invitation, among many who stood up was a beautifully dressed young woman, but she did not come to the altar with the others. The next night I saw her at the regular session of the conference, and calling to someone else to take the chair I went down to the back of the church so that I could speak to her when the meeting was dismissed. As soon as the benediction was pronounced, I hurried to the seat where she was standing before she had time to leave, and asked her to sit down while I spoke to her. I asked why she had not taken a decided stand when rising the night before. She gave a light, frivolous laugh and said, 'Oh, you don't know my life.' Then with apparently utter shamelessness, before I could speak, she began to pour out a story of awful sin. She told me how she had spent the past Easter, and then said with a laugh, 'Funny way to spend Easter, wasn't it?' I was appalled at the disgusting shamelessness of it all," said Torrey, "for she was a woman in good position. I simply took a little Bible that I had, and opening it at John 3:16, asked her to read it. The print was fine and she had to hold it close to her eyes to read. She began to read flippantly, 'For God so loved the world,' then she became suddenly still. She read on, 'that he gave his only begotten Son,' but now the tears welled up in her eyes, and dropped down on the beautiful gown she wore. The love of God was conquering, the love of God was drawing. The picture of Christ lifted up has won millions."

Christ lifted up is not something that may easily be dismissed as irrelevant. It is of great importance, and that for three reasons. First, it is important because it was absolutely necessary, because it was within the eternal plan of God to save sinners. Second, it is important because it is the sure basis for all true knowledge in spiritual things. You must come to the cross if you would know God or know him more completely. Finally, it is important also because of the fact that the uplifted Christ draws sinful, ignorant, and rebellious men and women to him, conquering them by the unimaginable, unfathomable love that is so clearly displayed there.

May that love conquer your heart. If it has not yet done so, look now to Jesus. See him lifted up on the cross for you, dying in your place, wounded for your transgressions that by his stripes you might be healed. And come to him. The world has never before seen nor ever again will see such a Savior.

Chapter 105.
Believing on Jesus

John 8:30-32

Across America on any given Sunday thousands of sermons will be preached to those who are Christians to urge them to live like Christians, and many thousands more will be preached to those who are not Christians to urge them to believe in Jesus. I doubt if many are preached to those who already believe the doctrines of Christianity and who think they are Christians but who, nevertheless, have never come to the point of accepting the Lord Jesus Christ personally as their Savior. This study is for such people.

The interesting thing about the situation that I have just described is that most people who listen to Christian preaching are, I am convinced, in the last of these categories. That is, they are not genuinely born-again Christians, but neither are they hostile to Christianity. They believe the doctrines. It is just that they have never committed themselves to Jesus Christ and are not really his. They believe, but they are not disciples. They do not deny Christ, but neither do they follow him. A sense of the magnitude of this problem can be seen from the fact that in both Britain and the United States, well over 90 percent of the people surveyed in opinion polls claim that they believe in a personal God. But very few, obviously, do anything about him. In many cases they do not even expose themselves to Christianity.

What should be said about this situation? Or, more particularly, what should be our attitude to such people? The correct answer comes from the lips of the Lord Jesus Christ when he said to those who in his day believed what he had to say but, nevertheless, had not committed themselves to him, "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (8:31-32).

Two Kinds of Belief

To understand what the Lord Jesus Christ is saying in these verses and to apply them properly, we need first to understand that there is a great deal of difference between merely believing Jesus and believing in him or on him.

In most of our English versions this difference is not overly clear in this section of John's Gospel, and in some cases is completely obscured. But in Greek the distinction is plain. In verse 30 of this chapter, John writes of those who really did trust Jesus and who had personally committed themselves to him. John says, "Even as he spoke, many put their faith in him." In the next verse, however, the phrase is changed so that we find ourselves reading of those who merely "believed him." Unfortunately, the Authorized Version and the Revised Standard Version translate the phrases identically (either "believed on" or "believed in"). But the New English Bible, the New American Standard Bible, the New International Version, and others preserve the distinction. The New English Bible is explicit; it says, "As he said this, many put their faith in him. Turning to the Jews who had believed him, Jesus said...." The New International Version says, "Many put their faith in him. To the Jews who had believed him, Jesus said... "In other words, the verses distinguish between those listeners who had believed on Jesus unto salvation and those who had merely believed certain things that he had said.

It is worth noting that this contrast—between those who merely believe doctrines and those who believe on Jesus personally—is also made elsewhere. Thus, to give one example, in the sixth chapter we find Jesus calling for saving faith by saying, "The work of God is this: to believe in the one he has sent" (v. 29). But then, immediately after, those who refuse to believe on that level declare, "What miraculous sign will you give then, that we may see and believe?" (v. 30).

Someone will say, "But is it really possible to believe certain things about Christ or to believe him and yet fail to believe on him?" Yes, of course it is. What is more, we have examples of precisely this failure. One example is Judas, one within the very limited and privileged circle of Christ's disciples. Judas obviously believed something about Jesus. He believed enough to be one of the early preachers. When Jesus sent his disciples out two-by-two, Judas undoubtedly went with them. Yet Judas was not a saved man. Simon Magus is another example. We are told that he believed after he had seen the miracles and signs that Peter and the other apostles performed. He was baptized and became a member of the church. But he was not a true believer either and later was rebuked for his unbelief by Peter. The greatest examples of all are the devils who, we are told, "believe and shudder." Each of these believes certain things about Jesus. But they do not believe unto salvation.

It is not saying too much to suggest that there are many such today. If you are one, I want to encourage you to go the whole way and believe on Jesus. It would be a pity to believe so much, to believe the doctrines, and yet fall short of salvation.

Back in the nineteenth century there was a famous acrobat, known all over the world. His real name was Jean Francois Gravalet, but he was known by his stage name—Blondin. Born in France in 1824, Blondin became well known in France while still a child. As he grew older his skill plus his flair for the spectacular soon brought him the acclaim of many in Europe and then in America. His most spectacular feats, those that also drew most attention, were his crossings of Niagara Falls on a tightrope 1, 100 feet long and 160 feet above the water. Once he pushed a wheelbarrow across. On another occasion he stopped halfway and cooked an omelet.

Once, in an unusual demonstration of skill, Blondin carried a man across Niagara Falls on his back and then turned around and carried him back. After he had put his rider down, the acrobat turned to the large crowd that had been watching and asked a man who was near at hand, "Do you believe that I could do that with you?"

"Of course," the man said. "I've just seen you do it."

"Well, hop on," said Blondin, "and I'll carry you across."

The man answered, "Not on your life!"

That is the difference between believing something on the intellectual level only and believing in the sense of belief that the Bible calls for when it asks us to believe on Christ. To believe in the biblical sense is to commit yourself to Christ, to trust him to carry you over the churning cataracts and wild whirlpools of life. The other belief is only intellectual assent. God wants the first kind of belief. And yet—this is the point that we need to fix clearly in our minds—Jesus' words were directed not to those who had believed properly, but rather to those who had believed only on the inadequate, intellectual level. It was to these, the weak in faith, that he said, "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free."

An Eye for Faith

This fact leads us naturally to the second point, which is the most important. The point is simply that Jesus takes notice of even this inadequate faith and seeks to encourage it. Intellectual belief is not saving faith, but saving faith may come from such beginnings. Therefore, Jesus spoke to those who only believed his teachings and tried to lead them farther.

Spurgeon once wrote on this subject: "It is written, 'When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?' Certainly He can find it if anyone can. He has a very quick eye for faith. He deals with little faith as we used to do with a spark in the tinder, in the days of our boyhood. When we had struck a spark, and it fell into the tinder—though it was a very tiny one—we watched it eagerly, we blew upon it softly, and we were zealous to increase it, so that we might kindle our match thereby.

When our Lord Jesus sees a tiny speck of faith in a man's heart, though it be quite insufficient of itself for salvation, yet he regards it with hope, and watches over it, if, haply, this little faith may grow to something more. It is the way of our compassionate Lord not to quench the smoking flax, nor break the bruised reed."

While Jesus does not disparage small faith, neither does he praise it. Jesus speaks to these who have believed with the head only, but he does so by leading off with a conditional sentence. "If... ," he says, "if you hold to my teaching." True, he does not send them away. But neither does he promise the blessings of the Christian life outright. Rather, there is a task to do, a word to be learned. "You believe something," he seems to say, "believe more; continue in my word until you come at last to rest in me as your Savior."

It often has seemed to me that in these words Jesus was saying something similar to what he was saying in that oft-quoted challenge from the Sermon on the Mount—"Enter through the narrow gate. For wide is the gate and broad is the road that leads to destruction, and many enter through it" (Matt. 7:13). Many have taken this verse to mean that salvation is something to be worked for or else something to be carefully guarded lest through some slip of sin the Christian wanders off the path of salvation and is lost eternally. But it does not mean that. The point of the verse is seen rather in its historical context. Here, early in his ministry, Jesus was speaking to people who as yet had no knowledge of his coming death and resurrection and, of course, were not saved. They believed him (as did those about whom John is writing), but the events upon which salvation depended were yet three years away. In between were years of discouragement in which the early enthusiasm of the Galilean ministry would give way to hostility and eventual persecution. What was to happen to these people during the intervening years? Were they, too, to become discouraged? Were they to drop away? Clearly, Jesus was encouraging them to keep on the narrow way of his teaching until at last, with the cross behind them, they could pass through himself, the narrow door, into salvation.

In precisely the same manner Jesus is also, here in John, encouraging his listeners not to become discouraged by the difficulty of attending to his words or to be offended by what they hear him say. Rather, they are to continue on until, being encouraged by God's grace, they are enabled to embrace Jesus personally as their Savior. Perhaps Jesus is speaking in this manner to you. If so, remember that today you do not have to wait three years to believe or even a moment. Believe now. Commit yourself to Jesus Christ and start on that road of true discipleship that you will follow to your life's end.

Encouragements to Keep On

Are you hesitating? If so, notice that Jesus does not stop speaking to those who had merely believed him after he had encouraged them to continue in his word. He encouraged them to continue; that is true. But he also goes on to provide them with inducements in order that this might surely come about. There are three of them.

First, Jesus said to those Jews who had believed him, "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples." That is, he promised them a verified discipleship. They would not be disciples in word only, as so many are who are in our churches today, but they would be true disciples. Some who are in our churches profess to be disciples of Christ, but you never know it until they tell you. You can know them for years and never observe a decision or an action that is distinctly Christian or never hear a distinctly Christian word. This is not being a disciple. Do not be a parttime, hit-or-miss believer. Be a thoroughbred. The first inducement is that by continuing in Christ's Word you will be such a disciple.

The second inducement is that you will know the truth. It is the promise that you will have certain knowledge in spiritual things. You will not know all things, of course. Only God knows all things. But what you do know will be certain. I am sorry for those for whom all things are in flux. They think that they believe so-and-so; but then, if conditions change, they might not believe it. Or again, if they are challenged, they change their mind. This is a particularly common situation in our day, because we live in an age in which most people consider truth to be relative. This means that there are no absolutes in this or any other area. You may think you have a certain truth, but that is only truth for you, not necessarily truth for me. Or it may only be truth for now, but not for days to come. What a sad situation! What a pathetic condition! This is not what Christ promises. Jesus promises truth and the certainty of it.

Finally, Jesus promises that you will be set free. "The truth will set you free." Jesus himself will set you free; and therefore your freedom will be on a higher and greater level than that which men can offer.

For one thing, it will not be freedom in name only. Once I was told of an interview that some Christians in Hong Kong had conducted with an eighty-two-year-old woman who had shortly before been released from China. She was a Christian, but her vocabulary was filled with much of the terminology of Communism. "When you were back in China, were you free to gather together with other Christians to worship?" they asked her.

"Oh, no," she answered. "Since the liberation no one is permitted to gather together for Christian services."

"But surely you were able to get together in small groups and discuss the Christian faith?"

"No, we were not," the woman replied. "Since the liberation all such meetings are forbidden." "Were you free to read your Bible?"

"Since the liberation no one is free to read the Bible." The point of this story is obvious. Freedom does not consist in the word "freedom" (liberation) alone, but in the reality that only the truth of God brings. Moreover, it is a positive freedom. In Christ we are set free from three terrible masters: sin, self, and Satan. We are set free from them to serve Jesus. Have you experienced such freedom? You can, if you will continue in Christ's Word and come to believe on him.

Chapter 106.
Free Indeed!

John 8:33-36

Ever since the early Anglo-Saxon dialects gave their formative influence to the English language, the words "free" and "freedom" have been important to the Western world and its culture. Unfortunately, there has not always been agreement on what freedom means. In his speech on the four freedoms, given on January 6, 1941, Franklin Delano Roosevelt spoke largely of human rights: "Freedom of speech and expression—everywhere in the world... freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world... freedom from want... and freedom from fear—everywhere in the world." William Murray, the first Earl of Mansfield, England, wrote in the eighteenth century, "To be free is to live under a government by law."

Others of a more rebellious disposition have spoken of freedom as an escape from law. In American culture, the predominant idea associated with the concept of freedom is freedom from unjust oppression. This significant idea is captured in that well-known inscription found on the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor:

> Give me your tired, your poor,
> Your huddled masses, yearning to breathe free.

What is freedom? Or, more particularly, what does the Bible mean by freedom? At this point we can hardly escape either this question or the answer, for our text in the eighth chapter of John's Gospel involves a statement in which Jesus claimed to be able to set men free. His exact words were, "So if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed" (v. 36). In this context two answers are given to the question, "What is freedom?"—first, freedom from ignorance, and second, freedom from sin. Moreover, we are told that a person becomes free only through Christ, through the truth that he brings and through the redemption that he achieved at Calvary.

Freedom from Ignorance

In the first place, the freedom of which the Bible speaks is a freedom from ignorance, by which is meant primarily an ignorance of spiritual things. This is clear from the verse that immediately precedes our section. In that verse Jesus had said to his opponents, "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (vv. 31-32).

We are all aware of bondage where natural ignorance is concerned. Someone who does not know is limited. An individual with no education has certain doors barred. The professions are closed. Such a person can do manual, but not white collar, work. An illiterate person faces even more closed doors and will have difficulty obtaining any but the most menial forms of employment. Our country recognizes the truth of these things and therefore, as a general rule, stresses education.

But if this is true on the purely natural level, it is at least equally true or even more true spiritually. A man who does not know the teachings of the Word of God cannot thrive spiritually. A man who does not know the fundamental truths of the Christian faith cannot come to Jesus Christ for salvation.

The really upsetting thing about this situation, however, is that many persons who are not knowledgeable about Christian truth and who are therefore bound by their ignorance are nonetheless unaware that they are ignorant and so resist any attempt to help them to become free. They are like stubborn children. No one blames a child for not knowing all that an adult knows, but at least one expects a child to be willing to learn. If he is not willing, something is wrong. Many persons are like this spiritually.

We do not have to go far for an example either, for one is found in the verses we are studying. Jesus had spoken of freedom to those who were listening to him. But no sooner had he mentioned the word "free" than they reacted violently. Jesus said, "You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free."

But when he said that, they immediately responded, "We are Abraham's descendants and have never been slaves of anyone. How can you say that we shall be set free?" (v. 33). This was patently ridiculous, of course. For years the Jews had been slaves in Egypt. During the period of the Judges there were at least seven occasions when the nation fell under foreign rule. Later there was the seventy-year-long Babylonian captivity. Even as they were talking to Jesus, these men carried coins in their pockets that bore the image of the Roman emperors and thereby testified to Rome's dominion. Yet they said, "We have always been free."

We smile at this kind of self-delusion. But it is no more ridiculous than the self-delusion of people who today are slaves to ignorance in spiritual matters but who will not acknowledge their slavery. They do not know God. Yet they think they know all there is to know and so will not learn about Jesus or come to him.

Truth Saves

Thus far we have looked at two reasons why freedom from ignorance is important: first, because knowledge itself is important—a lack of it limits an individual; and second, because we are ignorant. There is a third reason also. Freedom from ignorance is important because it is through a knowledge of spiritual truth that God saves people from sin, from themselves, and from Satan.

Let me give you a typical example. Here is a man who, let us say, lives in your city. He is an average sort of person. He has a normal, nine-to-five job. He has a family. On Friday night he bowls with the league. He likes to golf on Sunday. When he is not out doing something else he watches television. It is a normal life, and he is quite happy with it. He seldom thinks of God, and he would not really know what to think about God even if he did think about him. God just does not enter into his thinking.

Someone begins to talk to him about spiritual things, and in the course of time he comes into a situation in which he begins to learn something of what the Bible teaches. It may be in church. It may be in a home Bible study. It may be through listening to the radio or through reading Christian books. He begins to learn a few basic truths. The first thing he learns is that he is a sinner. Before this he had always thought he was all right because he had never cheated on his wife or robbed anyone. Now he learns that sin is being less perfect than God and that it is seen in such things as pride, selfishness, anger, and worry. For the first time in his life he begins to be disturbed. He learns that God is a God of judgment and that there is a judgment day coming. This really disturbs him. He had never thought of the fact that one day he might have to give an account of what he has done in this life. Now he finds himself lying awake at night thinking about death and what lies beyond it. Finally, this man hears about the death of the Lord Jesus Christ—how he died for his people and how he loves them. These truths now grip him as forcefully as the thought of judgment had gripped him before, and he finds himself calling on Christ in order that he might be saved. The truth of Christianity, made meaningful to him and applied to his heart by the Holy Spirit, saves him. The truth has set him free.

This can be your experience. Are you one who has heard the truths of Christianity and who needs to come to Jesus Christ as your Savior? You can come now. You do not need to do anything but commit your life to him. Believe these truths: you are a sinner; there is a judgment day coming; Jesus died for your sin. Stand firm upon these truths! Do not linger any longer in the bondage of spiritual ignorance!

Freedom from Sin

Second, the Lord Jesus Christ spoke of a freedom from sin. This is involved in verse 34, where Jesus declares, "I tell you the truth, everyone who sins is a slave to sin." Notice that Jesus is not talking about the penalty of sin in this verse. It is not that we are to be set free from sin's penalty. Jesus is talking about sin's power, about the hold that sin has over us, about a defeated Christian life. His point is that he can set a person free from this bondage also.

Are you one who desires such freedom? Probably you have a measure of freedom now. Since coming to Christ you have been free of the fear of judgment. You do not fear death. The guilt of sin does not weigh heavily upon you. You feel that you are free to grow in the knowledge of Christ almost indefinitely. And yet, there is a sin that you cannot seem to shake. You have a temper; you cannot control it. You offend people by your thoughtlessness. You are caught in some sexual sin and cannot escape it. I do not know what the particular point of defeat is in your life, but I do know that Jesus is himself the answer to that defeat. Allow him to free you. Come to him! Learn about him! Call upon him! Claim his promises! He said, "If the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed."

Moreover, there is a role that Christians have in helping others to achieve this freedom. Beyond any doubt, there are some things that God does alone. Bringing new life into a dead soul is one of them. None of us can cause a person to be born again. God alone must do it. But once God has made a person alive, then there is work that God gives us so that we might share in the other's full salvation.

Let me give some biblical examples. When the Lord Jesus Christ brought his friend Lazarus back from the dead, it was the Lord himself who called him: "Lazarus, come out." But after he had brought Lazarus forth, still wrapped in grave clothes, his next words were to those who stood about, by which he invited them to have a hand in Lazarus's full liberation: "Loose him, and let him go." When God called the apostle Paul on the road to Damascus, it was God alone who called him and who brought forth new life in Paul. The others who were with Paul did not even hear the words God spoke. Nevertheless, when Paul had been brought into Damascus, Ananias was then used to visit and baptize Paul that he might receive his sight. God used Philip to bring the light of the gospel to the Ethiopian. He used Priscilla and Aquila to bring a fuller understanding of the truth to Apollos. In the same way, each Christian has a ministry in the life of a person or persons.

Are you saying, as many do, "But I do not have the gift of helping"? If you are, I cannot believe you. Every Christian can do something, for

God has given every Christian at least one gift. Most can do much more than they are doing, including some things that they did not think they could do.

Howard G. Hendricks of Dallas Theological Seminary tells in a recent book of a conversation he once had with a man whom he wanted to involve in Christian work. He wanted him to conduct a home Bible class. "Wow," the man objected, "I don't have the gift of teaching."

"How do you know, Bill?" Hendricks replied. "Did God let down a sheet from heaven one night and tell you that?"

"No," he acknowledged, "I just don't have it."

"Have you ever taught?"

"No, I've never taught."

"Then don't tell me you don't have the gift of teaching, my friend, because you don't know that," Hendricks answered. The man thought a bit and eventually agreed to teach. "Today," says the author, "if I want to send my students to see a man who knows how to communicate a lot better than most professionals, I send them out to hear Bill!"

Perhaps you are saying, "But that was Bill. I know I don't have the gift of teaching. I really do know it! What can I do?" Let me take you to another New Testament story. Do you remember the prodigal son?

When the prodigal came home, it was the father who met him. He did not say to the servants, "Go and meet him." The father himself went, and threw his arms about his son's neck and kissed him. The father personally forgave him and restored him to his home. Nevertheless, after he had done this the father then turned to the servants who stood by and said to them, "Bring the best robe and put it on him. Put a ring on his finger and sandals on his feet. Bring the fattened calf and kill it. Let's have a feast and celebrate." My point is that the servants had work in each of these four areas.

First, they were to bring the best robe and put it on the young man. That makes an illustration of good Christian teaching. Robes in Scripture often speak of Christ's righteousness. So we have a role in actually helping to put Christ's righteousness upon the sinner. We are not content merely to preach Christ. We want men to put him on, and we want to help them do it. God uses many, like Bill, in this work of teaching and evangelism.

Second, they were to put a ring on his hand. This speaks of fellowship. Many who cannot teach nevertheless can do this work simply by getting to know others who have become Christians, becoming friends with them, and including them in Christian activities.

Third, the servants were to put shoes on the prodigal's feet. There were roads to be walked, and shoes were necessary. In a similar way some can help others to prepare for life's journey. And as for the preparation of the fatted calf and the rejoicing, well, there are babes in Christ to be fed and many to be cheered and made welcome. There is plenty to be done. Each Christian has a responsibility to help others in God's service.

For Saints and Sinners

If you are not a Christian, then you must respond to Christ's offer of freedom at once without delaying. There is a verse in this section of John that is for you. It is the verse in which Jesus says, somewhat enigmatically, "Now a slave has no permanent place in the house; but a son belongs to it forever" (v. 35). The contrast is between a son, who is the inheritor of the father's property and whose rights cannot be denied or taken away, and a slave who, although he may enjoy some of the privileges of being in the same house as the son, nevertheless can be sold at any time and thus lose his privileges. Obviously this applied to Christ's hearers, who were Jews but who were not God's sons by the new birth. They had all the privileges of being Jews, but unless they came to Christ for salvation the privileges would not last forever. The day would come when even Jerusalem would be destroyed and the Jews would be scattered.

Opportunity does not last forever for anyone. It will not last forever for you if you are not yet a Christian. Christ offers you freedom now—freedom from ignorance and freedom from sin's power. You are in a place where you can hear the gospel, question Christian friends, observe Christianity. Who knows when such things may change? You may have to move to another city. You may get sick. Eventually you will die. Now is the time to believe.

Finally, there is also an application for those who have already received Christ as Savior. Have you been set free from ignorance and from sin? If so, there is work to do, for you have not been set free to be idle. You are set free to serve God. If you are a Christian, God wants you to follow him in Christian service. For this is freedom. It is freedom indeed!

Chapter 107.
Sons of Abraham

John 8:37-40

That a personal commitment to Jesus Christ is necessary in order to become a Christian is an idea totally alien to the thinking of many people. Yet it is true, and it needs to be stressed in our day. A number of years ago my wife and I were dealing with an English woman who had been raised in a religious home. She was not a Christian, but she thought she was. Her father had been a vestryman in the Church of England. From the earliest years she had been brought to Sunday school. She once sang in the choir. In one sense, she even believed all that the Church of England taught, for—although she did not know much—she would never have thought of disagreeing with the Thirty-Nine Articles or with anything in the Prayer Book. For her, to be an English woman was to be a member of the Church of England, and to be a member of the church was to be a Christian. It was a matter of tradition. It was not until we had spoken to her for some time that she discovered the reality of Christianity and committed her life to Jesus Christ personally.

That story is not an unusual one, of course. But it is an important one, if only because the experience I have described is so common. People consider themselves Christians largely because they have had a Christian father or mother, or because they were raised in a Christian church, or just because there has never been any other religious tradition in their background. If you are one for whom the Christian faith consists largely of such things, you should look closely at these very important verses from John's Gospel.

An Inconsistency

The verses are found in the eighth chapter, and they concern the reaction of certain leaders of the Jewish people to Jesus. Jesus had been talking to these men about spiritual things. But whenever he suggested that there might be a lack in their lives (which he could fill), they reacted violently and defensively. Toward the end of the chapter we find that they went so far as to attempt to stone him. It is a pity that they reacted in this way, of course. It is an even greater pity that men and women often act this way today. Yet it is human nature. Even the most miserable people will react defensively at any suggestion that their lives could be made better.

These men countered Christ's suggestion that they needed something by the claim that they had all they needed through their religious traditions. They traced their ancestry to Abraham claiming that they were all right because "we are Abraham's descendants." God's promises were made to Abraham and to his descendants (Gen. 17:7; 22:16-18). They had descended from Abraham physically. Therefore, they reasoned, we are blessed in Abraham, and there is nothing for us to worry about spiritually.

What did Jesus do when faced by this reply? He made a number of penetrating statements that should have helped these men to understand the true state of affairs and that should help us today.

The first statement was that there was a strange inconsistency in their lives. It was an inconsistency between what they professed to be and what they actually were. On the one hand, they were professing to be religious people. Abraham was a man approved by God. He walked with God. He was praised by God. They claimed that this was true of them. Yet, as Jesus pointed out, they sought "to kill him" and thus demonstrated that his "word had no place" in them. Neither of these facts was true of Abraham.

Let us apply this observation of the Lord Jesus Christ to our day. Here is a man or woman— perhaps it is you—who thinks that he is a Christian but to whose way of life Christianity makes little difference. I will not say, though it might be more true than we realize, that, if Christ were actually on the earth physically, you would try to "kill" him. But perhaps you try to kill him where you individually are concerned—by keeping him out of your life. You say you are a Christian, but you have no room in your life for the One who founded Christianity. You believe he lived and died. Perhaps you even believe that he rose again. But it makes no difference to you. Nothing about your life is changed because of him.

It also is true that his word does not abide in you. I do not mean by this that you have never heard or even been able to memorize some of Christ's teachings, though if you think the words "God helps those who help themselves" are in the Bible, you know less of his teachings than you think. But I do mean to say that they are not enough a part of you to affect your decisions. Someone plays a dirty trick on you, and you play one back. "'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord" means nothing to you. When you come home you insult your wife and snap at the children. Christ's commandment that you "love one another" does not enter into your thinking. What of this? Is it not a strange inconsistency? Does it not trouble you? This is not the way of Christ or of those who follow him.

What Is Your Ancestry?

Second, Jesus went on to explain the cause of this inconsistency. It was explained by the true ancestry of these religious leaders. They claimed a natural or physical descent from Abraham, and on this level their claim was quite valid. The difficulty was that their descent from Abraham was only physical; that is, it was external rather than internal, natural rather than spiritual. On the spiritual level (about which Jesus was concerned), their ancestry was something quite different. It was—we must be bold enough to say it—demonic. Spiritually they were children of their true father, the devil.

Let me say at once that in its full sense this is not true of most people. Sometimes preachers speak of there being two families in this world—the family of God and the family of the devil— and they imply that if one does not serve God he serves Satan. This is not true in the full sense, but (I must repeat) only in the full sense. Actually, most people serve themselves and are no more interested in serving Satan than they are in serving God. These men were apparently Satan's tools in a way that most people would not be. They proved it by their concerted and vicious efforts to kill God.

On the other hand, there is a sense in which all that is not of God can be traced to Satan, for it was through Satan that sin first entered the universe. Do you sin? Do you find yourself flashing out in anger against someone else? Do you ever exploit someone else? Do you put yourself first in business or in your marriage and allow others to come second? If this is so, then in one sense at least you are demonstrating a demonic ancestry. Such things do not come from the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Jesus taught this truth in a parable once, pointing out that good fruit does not come from a bad tree. It takes a good tree to produce it. Similarly, bad fruit does not come from a good tree. A bad tree creates it. In the same way, you can come to know the true nature of your spiritual family tree by the fruit found on it. What is the fruit in your life? How about your speech? How about your actions? It is interesting that Jesus called attention to both these areas in speaking to the Jewish rulers. For he said, making the contrast between what is of God and what is of Satan, "I am telling you what I have seen in the Father's presence, and you do what you have heard from your father" (v. 38).

Born Again

The obvious conclusion to this study is that, if a person is to be taken out of the family of Satan and into the family of God, he must experience what he would have to experience if this were true physically. What would you have to do to get out of one family and into another? The answer is that you would have to die to the one family and be born again into another. This cannot be done physically, of course. It is only a theoretical argument. But the glory of the Christian gospel is that it can be done spiritually. It is possible to be born again through the work of God's Holy Spirit and on the basis of Christ's death on the cross.

Before we can make this point, however—before we can say that a man can be born again—we must make the equally important point that a man must be born again and that this is true because no mere physical birth can save him.

This point is made at two other very important places in the Bible. First, it was made by John the Baptist. John had been preaching in the wilderness of Judea and many had come to him for baptism. Some of them had not repented. So John said to these, "And do not think you can say to yourselves, 'We have Abraham as our father.' I tell you that out of these stones God can raise up children for Abraham. The ax is already at the root of the trees, and every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire" (Matt. 3:9-10). John was telling these men that only an act of God, by which they would become reborn and begin to bring forth good fruit, would save them.

The second important statement of this same point is in the letter of Paul to the Galatians. In one sense the whole letter is a statement of it. Teachers had come to the Galatian churches from Jerusalem saying that one could be saved only by first becoming a Jew, a child of Abraham. It was all right to have Christ, but there must be Abraham too. Faith was all right, but there must also be law. There must be a physical ancestry. In this case, Paul replied to the doctrine so strongly that he actually said, "If you let yourselves be circumcised [that is, become a Jew in order to acquire Jewish ancestry], Christ will be of no value to you at all" (Gal. 5:2). Nothing matters but becoming "a new creation" in Christ (Gal. 6:15).

Are you a new creation in Christ? Have you been born again into God's family? On one occasion Jesus spoke to a man who had every advantage that ancestry and religious tradition could bring. His name was Nicodemus. He was a Jew, a teacher, a man of influence and prestige. Yet Jesus said, "You must be born again" (John 3:7). This is God's work, but it conies about as a man or woman begins to turn his or her back on any advantage supposedly derived from man and instead begins to draw near to Christ, trusting him for salvation. True children of God are not those with an impeccable religious ancestry, but rather those who believe as Abraham believed and who obey as Abraham obeyed.

The Example of Abraham

The final point of Jesus' reply to these religious leaders was that in spite of all he had said, it was still possible for them to learn from their ancestry if they would only do it. To be sure, this is not said directly. But it seems to be implied in Christ's final reference to Abraham. Jesus pointed out that it was because they did not like what he said that they were trying to kill him. Then he added, "Abraham did not do such things" (v. 40). Granted that Abraham did not seek to have Christ killed and did not reject him, what, then, did he do? The answer seems to be that he received the word of God readily and trusted God for his salvation.

I am not sure of this next point, but it seems to me that Jesus probably was thinking of a specific incident from Abraham's life as he said this. Do you remember the story in which three supernatural beings came to Abraham to warn him of the pending destruction of Sodom (Genesis 18)? These messengers are described in a strange way. Sometimes they are described as three beings. Sometimes they are described as one. Their words sometimes are prefaced with the statement, "The Lord said." Who were these beings? Who was this person? At the least we are dealing with angels, but they are not called angels. Some, therefore, have speculated that this was a preincarnate manifestation of the Lord Jesus Christ himself and that Abraham, therefore, literally saw the Lord Jesus.

If this is true—and I believe it may well be—then Abraham literally did the opposite of what these religious leaders were doing and many persons do today. The leaders were rejecting Jesus. Abraham, on the other hand, ran to him and entreated him to come into his tent. Let me make it personal. Do you have an ancestor who was a genuine believer in the Lord Jesus? Do you trace your religious feelings to some genuine experience by one who is or was close to you? If you do, this is not entirely bad. But you must not trust to the relationship only. You must do as he or she did. You must do as Abraham. Do you have a godly father? Then do as he did and follow Jesus. Do you have a praying mother? Then do as she does and pray to Jesus that your sins might be forgiven and that you might become his follower. No one wants to be a hypocrite. You do not want to be one. See to it that you make what you have been professing to be actually true in your experience.

Run to Jesus! Welcome Jesus! Invite him in, and not just into your tent or house but into your life as well. You will find that he will bless you and that he will teach you wonderful things about his will and ways, just as the heavenly messenger taught Abraham.

A Word for Christians

There is a final word for Christians. This study has dealt largely with the strange inconsistency of someone professing to be a believer while he or she is not and, actually, betrays that fact by conduct. But another and even stranger inconsistency exists when those who really are Christians do not display Christ-like conduct. This is often true, of course. There is a reason for it.

Christians do not lose their old nature merely by becoming Christians. The old nature will assert itself; but while it is true that it happens, it still should not be characteristic of the Christian's behavior. The Christian should reveal the hand of Christ in his life.

Years ago a young dental student studied in Philadelphia under a dentist who was known for the perfect way in which he made amalgam fillings. He made them so well they looked like inlays, which are normally much harder to make and more expensive. The fillings were so good that the dentist was known as "the amalgam king." Well, the time came when the young student finished his course and was drafted into the army. In the army he did dental work and eventually ended up on the west coast, three thousand miles from his home city of Philadelphia. One day a draftee came into his office for some work, and the young man who had studied in Philadelphia began to examine the fillings. Suddenly he straightened up and asked, "Do you come from Philadelphia?" "Yes," he was told.

"I thought so," the young dentist said. "Your work has been done by Dr. Ward C. Miller, the amalgam king."

I am sure you can see the application. In this life it will never be true that every aspect of our lives will reveal the touch of the Lord Jesus Christ, but there must be some areas that can be identified as his workmanship. Others should be able to point to you and say, "It is the work of Jesus Christ, the great physician. It is the work of the King."

Chapter 108.
That Other Family

John 8:41-50

I do not know who first originated the popular phrase "the universal fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man," but I suspect that it is a product of nineteenth-century liberalism. I know that it is not a proper expression of true Christianity. The phrase sounds good. It suggests that all men are really brothers despite their differences and that all worship the same God regardless of the different names they give to him. But that is just not true, and both the Word of God and history refute it. The true picture is presented in the verses to which we come in this study.

A Heightened Debate

We can recall from previous studies that the debate between Jesus and the religious leaders had been growing more and more intense. This has already been seen in the actions of these men, as well as in their speech. Now, even their speech becomes more strident. They had begun by claiming to be Abraham's seed; that is, descendents of the man whom God had promised to bless as the father of a special people and who was to be a blessing to many. But after Jesus had disputed their claim, they intensified it, saying then that they were actually the children of God (v. 41). On his part, Jesus also intensified his denial. He had begun by denying that they were Abraham's seed spiritually. He adds to that a denial that they are God's children. Finally, he says openly that they actually are children of their true father, the devil.

The reaction to this last statement must have been intense. So we are not surprised to find these leaders taking up stones to try to kill him just a few verses later. These words stirred their indignation, as Christ knew they would. But they were the truth. They had to be said whether or not the men were offended.

It is the same today, of course. For if a desire not to offend men were the measure of what could be taught, little of the teaching of the Word of God could be communicated. Years ago an evangelist went to a little town in Nevada to hold meetings. When he met the minister of the church in which the meetings were to be held, he was told, "Now, my friend, I want to tell you that there are certain things you must not say here and certain sins about which you must not speak. For instance, it would never do for you to talk about divorce; this is the divorce capital of America, and many of our people have been married and divorced several times. They are sensitive on that issue. You cannot talk about drinking, for that is a big business here. Don't mention gambling."

The poor evangelist looked at the minister and asked, "Well, of whose sins may I speak?"

"Go for the sins of the Piute Indians," he was told. "They never go to church anyway."

There are truths that need to be stated whether or not men and women are offended. Since Jesus knew this, he spoke the truth here. From our point of view it is good that he did, for as a result of it we have in these verses the clearest teachings about Satan and of the truth that God is not the father of all men and that all are not brothers that is to be found in John's Gospel. Actually, there is only one other place in the Gospel where Satan is even mentioned, and that does not tell us much about him. It is where we are told that the devil entered into Judas Iscariot (13:2, 27).

A Personal Devil

What do these verses tell us about Satan? First of all, they tell us that there is a devil—a real one because he is not a figment of human imagination, and a personal one because he is not merely some vague, abstract idea of evil. Jesus indicates this when he speaks of the devil by name and refers to him with the personal pronoun "he."

The idea of a personal devil has been denied by large segments of the Christian church, of course, and has become almost a laughing matter in current society. Due to the revival of witchcraft and Satanism in recent years, it is perhaps not so much a laughing matter as previously. Still many would regard thoughts about there being a real devil as hardly serious. In the popular mind the devil is a funny little man dressed up in long red underwear, with horns and a tail. And "since I could never believe in a funny little man in red underwear, with horns and a tail," so the argument goes, "I could never believe in a devil." Few who think this way see that this is quite a different image of Satan from that portrayed in the Bible, and even fewer (including Christians) recognize the picture of a little man with horns as Satan's stratagem.

In writing to the Corinthians on one occasion the apostle Paul noted that we are not ignorant of Satan's schemes (2 Cor. 2:11). The word "scheme" means a trick, plot, contrivance, or stratagem. So the point is that Christians know, or should know, about Satan's tricks for seeking to blind men's minds and secure them for himself. One of these, which he uses at some points of history, but not at all points, is to make people believe that he does not exist.

The idea of a funny little man with horns has had an interesting development that is connected at one point (wrongly, or course) with the Bible. In the Middle Ages, when most of the people were illiterate and the church used miracle plays to teach basic Bible stories and doctrine, there was a need to make whatever character represented the devil immediately recognizable on the stage. This could not be done by writing; but there was a pagan idea in vogue according to which Satan was somewhat of a monster, with horns, and this form was used. Moreover, this idea of Satan's appearance was assumed to be supported by the Bible. For back in Isaiah, in a prophecy against Babylon, there is mention of a creature that would one day, it is said, roam about over the fallen and deserted city. The Hebrew word for this animal or creature is sair—it means a wild goat— but few knew what it meant. Thus, in some early translations of the Bible it was called a "satyr," one of the half-human, half-bestial figures of mythology. The Bible was thereby assumed to have described a creature like that of the popular Satan figure, and the medieval practice seemed vindicated. In modern times, with an equal lack of support, the devil has been conceived as the sophisticated tempter of the Faust legend or of the popular American stage play and movie Damn Yankees.

Since the devil of fiction is so unbelievable as to be almost pathetic, it is no wonder that millions—knowing nothing more than this fiction—discount him. But this is a mistake about which we should be warned. According to Jesus, there is a devil and there are people who follow him. In fact, he warned his disciples to pray, "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one" (Matt. 6:13).

A Fallen Being

Second, Jesus teaches that the devil is a fallen being. He does this in two ways: first, by showing the height from which he fell ("not holding to the truth") and, second, by showing the depths to which he descended ("he is a liar and the father of lies"). It goes along with both points that "he was a murderer from the beginning."

Unfortunately, this point too is rejected by many, assuming that they even believe in a devil. Rather than believing that Satan is a depraved form of what he once was, they prefer to think of him as heroic and more or less as the champion of fallen man. On this point John Milton is probably the biggest offender. For while it is true that in the opening pages of his great epic Paradise Lost he does describe the fall of Satan from heaven, it also is true that the greater part of those pages and the first book of the epic describe Lucifer's heroic efforts to rise from the depths of hell and make something of his supposed new kingdom. In Milton's hands he does this brilliantly, so brilliantly, in fact, that some commentators have termed Satan rather than Jesus the book's hero. This is not what Scripture says.

To begin with, Satan has never been in hell and does not control hell. The Bible tells us that God has created hell, preparing it in part for the devil and his angels, and that Satan will one day end up there—although he is not there yet. For another, the Bible describes Satan as at one time being "full of wisdom and perfect in beauty." It says that he was once "in Eden the garden of God," that he was "the anointed cherub," that he was "perfect" in all his ways from the day he was created, until sin was found in him (Ezek. 28:12-15). In Isaiah we are told of his fall through pride and through the arrogant desire to replace God. In that passage Satan says, "I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High."

God replies that as a result of his sin he will actually be "brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit" (Isa. 14:13-15). This is not the portrait of a heroic being but of a fallen being. It is of one from whom a person should turn in horror.

Moreover, Satan has brought great havoc on the human race. He is a murderer and the author of murder, as Jesus told his listeners. The first crime following the fall of Adam and Eve was a murder, for as a result of the fall Cain slew his brother. Five chapters farther on in John we read that Satan entered into Judas to betray Christ into the hands of his enemies, so that they might kill him. Satan's history is written in blood.

It also is written in deceit, for he is a liar, as Christ said. Satan lied to Eve—"You will not surely die!" (Gen. 3:4). But she did die spiritually and thus lost communion with God. In 1 Kings we read that lying spirits (presumably demons) went forth into the prophets of Ahab so that he would go into battle against the Syrians and be slain at Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:21-23). In Acts we are told that Satan entered into Ananias to cause him to lie about the price of his property, as the result of which he died (Acts 5:3). Satan lies today. Consequently, we are to regard him as dangerous, deceitful, and malicious, but above all as a sinful being and as a failure. He sinned when he failed to remain in his high calling.

A Limited Being

Third, Jesus indicates that Satan is a limited being. That is, he is not omniscient, as God is; he is not omnipotent, as God is; he is not omnipresent, as God is. This is not so explicitly stated in these verses as in other portions of the Bible, but it is implied. For if Satan is a murderer from the beginning, he is limited in the area of the ethical life. If he is a liar and the father of it, he is limited in understanding. If he is to face judgment, as Jesus says next, he obviously is limited in power; for he cannot avoid it. Thus, although we should be aware of Satan and warned about him, we should nevertheless not get into the habit of thinking of the tempter as anything like an evil equivalent of God.

This is worth thinking about in detail. To begin with, Satan is not omniscient. God knows all things, but Satan does not. Above all he does not know the future. No doubt Satan can make shrewd guesses, for he knows the nature of man and the tendencies of history well. The so-called revelations of mediums and fortune-tellers—when they are not outright deceits—fall in this category. But this is not true knowledge of what is to come. Thus, the predictions are vague and generally do not hold water. At one point God stated this in the form of a challenge to all false gods, saying, "'Present your case,' says the LORD. 'Set forth your arguments,' says Jacob's King. 'Bring in your idols to tell us what is going to happen.... tell us what the future holds, so we may know that you are gods. Do something, whether good or bad, so that we will be dismayed and filled with fear.'" (Isa. 41:21-24).

Neither is Satan omnipotent. Thus, he cannot do everything he wants to do, and, in the case of believers, he can only do what God will permit. The great example here is the case of Job, who was safe until God had first lowered the hedge that he had thrown up about him. Even then God did this for his own worthwhile purposes and kept Job from sinning.

Finally, Satan is not omnipresent, which means that he cannot be everywhere at the same time tempting everyone. God is omnipresent. He can help all who call upon him, all at one time. But Satan must tempt one individual at a time or else operate through one or more of those angels, now demons, who fell with him. The interesting consequence of this fact is that Satan has probably never tempted you or any Christian you know. Even in the Bible we find very few who were tempted by Satan directly. Whom can you think of who was so tempted? There was Eve, of course. Christ was tempted. Peter was tempted. We are told that the devil entered into Ananias to cause him to lie about the price of his land, and into Judas. But that is about all. On one occasion Paul may have been hindered in his plans by Satan (1 Thess. 2:18), but on another it was only a messenger of Satan who buffeted him (2 Cor. 12:7). Similarly, it was only lesser demons who opposed an angel bringing a revelation to Daniel (Dan. 10:13, 20). And, although 2 Kings 6:16 may mean to suggest that a great host of devils, as well as soldiers, surrounded Elisha at Dothan—outnumbered by the Lord's host, however—Satan himself is not said to have been among them.

This simply means that while the Christian must never ignore or underestimate Satan and his stratagems, neither must he overestimate him. And, above all, he must never do this to the point of taking his eyes away from God. God is our strength and our tower. He limits Satan. Thus, he will never permit a Christian to be tempted above that which he is able and, indeed, will always provide the way of escape that he may be able to bear it (1 Cor. 10:13). As for Satan, his end is in the lake of fire (Matt. 25:41).

Two Ways

There are two ways open before us. "There is a way that seems right to a man, but in the end it leads to death" (Prov. 14:12). This is Satan's way. And there is a "road that leads to life" (Matt. 7:14), which is God's way. The two paths lie before each individual.

On the one path Satan makes his promises. But he is the father of lies, and his words cannot be trusted. He is offering wisdom, as he did to Eve in the garden—"You will be like God, knowing good and evil"—but the wisdom of Satan leads to folly in spiritual things. He is offering love, but the end is hate. He is offering that which is pleasant—"all the kingdoms of the world and their glory"—but the end is torment for those who follow him.

On the other path stands Jesus with his promises. In one sense they are the reversal of Satan's promises. He says. "You are blind!" But he gives sight, and wisdom follows. He has a message of hate. "I hate sin," he declares. But he will turn you from sin and draw you to himself with a great love. Finally, he warns about torment. He has more to say about hell than anyone else in the Bible. But he offers pleasantness to those who follow him. All his ways are "pleasant" and all his "paths are peace" (Prov. 3:17). Will you follow him? Will you commit yourself to him as your Savior?

Chapter 109.
The Last Enemy

John 8:51

Some time ago I received a letter from an eighty-one-year old woman who was afraid to die. She was a Christian and probably should have been less fearful as she drew near the end of her earthly life. But she was still afraid and so expressed openly what many others feel but will not speak of. In view of her fear it was a privilege to show her that spiritual death is conquered and that even physical death may be totally transformed for Christians.

Fear of death lies deep in the heart of many persons, and sometimes it is not so deep. The Bible says, "Dust you are, and to dust you will return" (Gen. 3:19). It calls death an enemy. "The last enemy to be destroyed is death," according to Paul's comments on the subject in his first letter to the Corinthians. Poets may make light of death, as did James Russell Lowell, who called death as "beautiful as the feet of a friend, coming to welcome us at our journey's end." But Francis Bacon was closer to the truth when he acknowledged that "men fear death as children fear the dark." Dr. Samuel Johnson, the maker of the dictionary, expressed what many feel when he was confronted by a friend's final illness. "At the sight of this last conflict I felt a sensation never known to me before: a confusion of passions, an awful stillness of sorrow, a gloomy terror without a name."

How comforting in the light of our fears is the promise of Jesus that is the basis of our study. His exact words are, "I tell you the truth, if anyone keeps my word, he will never see death" (John 8:51). It is a great promise and may be considered in three parts: first, the condition upon which the promise is based; second, the promise itself; third, the assurance that the promise can be trusted.

The Conditions

The first item is the condition upon which the promise is based—"if anyone keeps my word." It is a condition, for when Jesus began the phrase by the word "if he indicated that there is something we must do after which the promise will follow.

We should be glad that he put it as he did, of course. For the offer "if anyone keeps my word" opens the promise to all sorts of people. Next to the terms of this condition other characteristics of a man or woman fade into relative unimportance. A person may be quite weak in faith so that he often is doubting the reality of spiritual things, but if he keeps Christ's saying he will never see death. He may be timid or shy so that he is afraid to express what he actually believes in his heart, but if he keeps Christ's saying he will never see death. He may have been a great sinner before he was found by Christ and saved by him. He may have been a very upright man, even to the degree of being filled with pride at his own high attainments; if he has kept Christ's saying, he will never see death. This is the important point, and it is for this reason that I have repeated it. The condition is: "If anyone keeps my word." Have you kept it? Are you keeping it? If you do, you shall never see death.

I can imagine that someone may be asking, "But what does it mean to keep Christ's word?" It is a good question, and the answer is worth exploring. It means several things.

First, it means that you must hear Christ's word; that is, you must hear with understanding. Indeed, how else can a person keep it unless he hears it in the sense of understanding what it means? It is clear that this is involved in Christ's thought because it is expressly stated in the fifth chapter in a verse that is almost an exact parallel of the one here. In that verse Jesus says, "I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life" (v. 24).

Let me illustrate what is involved in hearing Christ's word. A number of years ago Dennis

Cochrane, a missionary to the Duna Indian tribe of New Guinea, was looking for a word in the Duna language that would convey what the Bible means by faith. The Dunas had a word for faith, but it did not imply the necessary action. Faith is believing God and acting upon that belief. Besides, there did not seem to be any other word that implied action either. Finally, while putting a number of Duna folk tales into written form in order to become better acquainted with the language, Cochrane came across a story in which a small animal, like a squirrel, was chased up a tree by a dog. "I'm going to get you," the dog said. This did not bother the squirrel, however, because it knew that a dog cannot climb trees. The story acknowledged that the squirrel heard the threat, but it was the kind of hearing that allowed the words to go into one ear and out the other. After several more threats and some growling, the dog finally said, "All right, I'm going to get my friend, the...." Here he mentioned an animal that could climb trees. At this point in the story it was said that the squirrel heard the saying in another sense. This time the verb literally meant, "The saying went down into his ears." It got through. As a result, the squirrel started for another area of the forest as soon as the dog left to find the friend who could climb. The last word was the word that Cochrane later used to translate the word "faith," for it means "to hear with understanding and act on it."

It is in this manner that we also are to keep Christ's word. We are to hear it and allow it to sink into our understanding.

Second, to keep Christ's word also means to commit oneself to Christ or to believe him. This is involved in the verse from John 5 also, for Jesus said, "I tell you the truth, anyone who hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life." To believe on Christ is not just to hear him in the sense that I have been explaining: to understand what he says and to acknowledge that what he says is true. This is good. We must do it. But it is not enough. Even the devils believe in this sense, for the Bible tells us that they believe and tremble. What is needed is a step beyond this—first to believe him and then to believe in the sense of actually committing oneself to him for salvation. To put this in the form of an illustration, we can say that it is the type of belief exercised by a girl who, in addition to believing the word of a young man, agrees to marry him.

Finally, to keep Christ's word obviously also means to obey him. Indeed, this is one of the primary meanings of the word "keep" in this sentence. The other related meaning is that of guarding a prisoner. So the whole idea is to keep Christ's word (and obey it) as carefully as one would guard a criminal entrusted to one's care. Do you keep Christ's word in that sense? Do you hear his word, believe him, and obey his instructions? If not, you need to stop here and examine your relationship to him. For it is to those who do that and only to them that the promise applies.

The Promise

This brings us to the promise itself—"he will never see death." What does this mean? It is obvious that it does not refer to physical death primarily. For Jesus himself died, and since that time all his followers have died. It is true that some may not see death even in this sense; for those who are living at the return of Christ will not die. Still, those are few in number compared with the many others and regardless of that number it is clear that Jesus is not talking primarily of physical death in this saying. Here again, the parallel verse in John 5 is a help to our understanding. There the phrase "will not see death" is paralleled by "has eternal life, and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life." In other words, the primary reference is to spiritual death, and the promise is that the one who keeps Christ's word will never experience that final death that is the result of God's judgment.

This becomes clearer when we recognize that death is separation. In physical death the soul and spirit are separated from the body. They go. The body remains behind. In spiritual death the soul and spirit are separated from God. It is the second that is most frightening.

But this is what Jesus removed for all who believe on him. Apart from his death, all would need to experience death in this sense. The Bible says, "The soul who sins is the one who will die" (Ezek. 18:4, 20). It says, "For the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). This death is separation from God. It is the direct and inevitable consequence of our sin. But when the Lord Jesus Christ took that separation for us during the hours of darkness when he hung on the cross, he removed this death forever for those who trust him. Now those who trust Christ do not live in fear of it. On the contrary, no longer facing death as separation from God, they sing with Paul, "Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" (1 Cor. 15:55).

Let us say, too, that the reality of escape from the second (or spiritual) death also transforms the way in which we look at the first (or physical) death. Why? For this reason: If the grave does not hold terror of judgment, of a judicial separation from God for eternity, then it holds the prospect of a full union with him. And this means that death is a gain, as Paul says in Philippians. To be absent from this life is to be present with God. Thus, although an actual physical death may be accompanied by pain, it always has overtones of glory and is a homecoming. As D. L. Moody died he said, "Is this death? This is not bad; there is no valley. This is bliss. This is glorious." Others have had a similar testimony. Because of Christ's death it is only the shadow of death, rather than the reality, that touches Christians.

Assurance

Finally, I want you to consider the assurance Jesus gives that his words can be trusted. He gives it at the beginning of the verse. The King James Version uses the words "verily, verily." In the Greek the words are "Amen, amen."

"Amen" is a word that is found in nearly every language of the world, one of the few in that category, though it comes from an original Hebrew verb meaning "to support with the arm" or "carry." In its intransitive form the verb meant "that which is supported" or "that which is shored up." Hence, it came to mean "firm" or "unshakable." The word occurs in this original sense in Isaiah 22:23 in reference to a firm place in a wall, where a nail can be driven.

In time, particularly in biblical language, "amen" took on two uses that have since become dominant. First, the word was used of God, as one of his attributes. This is not surprising, of course; for if the word means "that which is unshakable," the reference to God is quite natural.
Thus, we find God spoken of as the Amen, or, as some versions have it, as the God of truth. Isaiah quotes God as saying, in the context of a prophecy of judgment and of faithfulness toward his own, "Whoever invokes a blessing in the land will do so by the God of truth; he who takes an oath in the land will swear by the God of truth. For the past troubles will be forgotten and hidden from my eyes" (Isa. 65:16). Being the Amen, or being faithful, is one of God's great characteristics.

The second use of the word is most common. It is the use of the word by men to and women express agreement with what God is saying. Thus, when the law was read in formal convocation to Israel upon the sides of Mount Gerazim and Mount Ebal shortly after the conquest of Canaan, all the people, we are told, responded by saying, "Amen." Thus, too, do we end our prayers; for we thereby express agreement with what is said and reaffirm our faith in God's promises.

When we come to the use of "amen" in the New Testament, we find all these characteristics present, but we find something more. This something more is of great importance for Jesus' words in John. In the New Testament the word is found in 127 verses, in some of them more than once since Jesus frequently repeated the word in his use of it. In seventy-six of these, "amen" comes at the beginning of the sentence, and in each case—this is the new point—it is God who is speaking. In forty-eight other verses "amen" occurs at the end of the sentence, and in these cases man is speaking. This thought is tremendous, for it means that when God speaks, God prefaces his remarks with the affirmation that what he says is truthful. "I do solemnly affirm that what I am about to say is true," says God. After he says it his people then use the word as an echo ("Amen"), by which they mean, "We acknowledge and believe that God is faithful."

The truth of God is the foundation of all truth and of all life. The superstructure is our faith in his reliability. He says, "Amen." We echo,

"Amen, amen."

"I tell you the truth [the Greek words are literally, "Amen, amen"], everyone who sins is a slave to sin," Jesus says just a few verses earlier in the chapter (8:34). We hear his statement, and our hearts sadly echo, "Amen, amen. "Jesus says, "I tell you the truth [amen, amen], unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you" (6:53). We say, "Amen, amen." "I tell you the truth, I am the gate for the sheep" (10:7). "I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life" (5:24). "I tell you the truth, if anyone keeps my word, he will never see death" (8:51). To these great sayings our hearts echo, "Amen."

One final verse suggests the result of this great Amen that begins with God and is answered by our hearts. In Isaiah 28:16 there is a verse which says, "See, I lay a stone in Zion, a tested stone... the one who trusts will never be dismayed." The last phrase, "will never be dismayed," really means "will not be confused and thereby make run away." The promise is that the one who believes in Christ will not do this. You say, "But what does that have to do with the theme we are studying?" It has this to do with it: the word translated "trust" is actually the word "amen" in its verbal form. So God is actually saying that the one who puts his amen to God's declaration of truth will not fall into confusion and flight.

"Amen," says God, as he lays the foundation. "Amen," say his people, as we build upon him. This is the secret of assurance and confidence in all things of the Christian life, including the confrontation of death, the last enemy. "I tell you the truth, whoever keeps my word, he will never see death." Amen and amen.

Chapter 110.
Christ and Abraham

John 8:52-56

We are coming to the end of the conversation that took place between Jesus and the religious leaders of his day, as recorded in John 8. Consequently, we are coming to the end of a very important section of John's Gospel.

The early chapters of John (chapters 1-4) have served mainly to introduce the Lord Jesus Christ. In those chapters the reception of Jesus by the people of his day was for the most part favorable; at least, there was no hostile reaction. In the present section (chapters 5-8), this initially open reception turns to one of increasing hatred on the part of the leaders, as we have seen. Thus, these chapters begin with the controversy over the sabbath and end with the conversation, recorded in John 8, which we have been studying.

In this conversation the leaders have increasingly expressed their hostility toward Jesus. For his part, Jesus has been increasingly clear about their true ancestry. In both cases, the conversation has centered around the personality and example of Abraham, so much so, that Abraham is mentioned either by the religious leaders or by Jesus eleven times in the chapter. This is doubly remarkable in that he is mentioned nowhere else in John's Gospel.

The example of Abraham was originally raised in verse 33. The leaders had made a claim. They said, "We are Abraham's descendants," meaning that they based their confidence in the matter of salvation on their relationship to Abraham. God had promised to bless Abraham and his seed, and they were Abraham's seed physically. "Therefore," they reasoned, "we are blessed, and there is nothing for us to worry about." Against this kind of fallacious spiritual reasoning, Jesus went on to point out that what matters with God is not physical but spiritual descent. The question that he asked was, "Are you descended from Abraham spiritually? Do you do as Abraham did?"

This point is particularly prominent in the verses to which we come now. They thus especially lead us to consider Abraham's example.

Granted that physical descent is not the important thing! Granted that God is not impressed with family trees! But what is he impressed with? Or, to put it in better language, what did Abraham do that pleased God? On the basis of this and other passages we may answer: (1) Abraham put the calling of God above earthly honors; (2) Abraham believed God in spite of circumstances; and (3) Abraham placed his ultimate hope in the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and he rejoiced in his coming.

The Calling of God

First of all, then, Abraham put the calling of God above earthly honors. There were honors to be obtained in this life, for Abraham was rich and undoubtedly prominent, first, in Ur of the Chaldees and, second, in Haran. But these did not detain him. When God called he immediately left the past behind and set out for the land God was showing him.

The story is told in the twelfth chapter of Genesis in these words: "The LORD had said to Abram, 'Leave your country, your people and your father's household and go to the land I will show you. I will make you into a great nation and I will bless you; I will make your name great, and you will be a blessing. I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse; and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you.'" (Gen. 12:1-4).

This is very appropriate to the theme of John 8, as also to the bigger problem of why so many people are unwilling to accept Jesus Christ as their Savior. Here were prominent religious figures who were anxious to retain their own honor. And here was Jesus, who was honored by God in such a way that their little earthly honors seemed tawdry by comparison. They had honor, but he spoke the truth. They had power, but he was able to make the blind see and the lame walk.

Moreover, he honored God by knowing and obeying him (v. 55).

"Who do you think you are?" they asked. The question must have been asked in an insulting way, for they were implying that he wrongly was making himself greater than Abraham, their patriarch, or the prophets who had followed him.

Jesus replied, "If I glorify myself, my glory is nothing. My Father, whom you claim as your God, is the one who glorifies me. Though you do not know him, I know him. If I said I did not, I would be a liar like you, but I do know him and keep his word" (vv. 54-55).

These men were concerned with earthly honors. So against this background Abraham becomes an example of a man who sought the honor that comes from God only. How wise this is! All true honor must come from God; all other honor is meaningless and passing. On this point Barclay writes perceptively, "It is not difficult to honor oneself. One can quite easily surround oneself with a kind of synthetic halo. It is easy enough—in fact, it is fatally easy—to bask in the sunshine of one's own approval. It is not overly difficult to win honor from men. The world honors the successful and the ambitious man. But the real honor is the honor which only eternity can reveal; and the verdicts of eternity are not the verdicts of time."

How does this apply to us? In this way. When a Christian sets out to follow the call of God in his life, as Abraham did, he will certainly hear discouraging words from the world. "What do you want to do that for?" he will be asked. "Don't you know that you might have to become a missionary? Think of all the good times you'll have to give up. Don't you know that you will never get ahead in this life like that?" The comments are endless. But the Christian must simply say, "That may be true or not. I do not know. What I do know is that I have determined to place the calling of God above earthly honors."

This was the example of Abraham. For this he was commended by God. "By faith Abraham, when called to go to a place he would later receive as his inheritance, obeyed and went, even though he did not know where he was going. By faith he made his home in the promised land like a stranger in a foreign country; he lived in tents, as did Isaac and Jacob, who were heirs with him of the same promise. For he was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:8-10).

Faith over Circumstances

Second, Abraham believed God in spite of circumstances, and they were difficult circumstances too. For one thing, there were famines in Abraham's new land. The Bible says that one famine was "grievous." At this point Abraham did not do so well, for he left the land of promise to go to Egypt. But he gradually learned to trust God through such experiences. There were also family problems in one of which Lot, his nephew, separated from Abraham and took all the good land for himself. Abraham remained in the less attractive, mountainous region, but he kept closer to God. There was constant danger from marauding desert bands. On one occasion four of these combined to attack the cities of the valley of Sodom and succeeded in carrying off Lot and his family. Abraham pursued these kings and recovered both the family and the spoils. In all these trials Abraham's faith grew in spite of circumstances.

By far the greatest trial of Abraham's faith, and the one in which his faith shines brightest at this period, was God's challenge to him to believe that he could give him a son. At first this did not seem to be a promise calling for great faith, for Abraham expected to have children. But as the years went by and the child did not come, it became increasingly problematic. There was the problem of succession, of course. Who was to inherit Abraham's great wealth? For a time Abraham thought that his fortune would go to his steward, Eliezer of Damascus; but God showed him that Eliezer was not to be the one. For a time Abraham's faith slipped and he began to place his hope in Ishmael, a son he had engendered through a concubine when he was eighty-six years old. He even prayed that God would accept Ishmael as the heir—"If only Ishmael might live under your blessing." But God replied that it was not to be Ishmael. The son in whom the promise was to come would be born of the aged patriarch and Sarah.

Finally, Abraham reached the age of ninety-nine, Sarah being about ninety, and by this time the promise that they could have a child seemed preposterous. Still there was the promise. God had promised. Abraham believed God. God changed his name from Abram (which means "father of many") to Abraham (which means "father of a great multitude"). Within a year after he had done this, Isaac, the son of the promise and an ancestor of the Lord Jesus Christ, was born miraculously.

The Bible speaks of Abraham's example at this point when it says, "Without weakening in his faith, he faced the fact that his body was as good as dead—since he was about a hundred years old—and that Sarah's womb was also dead. Yet he did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God, but was strengthened in his faith and gave glory to God, being fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised" (Rom. 4:19-21).

If you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, you and I share faith in a sovereign God. He is in control of all things. He could make your circumstances more pleasing if he thought it best. He can remove barriers. He can eliminate difficulties. If he does not do this, however, then he acts as he does for a purpose; and you should trust him. One of those purposes is undoubtedly to teach you to trust him, which you would not do at all if everything that ever came into your life was pleasant and the journey of life was always easy.

Christ's Day

Finally, Abraham placed his hope in the coming of Jesus Christ and rejoiced in that coming. Jesus indicates this when he says, "Your father Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad" (v. 56).

I must admit that this is a difficult verse to understand and that there have been many ways of interpreting it. One popular way is to suppose that Jesus merely meant that Abraham was living in paradise at the time and that he rejoiced in Christ's ministry. The difficulty with this view is that the subject of dispute is not Abraham's continued consciousness beyond the grave but rather Christ's preexistence. The next verses say, "Before Abraham was born, I am." Besides, if Christ had wanted to say that Abraham was still living and rejoiced in his birth and ministry, it would have been far more natural for him to have used present tenses for the verbs ("Abraham is rejoicing to see my day; and he sees it, and is glad"). It seems proper, then, to refer the saying to something that happened to Abraham back in Abraham's day rather than to something contemporary with Christ's ministry.

To place the vision back in Abraham's own time does not in itself solve the problem, however.
For most of the rabbis did this—that is, spoke of a vision of the Messiah that Abraham was supposed to have had—and yet disagreed on how it happened. Some of them began with the initial promise of God to Abraham as recorded in Genesis 12:3. This said, "All peoples of the earth will be blessed through you." They taught that when this was given, Abraham knew that it referred to the coming of the Messiah and so rejoiced in God's promise.

Another view began with the vision of the future history of Israel recorded in Genesis 15:8-12, supposed to have been extended to include the coming of the Messiah. Two further views were based on misinterpretations of Scripture. One interpreted the laughter of Genesis 17:17, when God promised the son to the aged Abraham and Sarah, not as an expression of incredulity but as happiness that the birth of Isaac would lead on to the birth of Israel's deliverer. The other used a literal reading of Genesis 24:1—"Abraham was... well advanced in years," literally, "gone into the days"—to suggest that he saw into the future. These views seem strange to us, as indeed they should. They are hardly convincing, as Leon Morris, who records much of this material in his commentary on John, acknowledges.

Is this all, however? Can no more be said? I believe that more can be said; for the occasion of the vision of Abraham of Christ's day is to be found, I feel, in the story of the near sacrifice of Isaac on Mount Moriah in which Abraham learned in a new way that "the Lord will provide." God came to Abraham and told him to take his son, the heir of the promise, and sacrifice him on a mountain three day's journey away. It must have been a terrible struggle for the old man that evening as he wrestled with God's command, but sometime during the night he hit upon the solution. He knew that he must obey God, however wrong it seemed, but he also knew that God was a God of his word and that he had committed himself to produce a great nation through Isaac. Isaac had no children at this point. So if God was telling Abraham to kill Isaac, then the God who had done a miracle in Isaac's birth was just going to have to do a miracle in his death. In other words, there was going to have to be a resurrection.

This sounds novel, of course, for not many persons are used to hearing the story taught in this way. Yet it is biblical teaching, for the story indicates that Abraham fully expected to bring Isaac back down the mountain with him after the sacrifice (Gen. 22:5). Moreover, the author of Hebrews states explicitly, "By faith Abraham, when God tested him, offered Isaac as a sacrifice. He who had received the promises was about to sacrifice his one and only son, even though God had said to him, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead, and figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death" (Heb. 11:17-19). Abraham believed that God was going to do a miracle in bringing Isaac back from the dead —precisely the miracle that God the Father did with Jesus Christ the Son, as the special language of those verses from Hebrews indicates.

But even this is not all. For when the trial was over and God had intervened to save Isaac and provided a ram for the sacrifice in place of the boy, Abraham rejoiced and called the name of the place Jehovah Jireh, which means "the Lord will provide" (Gen. 22:14). Earlier, as they had gone up the mountain and Abraham had said this to the servants, it could have meant "the Lord will provide a resurrection of Isaac." Now it could only mean that the same God who provided a ram in substitution for the death of Isaac would one day provide his own Son as the perfect substitute and sacrifice for our salvation.

At this moment, I believe, Abraham saw the coming of Jesus clearly, including the meaning of his death and resurrection, and he rejoiced in that coming.

An Example

Abraham can be an example for you, just as any godly person can be an example. So the question is: Do you do as Abraham did? More specifically: (1) Do you put the calling of God above earthly honors? (2) Do you believe God in spite of circumstances? (3) Do you place your hope in the fact that Jesus came to earth to die for you and rejoice in that coming? No physical relationship to Abraham or to any other godly person will save you, but you will be saved if you do as Abraham did. The God of Abraham should become your God.

Chapter 111.
Is Jesus God?

John 8:57-59

Several years ago I heard a psychiatrist, who was also an existentialist, say, "There are only two great questions in this world: Who am I? and, Where am I going?" I heard the statement and agreed in part that these are great questions. But though I agreed in part, it was only in part. For, although these are great questions, they are not the greatest questions that should be asked and for which we should seek answers. One greater question forms the title of this study: Who is Jesus Christ? Is Jesus Christ God? On the answer to that question hangs our destiny.

A Timely Issue

Who is Jesus Christ? This is the question of questions in John's Gospel. Indeed, as we have seen, the Gospel was written almost entirely to provide an answer to it. The Gospel begins with a full statement of Christ's divinity—"In the beginning was the Word [that is, Jesus], and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (1:1). It ends with the statement, "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:30-31). In between these verses much evidence is given in support of Christ's claim.

What is the issue in this central portion of John's Gospel? Is the issue the distinct nature of his teachings? Is it the sabbath question itself? Is it Christ's good deeds or lack of them? It is none of these things. Rather, the issue is: Who is Jesus Christ? Is Jesus God?

Is Jesus God? If he is not, then let us say so—but only after having considered the evidence. If he is God, then he has a right to our allegiance and loyalty. We must follow him. You cannot honestly be indifferent to Jesus Christ. He did not leave you that option. Thus, you must either follow him as your God and Lord, or you must seek to eradicate his presence from your life, as the religious leaders of his day did. Which will it be? This is the great question of John. It is the great question raised by Christianity. It is a question for you. Will it be Christ, God in the flesh? Or will you be your own "God"? It must be Christ if he is who he declared himself to be.

Christ's Claim

The verse that we are going to study is one in which Jesus claimed to be God explicitly. He was not always so explicit; but he was in this case, and this produced startling consequences. The leaders of the people had been challenging everything he said, and they had just challenged his statement that Abraham had rejoiced to see his day and that he saw it and was glad. They said, "You are not yet fifty years old, and you have seen Abraham?"

He replied, using his most solemn form of introducing a saying, "I tell you the truth, before Abraham was born, I am" (vv. 57-58). This so infuriated them that they immediately took up stones to stone him.

To our way of thinking, at least at first sight, it is a bit hard to see why this particular saying would have provoked such a radical response. Stoning was the penalty for blasphemy, for making oneself out to be God. So this is what they understood him to be doing. But how does one get that from these words? And in what sense was he saying it? It is obvious from the saying itself that Jesus was claiming to have existed before Abraham was born. It also is obvious from the tense of the verb —"Before Abraham was born, I am"—that he was claiming an eternal preexistence. But this alone, we might think, would not be sufficient cause for stoning. The real reason for their violent reaction is found in the fact that when Jesus said, "I am," he actually was using the divine name by which God had revealed himself to Moses at the burning bush. When Moses had asked, "Suppose I go to the Israelites and say to them, 'The God of your fathers has sent me to you,' and they ask me, 'What is his name?' Then what shall I tell them?" God said to Moses, "I am who I am. This is what you are to say to the Israelites: 'I AM has sent me to you'" (Exod. 3:13-14). In Hebrew this is the word "Jehovah," and it is this word that Jesus so easily takes to himself in this saying. He claimed to be Jehovah, using the very word "Jehovah." So it was because of this that the Jews, who immediately recognized his claim for what it was, reached out to kill him.

Many Claims

We have said that this was an unusually direct and overpowering claim, and it was. But we must not overlook the fact that it was only one of many claims both direct and indirect by which Jesus declared himself to be God's equal.

Practically everything that Jesus had to say was an indirect claim to divinity. His first preaching is an example. When John the Baptist had come preaching the imminent arrival of God's kingdom, he pointed to One who would himself embody that kingdom. Jesus came, and Jesus' first preaching was the announcement of the kingdom's arrival: "The time has come, ...the kingdom of God is near. Repent and believe the good news!" (Mark 1:15). Later, speaking of himself, he said to the Pharisees, "The kingdom of God is within you" (Luke 17:21). This was a claim that the prophecies of the Old Testament were about him and were fulfilled in him.

All Christ's words about the Old Testament fall into this category also, for the summation of his teaching was, "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17). When he invited people to follow him —"Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men" (Matt 4:19)—he implied that he was of sufficient stature to be worth following. When he forgave sins, he did it knowing that he was doing what only God can do. Toward the end of his life he promised to send God's Holy Spirit to be with the disciples after his departure, which again implies divinity.

Remarkable among his claims was his unique reference to God as his Father. This was by no means a common form of expression in Judaism, as it is in the English language. No Jew ever spoke of God directly as "my Father." Yet, not only was this the form of address that Jesus used, particularly in his prayers, it was also his only mode of addressing God and it referred to his relationship to the Father exclusively. Jesus said, "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30). He said, "Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you. ...Righteous Father, though the world does not know you; I know you" (17:1, 25).

Eventually Jesus taught his disciples to address God as Father also, as a result of their relationship to himself. But even in this case his relationship to God as Father and their relationship to God as Father were different. Thus, he spoke to Mary Magdalene, saying, "Go to my brothers and tell them I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God" (20:17). He did not say "to our Father" or "to our God."

"So close was His connection with God," writes John Stott, "that he equated a man's attitude to himself with his attitude to God. Thus, to know Him was to know God (John 8:19; 14:17); to see Him was to see God (John 12:45; 14:9); to believe in Him was to believe in God (John 12:44; 14:1); to receive Him was to receive God (Mark 9:37); to hate Him was to hate God (John 15:23); and to honor Him was to honor God (John 5:23)."

Jesus' "I am" sayings are worthy of special notice also, for he claimed to be all that men need for a full spiritual life. Only God can rightly make such claims. "I am the bread of life" (6:35). "I am the light of the world"

(8:12; 9:5). "I am the gate" (10:7, 9). "I am the good shepherd" (10:11, 14). "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25). "I am the way and the truth and the life" (14:6). "I am the true vine" (15:1, 5).

One great and final example of Christ's unique conception of himself occurred shortly after the resurrection on the day Jesus appeared among the disciples, Thomas being present. Jesus had appeared to the disciples earlier when Thomas was absent. But when Thomas was told about the appearance, he had replied, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it" (20:25). Now the Lord appeared to them all once more, this time including Thomas, and he asked Thomas to make the test he had wanted to make: "Put your finger here ... and reach out your hand" (v. 27). Thomas, who was overcome by Christ's presence, immediately fell to the ground and worshiped him saying, "My Lord and my God" (v. 28). Think of it: "Lord and God!" Adona! Elohim! Jehovah! And Jesus accepted the designation! He did not deny it! It is no wonder, in light of this testimony, that this is the story John chooses to end all but the postscript of his Gospel.

These, then, are a few of Christ's claims. Thus, whatever we may think of the claims themselves, there can at least be no doubt that Christ made them. Moreover, they remain unchanged. History has not eradicated Christ's claim to be God. Time has not changed it. The Jesus who made the claim then is the same Jesus who is our living contemporary, and the Scriptures tell us that he is the same "yesterday and today and forever." He calls on you to follow him. Will you do it, forsaking all else? If he is not God, then you can safely ignore him. But if he is God, then anything less than a total surrender to him is folly and any other loyalty is idolatrous.

The Rock of Ages

There are three parts to the verses we are considering. The first is the claim of Christ, ("Before Abraham was born, I am"). This has taken most of our space and is important, but the others deserve space also. The second is the reaction of the leaders to that claim ("At this, they picked up stones to stone him"). The third is the sad result ("Jesus hid himself, slipping away from the temple guards").

Stoning can mean different things, all the way from simple displeasure to the desire to have someone killed. As such it can stand for any degree of reaction to Christ by men and women who reject him. I remember, years ago when I was in Jordan and was trying to take a picture of a man who was winnowing grain, how the man picked up stones to stone me. He was not trying to kill me. But he did not like me to be trying to take his picture. He was showing displeasure in that way. Sometimes, as in the case of beggars or animals, stoning was used to drive a person or an animal away. At other times, as in this story, it was used as a means of execution. To put it in contemporary terms, then, some merely express displeasure at Jesus while others (expressing the same basic reaction) try to eliminate his presence from their lives.

The strange thing about this is its folly. For Jesus Christ cannot be so easily gotten rid of. If he is God, he is eternal. He is the Ancient of Days. How can one eliminate the Ancient of Days from one's days? He is the Lord of life. How can one exclude the Lord of life from one's life? Imagine trying to dislodge the Rock of Ages with a handful of stones!

The Lord Jesus Christ is the Rock of Ages yet, and you will not get rid of him by throwing things at him. He is inescapable. He is planted in life. Thus, you must either come to terms with him now, or you must do so on the day of judgment. You have one of two choices. You may destroy yourself by pounding yourself against him, just as you can destroy a piece of wood by pounding it upon an anvil. Or you may build upon him. Why not build upon him? The Rock of Ages makes a great foundation. Jesus said that the one who builds upon him will be like a house founded upon a rock upon which the rains descended and the floods came but which fell not. Why not try him? Why not put him to the test?

Jesus Hid Himself

Finally, the verses also indicate the sad result of the action of those who try to get rid of him. We read, "Jesus hid himself, slipping away from the temple guards" (v. 59). These are sad words, and they are doubly sad because in closing this section of the Gospel they have the added effect of permanence.

What does it mean when we are told that Jesus hid himself? First, it means that although these men could not harm Jesus, nevertheless, they could not benefit from him either. It will be the same for you if you try to keep him out of your life. If you do not allow Jesus to be God in your life, you will not harm him. You cannot harm the invincible and omnipotent God. But you will not benefit from him either. The Lord Jesus Christ came to bring those divine benefits to you. He is the life. He came to give you life, abundant life. He is the light. He wants to shine upon you, to illuminate your darkness and guide you. He is the bread upon whom you may feed and grow. He is the living water who can quench your spiritual thirst. You forfeit these benefits if you refuse him his rightful place in your life.

Second, the verse tells us that there are some from whom Jesus does slip away or "pass by" as the King James Version states it. We live in a day when men and women are won over to egotickling dogmas of universalism, the idea that all will be saved. But there is nothing in the Word of God to justify that conclusion. You say, "But why doesn't God save all men?" I don't know, but he doesn't. And here is a case. Notice that throughout this entire conversation Jesus has not even been trying to convert these religious leaders. He has merely been exposing their sin. Moreover, we are told that Jesus eventually passed by and went his way. There are some people whom God gives up (Rom. 1:24, 26, 28). God gives up nations, if they will not live by righteous standards. God gives up churches, when they depart from their first love. God gives up individuals. Woe be to the person whom the Lord Jesus Christ passes by!

Finally, the verse leads us to see that there are some whom God saves anyway. I say "anyway" because I recognize that all of us, even those who become Christians, deserve to be passed by.

Notice this. In the King James text of John 8, the last words are "passed by." It is a tragic note, a tragic end to the contacts of Christ with these religious leaders. But in the opening verse of the very next chapter, just four and five words later, the words occur again in a story that tells us that "as Jesus passed by, he saw a man who was blind from his birth" and saved him. Here was a man who in his blindness could not even see the Lord Jesus. Yet Jesus saw him and gave him both physical and spiritual sight. He could not seek Christ, yet he was found by him. How wonderful! What a great hope for the sinner! "Jesus passed by." Yes. But "as he passed by" he saw this one and saved him. With people such as these he began to build his church. Are you such a one? Why should you not be? Why should you not be one who finds Jesus?

The Gospel of John, Volume 3

Those Who Received Him (John 9-12)

by

James Montgomery Boice

© 1985, 1999 by James Montgomery Boice. Database © 2007 WORD*search* Bible Corp.

To him who came to call not the righteous but sinners to repentance

Preface

It has been more than thirty years since I began to study the Gospel of John in a serious way and nearly twenty-five years since my studies of the Gospel began to appear in print. They have been out of print for some time. So it was with much gratitude that I learned of Baker's interest in reissuing them in this revised and attractive version. This version matches the format of the other sets that Baker has published: Genesis (3 volumes), Psalms (3 volumes) and Romans (4 volumes). It also matches the single volume studies of Acts and Ephesians.

This is the third volume of a five part work. The first volume dealt with Jesus' coming into the world and the reactions of a few representative persons to him. It covered chapters 1-4. The second volume dealt with the origins of the hostility to Jesus that began to develop among the religious authorities early in his ministry. It covered chapters 5-8. This volume covers chapters 912 in which Jesus turns to those whom the Father has given him out of the world and begins to teach them.

Volumes 4 and 5 complete the series. Volume 4 (chapters 13-17) is concerned with Jesus' final private teaching of his disciples, usually called the final discourses, and with his powerful highpriestly prayer recorded in chapter 17. Volume 5 deals with the culmination of Christ's earthly ministry, centering in his betrayal by Judas, his arrest, his trial by the Jewish and Roman authorities, his death, and his resurrection (chapters 18-21).

As with previous volumes, I have occasionally deviated from a strict verse-by-verse exposition to deal with a particularly important theme in greater depth than would be possible by the verseby-verse method. The clearest example is the study of John 11:35, the shortest verse in the Bible ("Jesus wept"), to which I have devoted four studies. I have also devoted six studies each to the themes of the Good Shepherd (John 10:1-21) and suffering and death (John 11:4-26). In earlier volumes extensive study was given to the themes of baptism, witnessing, the Sabbath, and the authority of the Scriptures. Echoes of three of those subjects—witnessing, the Sabbath, and the Scriptures—occur at appropriate places in volume 3.

Some of this material has already appeared in print, although with limited circulation. The most widely circulated piece was the message on "How to Save Your Own Life" (John 12:24-26), which was printed in the Christian Observer, a paper which has since gone out of business. Material from chapter 20 ("Word of the Living God," John 10:35) appeared long ago in a small pamphlet by the same title. Several of the messages on suffering were published in a special premium booklet offered to listeners to the Bible Study Hour during the spring of 1976. The Bible Study Hours regular publication, originally called Bible Studies Magazine (now God's Word Today), circulated each of these studies as they were aired.

It is impossible adequately to express a debt to all, both living and dead, who have been a help to me in my preparation of these studies. The footnotes will reflect my strong debt to Charles Spurgeon, Arthur Pink, Donald Barnhouse, and Alexander Maclaren, but dozens of other commentators were regularly consulted. I still believe that Leon Morris's volume, The Gospel According to John, is the best of all recent commentaries. As with most of my books, Miss Caecilie Foelster, my secretary, joined me in careful editing of the manuscript and in seeing it through the stages of its original production. I owe a debt as well to the Session and congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church who encourage me to spend much of my time in such serious Bible study and writing.

To God be all glory, for this and all other spiritual endeavors by his elect people. Amen and amen.

James Montgomery

Boice

Philadelphia,
Pennsylvania

Chapter 112.
Christ and a Man Born Blind

John 9:1

There are verses in the opening chapter of John's Gospel that provide an outline for the first twelve chapters of the book and are, therefore, important at this point as our study of the Gospel enters upon a new section. These verses speak of the coming of the Light into the world and say of that Light, "He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him. Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (1:11-12). The coming of the Light aptly describes the content of the first four chapters of John's Gospel. That "he came to that which was his own" describes the content of the next four chapters. The chapters we are about to study, chapters 9 through 12, deal with "all who received him," for in these chapters we see that the emphasis is on Jesus calling out a people of his own in the midst of, and in spite of, growing hostility from the authorities of Judaism. This new section differs from the one before it in that in the old section we see Christ being rejected by his own people, while in this section Christ, being rejected by his people, begins to call out a new people. This is first exemplified by the story of the call of Jesus to the man who had been born blind.

"I Am the Light"

The contrast between these two sections—section two (composed of chapters 5 through 8) and section three (chapters 9 through 12)—may be pointed up in another way also. In chapters 8 and 9 there is an "I am" saying of Jesus that is repeated twice, once in each chapter. The saying is the same—"I am the light of the world"—but the contexts are different; this is illustrative of the difference between the two sections.

In John 8 Jesus' saying occurs in the twelfth verse, just after he had dealt with the accusers of the woman who had been taken in adultery. It refers to the effect of his testimony upon these men. They had come to Jesus after having just trapped the poor woman. They said, "In the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?" (v. 5). They were not interested in the law. They were only figuring that if Jesus consented to the requirement of the law and had the woman stoned, then they could ridicule him as the One who invited sinners to come to him but then dealt harshly with them. On the other hand, they reasoned, if he overlooked the law and gave a judgment of mercy, then they could say, "What kind of a prophet is this who advises laying aside the law of Moses? "Jesus dealt with these men by suggesting that the one who was sinless cast the first stone. At this point, as the light of his righteousness shone upon them, the accusers began to slip away one by one, beginning with the eldest. At last Jesus, being left alone in the midst of the crowd with the woman, uttered his saying.

What did he mean when on this occasion he said, "I am the light of the world"? To have an answer we need only think of the effect of light on something that has been shielded from light a long time. Imagine a board out in a field. Kick it over and immediately all the bugs and other squirmy things begin to slither away into dark areas. This is what happened when Jesus spoke to these leaders. Jesus turned over a board, and away went those Pharisees! They could not stand before the light, and they hated Jesus for it. It is not surprising, therefore, that the chapter ends with an attempt by these men to stone Jesus.

On the other hand, light also has another and entirely different effect upon some things that are exposed to it. Take the ground that was covered over by the board. When the board is first turned over the bugs run for cover. But leave the board off that patch of ground for awhile, and soon the same sun that made the bugs run for cover will begin to make the seeds in the ground grow. In a short time that patch of earth will be covered with grass or flowers, just like the growth in the field that surrounds it. This latter effect gives us the meaning of Christ's second "I am the light of the world," in John 9. In chapter 8 the Light made the creatures of darkness run. In chapter 9 the Light begins to call forth life and produce growth in those within whom God has planted the seed of saving faith. In this sense John 9 is the story of the sovereign and electing grace of God in salvation.

Arthur W. Pink, a valuable commentator on this Gospel, captures the differences between chapters 8 and 9 (hence also between sections two and three) in this manner: "In John 8 we behold Christ as 'the light' exposing the darkness, but in John 9 He communicates sight. In John 8 the Light is despised and rejected, in John 9 He is received and worshipped. In John 8 the Jews are seen stooping down—to pick up stones; in John 9 Christ is seen stooping down—to make anointing clay. In John 8 Christ hides Himself from the Jews; in John 9 He reveals Himself to the blind beggar. In John 8 we have a company in whom the Word has no place (v. 37); in John 9 is one who responds promptly to the Word (v. 7). In John 8 Christ, inside the Temple, is called a demoniac (v. 48); in John 9, outside the Temple, He is owned as Lord (v. 36). The central truth of John 8 is the Light testing human responsibility; in John 9 the central truth is God acting in sovereign grace after human responsibility has failed."

No Frustration

If this is the true contrast between these two sections, as there is every reason to believe, then the first and great lesson to be learned from chapter 9 is that man cannot frustrate God. Man's hatred cannot frustrate God. Man's sin cannot frustrate God. Rather, God accomplishes his purposes sovereignly, saving by grace those whom he chooses to call to himself.

The fact that man's hatred cannot frustrate God is seen clearly from the story and in particular from the fact that Jesus was not disturbed by the action of the religious leaders in their attempt to stone him. The stoning attempt was a serious incident. It would have created a great turmoil in the temple precincts. Nevertheless, a moment later, after Jesus had removed himself probably little more than a good stone's throw away, we find him stopping to fix his eyes on the blind beggar who had been sitting near the temple gate. Most of us in a similar situation would scarcely have had eyes for the beggar. We would be looking over our shoulder to see if we were being pursued, and we would be trying to put an even greater distance between ourselves and our enemies. Not Jesus! No doubt he felt the contradiction of sinners against himself. He even wept over Jerusalem at one point in his ministry. But this did not disturb him where his work was concerned. So we find him calm and self-possessed, acting with a profound disregard of his enemies and their hatred.

Jesus was not deterred from his work either, which we might well have been had we been in his place. He was the light of the world. He had just been rejected. Would it not have been reasonable for him to have returned at once to heaven, thereby turning his back on our sinful world? Would it not have been reasonable for him to have abandoned our race? Nothing is more reasonable from a human point of view. But Jesus had God's point of view, and it was God who was acting. Therefore, instead of accepting the no of sinful men, Christ simply persevered in his task and began to elect some to salvation. The Bible says, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion" (Rom. 9:15).

This verse tells us about the God whom we serve, and we should know that nothing frustrates him. What do you think God is doing in heaven anyway? To hear some people talk you would think he is cowering behind a cloud somewhere, afraid of every new evil that man's rebellion might bring. At the height of the Watergate scandal, with its long series of damaging revelations, a cartoon appeared in which a man and a woman were cowering behind a chair that, in its turn, was facing a television set. They were holding onto each other and were shaking with fear as the newscaster said, "And now for the latest stunning development...." We must not think that God is like that. Some people picture God as surprised when Adam sinned. God had created a perfect world. Adam spoiled it. So God is imagined to have said to himself, "Oh, my, the man and the woman sinned. They fell. Whatever will I do now?" Eventually God decides that he will send Jesus, but when Jesus is rejected he is puzzled again. God is not like that. That is not our God. Our God sees the end from the beginning and is not frustrated. Therefore, nothing defeats or will ever defeat his purposes.

Jesus said, "I will build my church." This is his purpose in this age, and he is building it. Therefore, all who are given to Jesus Christ by the Father will come to him.

We may make an important conclusion at this point, and the conclusion is this: If God's purposes cannot be frustrated—and they cannot be—then if we make God's purposes our purposes, we will not be frustrated either. Do you find life frustrating? Does it get you down? Do you seem to be getting nowhere? If so, make God's purposes your own, and you will find that frustration will disappear and life will receive new meaning. If you are working for God, then your work will bear fruit and Jesus Christ will be glorified.

The State of the Lost

We have seen that the hatred of man cannot frustrate God. We also need to see that the state of the lost cannot frustrate God either. Once again, this is made clear by our story.

Think for a moment of this poor blind man, and think of all he symbolizes. He symbolizes the state of the lost apart from the creative and transforming power of the Lord Jesus. On the one hand, we have the rulers of the people, the Pharisees, who can see physically but who are spiritually blind. On the other hand, there is the blind man. He cannot see physically, but Christ makes him see both physically and spiritually. By the end of the story we find him worshiping Jesus as the Son of God and the Lord.

What is the state of this man? For one thing, he cannot see, and this means that he cannot see Jesus. This is the state of the lost today. Jesus is preached, but they cannot see him. The gospel is explained, but they cannot understand it. Indeed, the Bible says that "the man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). If there is to be spiritual sight, Jesus must first open blind eyes.

Second, because the man who had been born blind was unable to see, it was also true that he could not seek Jesus. Indeed, how can a blind man seek anything? In spiritual terms this means that a man is unable to seek God, which truth God tells us. For he flatly declares that "there is no one who... seeks God" (Rom. 3:11).

Third, if the blind man was unable to seek Jesus, it is also true that he was unable to find him. What is more, since he was a beggar, it is also obvious that he was unable to hire someone else to seek Christ and find him either. What a condition—unable to see, seek, or find Jesus, and unable to procure help in finding him. It is a sad state, but it is doubly sad in that it describes the condition of all men spiritually.

Have you ever noticed that all the miracles of healing in John's Gospel illustrate the truths of this story? Each one shows man to be helpless in his sin, but each also shows the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ triumphant. The first miracle is the healing of the impotent man, recorded in John 5. What is the point of this story? Why did John include it? Obviously, John included this healing to make the point that the man was unable to make the first move toward Jesus. Nor can we. If we are to be saved, Jesus must make the first move toward us and even give strength to respond to him. The story of the man born blind is saying the same thing in other ways, making the point that sinful men cannot see God's truth. But again Jesus makes the first step by restoring sight. Finally, a few chapters further on, we come upon the case of Lazarus, who had been dead four days before Christ came to him. He was utterly lost. Lazarus could not even call out to Jesus to say, "Master, help me." He was dead. But Jesus called him—"Lazarus, come forth"—and the call of the Lord of life gave life to Lazarus.

This is the gospel. It is the truth of God concerning the hopeless state of the lost and of the power of God to save such as he wills to save. God's purposes are not frustrated by either the hatred of men or the sin of the lost.

Sinner, Take Heart

Let me apply these truths in this way. First, if you are a Christian and have been witnessing to another person concerning Christ, you can be encouraged by knowing that God will never be frustrated by human sin. There may be much in the situation to frustrate you. You may seem to get nowhere. In fact, in a given witnessing situation there may be more to frustrate you than in any other situation in life. Still, God is not frustrated, and you should not be either. Instead, you should be encouraged by knowing that if God is working, nothing will hinder that working. If the light of God is shining, his light will make seeds grow. So, be bold! Witness boldly, and expect God to bring forth his harvest!

Second, if you are one who has not yet believed in the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior, you too can take heart by seeing what he did in the life of the man who had been born blind. Think of what Jesus Christ did for him. For one thing, the story tells us that he saw him, that is, that he took notice of him. The blind man could not see Jesus, but Jesus saw the blind man; and that was the important thing after all. Moreover, when he saw him he saw him as a man who needed his help. Jesus alone saw him in this way. The disciples looked at the man and saw him as a sinner.

"Who sinned," they asked, "this man or his parents?" The passersby looked at him as a beggar. "Isn't he the man who sat and begged?" The Pharisees saw him as a tool, for they wanted to maneuver him to trap

Jesus. But Jesus—well, Jesus saw him as a man who needed help, and he saved him.

Moreover, Jesus took him in when all others had cast him out. His family had cast him out. His neighbors had no use for him. Even his pastors rejected him. Eventually, because of the excommunication, the nation had no room for him either. No family, neighbors, pastors, nation! Who was left? Only Jesus! It was Jesus who sought him out and received him when no one else would receive him or even rejoice in his healing.

Are you one whom this world has cast out? Do you feel alone and rejected? Come to Jesus! Jesus is the One who is altogether lovely. Let Jesus be yours. Say, "O Lord Jesus, I want you to be my Savior."

Chapter 113.
The Problem of Pain

John 9:2-3

If God were good, he would wish to make his creatures perfectly happy, and if God were almighty he would be able to do what he wished. But the creatures are not happy. Therefore God lacks either goodness, or power, or both." This, as C. S. Lewis states in his small book, The Problem of Pain, is the problem of human suffering in its simplest form. And it must be admitted that if the Bible does not throw additional light upon this problem—if it does not reveal more about the nature and purposes of God than this statement of the problem leads us to see—then the problem is insoluable and life lacks meaning.

All Suffer

At some time or other every human being must experience suffering. A person causes pain by being born. Many live by inflicting pain. Most suffer pain. Eventually all experience death. It is true that believers who are alive at the time of Christ's return to this earth will be transformed in a moment and will not die. But with this exception, it is the lot of all to suffer and die. Eliphaz spoke truthfully to Job when he told the suffering patriarch, "For hardship does not spring from the soil, nor does trouble sprout from the ground. Yet man is born to trouble as surely as sparks fly upward" (Job 5:6-7).

There is a distinction to be made even at this point, however. For while it is true that all suffer, Christians as well as non-Christians, it is nevertheless not true that all suffering is alike. Seen from the outside, a Christian suffering from an incurable disease and a non-Christian suffering from the same disease may be supposed to be undergoing the same experience. But, according to the plain teachings of the Word of God, the two are not equal. From God's point of view the nonChristian is suffering without purpose. Or, which may sometimes be the case, he is suffering at the whim of Satan, who is merely doing as he pleases with a member of his own kingdom. In the case of the Christian, an all-wise heavenly Father is permitting suffering in a carefully controlled situation in order that he might accomplish a desirable purpose. The Book of Job alone teaches us about the latter.

But if suffering—that endured by a Christian—has purpose, surely we are not out of line in asking what that purpose is. If we are to learn from it, we must ask what it is we are to learn; if we are to profit, we must ask how. The answers to these questions are suggested to us by some of Christ's words uttered on the occasion of his healing of the blind man, recorded in John 9.

False Assumptions

We are told by the author that as Jesus passed by the gate of the temple, having placed himself out of reach of those leaders of the nation who were attempting to kill him, "he saw a man blind from birth." This man had begged at the temple gate for many years, and he was apparently known to the disciples. They would have walked on. But when Jesus stopped to look at this man, they stopped too and began to ask him a philosophical question: "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?"

The question they asked was the age-old question of the problem of pain, the question we have been asking. But in their mouths it took a form that immediately reveals two basic (and erroneous) assumptions. In the first place, the question revealed the pagan assumption that suffering in this life often is retribution for sin committed in some previous life, conceived in the categories of a system of reincarnation. Such views were common in the first century, even in Judaism. Many religions and cults in our own day still hold to them. The Scriptures do not support this, however. Instead they teach that the issues of eternity are settled for each individual during his own, single lifetime.

The second erroneous assumption made by the disciples was that the suffering of the blind man had been caused by the sin of his parents. This, of course, was possible. Sins of parents can be visited upon children. Blindness can result from venereal disease, for instance.

In this case, however, Jesus replied that the man had been born blind, neither because of his own sin nor for the sin of his parents, but rather that the glory of God might be revealed in him. He said, "Neither this man nor his parents sinned, but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (v. 3). This means—let us state it frankly—that God had allowed the man to be born blind so that at this particular moment in his earthly life Jesus might come upon him and cure him and that, as a result, God might receive glory. Having said that, Jesus then performed a miracle and restored the man's sight.

Here is our first great lesson from the story. There are no pat answers to the question of human suffering. There are answers, of course—we are going to see some of them—but there are no pat answers. Consequently, we cannot say, as some do, that it is the right of every believer to be healthy. This is nonsense. Or that suffering is always the direct result of personal sin. In some cases, suffering is corrective. It is given in order to get us back on the path that God has chosen for us. In other cases, it is constructive. It is given to build character. In still other cases, as here, it is given solely that God might receive glory.

We must not make the mistake of some people who imagine that if someone suffers some great natural catastrophe, it is because God has struck him or her down for some sin. These people imagine God to be a stern, implacable judge, who spends his time watching over people in order to catch them sinning. "I am watching you," God says, "and if you do something you are not supposed to do—whoops!—you did it! So 'BANG'—that's what happens to you." This is not true. What is more, it is a scandal on the name of God. One commentator puts it this way: "God is not up in heaven trying to hit people. God is love. Anyone could testify to the fact that many times he has sinned and has not reaped the fruits of that sin. God has been gracious in a wonderful way. How tender and patient He is with us."

Do not ever imagine that this is God's way. For if you do, you immediately make yourself into a nasty little judge, trying to find out what another Christian has done instead of recognizing that in God's providence all things come to God's people, and that in many cases God simply sends suffering that he might be glorified. In these cases suffering is a great honor, and we should be humbled before it.

Three Errors

Calvin, the great reformer, has some wonderfully wise words for all of us who tend to judge others. First, we should note, he acknowledges that in one form or another suffering does come from sin. If there had never been sin, there would be no suffering. But when we go on from that statement to begin to link up particular suffering in some person with some particular sin, we generally err in one or all of three ways.

"Since everyone is a bitter censor of others," Calvin writes, "few apply the same severity to themselves as they should do. If things go badly with my brother, I at once acknowledge the judgment of God. But if God chastises me with a heavier stroke, I overlook my sins. In considering punishments, every man should begin with himself and spare none less than himself. And so, if we want to be fair judges in this matter, let us learn to be perspicacious in our own evils rather than in those of others.

"The second error lies in immoderate severity. No sooner is a man touched by the hand of God than we interpret it as deadly hatred, and make crimes out of faults, and almost despair of his salvation. On the other hand, we extenuate our sins, and are hardly conscious of faults when we have committed most serious crimes.

"Thirdly, we are wrong to put under condemnation all without any exception whom God exercises with the cross. What we have said just now is undoubtedly true, that all our distresses arise from sin. But God afflicts His people for various reasons. Just as there are some whose crimes He does not avenge in this world, but whose punishment He delays to the future life, to try them the harder, so He often treats His faithful more severely; not because they have sinned more, but that He may mortify the sins of the flesh for the future. Sometimes, too, He is not concerned with their sins, but only testing their obedience or training them to patience. As we see that holy man Job unfortunate beyond all others, and yet he is not beset on account of his sins; but God's purpose was quite different—that his godliness might be the more fully testified in adversity. They are false interpreters, therefore, who attribute all afflictions without distinction to sins; as if the measure of punishments were equal, or as if God regarded nothing else in punishing men than what every man deserves."

God's Purpose in Suffering

There are, then, many false views of suffering, and they must be avoided. But, when that is said, we still want to know the correct views. We still want to know why Christians especially suffer. And, to make it very personal, we want to know why God permits us to suffer in any specific instance. Here only the Word of God gives guidance.

To begin with, we are told that some sufferings are corrective, that is, that God sends some pain in order to get us back on the path he has set before us. Spankings are an illustration here. If a child has done wrong, he needs a spanking; and if he has the right kind of father and mother, he receives one. Why? Because the father and mother delight to inflict pain? Because they do not love the child and therefore do not care about him? Not at all! In fact, the opposite is the case. If they do not love him, they do not spank him; if they do love him, chastisement follows when he has done wrong. Spankings are a necessary part of the child's training, for he must learn that an individual is not free to do whatever he wishes to do, irrespective of the wishes and sometimes the commands of others. Moreover, he must learn through obeying the parent to obey God. In the same way, some suffering is given to teach Christians that sin is wrong and to teach them obedience. It is along this line that the well-known verses from Hebrews 12 were written. "My son, do not make light of the Lord's discipline, and do not lose heart when he rebukes you, because the Lord disciplines those he loves, and he punishes everyone he accepts as a son. Endure hardship as discipline; God is treating you as sons. For what son is not disciplined by his father? ...No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful. Later on, however, it produces a harvest of righteousness and peace for those who have been trained by it" (vv. 5-7, 11).

The first thing we should do when we are confronted with suffering is to ask God whether or not it is intended for our correction. If it is, then we need to confess our sin or waywardness and return once more to the path set before us.

Constructive Suffering

Second, God sends the believer some sufferings that are constructive. It is by means of these sufferings that God is able to whittle away that which is unpleasing in our lives and form the character of the Lord Jesus Christ within us.

In one of his books, Donald Grey Barnhouse illustrates this process by the task of producing a statue. He writes, "The great artist Benvenuto Cellini tells us in his autobiography how he felt as he stood before a block of marble that had been brought to Florence for him to form into a great statue. Several chapters are devoted to the design and creation of the work of art which still stands in his native city as his greatest monument. Between the rough-hewn block of marble and the finished statue were all the love and care of the artist, and the infinite patience of releasing from stone the vision of beauty which he saw before he began to work. Thus the Heavenly Father is at work in the life of everyone whom he has foreknown as believing in the Savior. There is a difference between ourselves and a block of marble, however, in that we have feelings and can shrink from the strokes with which the divine Sculptor would cut away the marble so that the likeness of Christ may emerge in our lives."

In David's great psalm about the importance of knowing the Bible, the great king tells us that before he was afflicted he went astray, but that after his affliction he obeyed the word of God (Ps. 119:67). Affliction was a factor in his growth. So it is in the lives of many of God's children.

Glory to God

Finally, as in the case of the man who had been born blind, some suffering is merely that the grace of God might be revealed in the life of the Christian. Job was such a person. Lazarus was another. Beyond any doubt, both of these men were sinners and both suffered corrective and constructive sufferings at many different times in their lives. Nevertheless, in the cases of their suffering that are recorded for us in the pages of God's Word (one in the Book of Job and one in John 11), neither constructive nor corrective sufferings are in view but rather that kind of suffering that brings glory to God. In Job's case glory was given in the demonstration, observed by Satan and all the angels, that Job did not love the Lord for what he could get out of him but because the Lord was worthy to be loved and obeyed. This was true regardless of what happened to Job personally. Ultimately Job was vindicated and received his reward.

Would God Almighty permit a man to be stripped of his family and all his possessions, to be struck with such illness that he would find himself sitting in ashes bemoaning that he had ever been born, just so that God himself might be vindicated? Would God permit a man to be struck with total blindness throughout the better part of his life so that in God's own time he might become the object of a miracle performed by the Lord Jesus Christ? Would God permit a child of his to die, bringing suffering not only upon himself but also upon his sisters who mourned for him, just so God could be glorified? In the light of the Word of God we answer not only that God would do such things but that he has done them and, indeed, continues to do them in order that he might bring victory for himself and all believers in that great and invisible war between the powers of good and of evil. Moreover, those who know God well know this and (in part) understand it. They know that God is both perfect and loving and that he does all things well.

When suffering comes we must therefore check out these three possibilities. One, is it corrective, sent by God to return us to the proper path? Two, is it constructive? If so, we should ask him to use it in making us more like Jesus Christ. And three, is it for his glory? If the latter is the case, we must ask God to keep us faithful so that Satan and his hosts may be discomfited and others may learn that we at least are delighted to have God do with us whatsoever he pleases.

Chapter 114.

Jesus, the Worker

John 9:4

The subject of the following study is work, particularly Christian work. And the example for that work is none other than that great worker, the Lord Jesus Christ. In the words we are studying he speaks about his work and gives direction to our own. The text is the fourth verse of John 9: "As long as it is day, we must do the work of him who sent me. Night is coming, when no one can work."

To understand the force of this text we must take it in the context of the chapter, for it follows upon a speculative question that had been asked of Jesus by the disciples. The group had come upon a man who had been blind from birth, and the disciples had asked, "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" In other words, the disciples (who had not yet learned to look on men as Christ looked on them, as people to be loved) saw the man as a philosophical problem, and they were at once ready to debate it. Suffering is related to sin, they reasoned. The man is suffering; therefore sin is involved. So, whose sin is it? This was the line of their thinking.

To Jesus, however, the man was above all a man and, more than that, one on whom he had compassion. So instead of entering deeply into their question—he could have written a book about it—he answered them briefly, while at the same time setting about to heal the man born blind. It is in this connection that he spoke of his work, stressing that he must be about it. He added that the night was coming when no man could work.

We are to learn from this, as Spurgeon said, that "the Savior has a greater respect for work than he has for speculation." Questions are good. There are answers to such questions. Jesus gives them. But there is an eternity to ask and answer questions. What counts now is to work, for the working time is limited and the workers are few. God had sent Jesus to work. He was determined to do that work. If you are a Christian, God has also given you work to do. The conclusion is that you should set about doing that work with the same determination.

A Need to Work

The verse itself is most instructive, however, and the first thought it brings before our minds is the necessity of working. This is indicated by the first phrase, in which Jesus said, "We must do the work."

The necessity of working is something that is found throughout Christ's ministry, and it is related to the will of God for him. Indeed, it is almost a leit motiv of Christ's teaching. The earliest recorded utterance of Jesus makes this point. His parents had taken him to Jerusalem for the Passover when he was twelve years old, and when they left to return to Nazareth Jesus stayed behind in the temple. Joseph and Mary thought he was with the others in their company. When they discovered he was missing, they went back to Jerusalem and, after much searching, found him. He was discussing doctrine with the leaders of the people. "Son, why have you treated us like this?" asked his mother.

Jesus replied, "Why were you searching for me? Didn't you know I had to be in my Father's house?" (Luke 2:49).

Years later Jesus began his public ministry and, early in that ministry, came to Capernaum. In Capernaum he cast out demons and healed Peter's mother-in-law who was sick with a fever. As a result of these miracles, many in Capernaum and the area around it urged him to remain with them. But Jesus answered, "I must preach the good news of the kingdom of God to the other towns also, because that is why I was sent" (Luke 4:43). In other words, he felt the divine necessity to work in his preaching.

On another occasion a short man named Zacchaeus climbed a tree in order to see Jesus as the crowd in which Jesus was walking passed by. Jesus knew the need of this man's heart and soul. So he stopped at the tree, looked up, and said to the man; "Zacchaeus, come down immediately. I must stay at your house today" (Luke 19:5).

Jesus referred to the lifting up of the brass serpent in the wilderness in speaking to Nicodemus, saying, "Even so must the Son of man be lifted up"

(John 3:14). He said, "The Son of Man must suffer many things and be rejected by the elders, chief priests and teachers of the law, and he must be killed and on the third day raised to life" (Luke 9:22). Later he told his disciples, "Other sheep I have, that are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd" (John 10:16). From the beginning of his ministry to the end, Jesus felt a necessity of obedience to the will of God to be resting upon him.

There is another reason why Jesus felt compelled to work. The first was obedience to the will of God. The second, which is no less important, is the need of men. In John 8 we read about Jesus being driven out of the temple area. We would feel it to be all right if we found Jesus thinking primarily about his own needs and problems. But he is not. For as soon as he is outside the temple area, by the very gate of the temple, he spots a blind beggar and is immediately taken up with his need and problems. The heart of the Lord Jesus Christ went out to him. Moreover, it was always this way with Jesus. Wherever he looked there were sheep to be gathered and souls to be won. So he worked; the need of men compelled him to it.

It is no different today. Today the need is also great. Men and women are perishing in our time without the gospel and without Christ. They fill our cities and our countryside. There are the poor, the lonely, the outcasts of our society. The need is there. Who will reach them? Will you? Do you feel that you must work? Jesus felt it and, as a result, was a blessing to all who knew him. What have we done to be a blessing to those who are in need?

A third source of the necessity that Jesus felt to work was undoubtedly the love for others that filled him. Jesus loved others; hence, he had to go out of his way to work for them.

Do we love others? Or do we see them only as problems, as the disciples saw the man who had been born blind? Do we love others enough to help them? Or do we merely give lectures? There is an illustration of what ought to be done in Christ's story of the loving father and the prodigal son. The son had taken his share of the father's inheritance and had gone off to another country where he had wasted it on low living. When it was gone he returned home and found his father waiting. He said, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and against you. I am no longer worthy to be called your son." The father said—well, what did the father say? Or, to make it more personal, what might we have said had we been the father? Is it not true that we would have been ready first of all to give lectures and to ask questions? "Where have you been?" we might have asked.

"What have you been doing? What happened to your good clothes? And where is your money?
Don't you know that you have wasted it all, and that it was half of my estate? Waste is not good. You have not played the role of a good steward, even less that of a faithful and loving son. What are we to do with you? What could you possibly expect to receive from me now?" These are the questions and comments we might have made, but this was not the course taken by the father. Instead, he threw his arms about the neck of his son and kissed him—he knew it all anyway, you see—and said, "Bring the best robe and put it on him. Put a ring on his finger and sandals on his feet. Bring the fattened calf and kill it. Let's have a feast and celebrate. For this son of mine was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found" (Luke 15:22-24).

The story is given to show the love of God the Father and of the Lord Jesus Christ for sinners, and it should be our pattern. Is the man or woman who is steeped in sin repulsive to you? His sin is no less repulsive to the Lord Jesus. Jesus loves him anyway, even to the point of having died in his place. This love should move us. The love of the Lord Jesus Christ should constrain us. It should constrain us to work for the other person's salvation.

Specialized Work

There is a second lesson that comes from Christ's words about work. It is the specialized nature of the work, which Jesus indicates by the next phrase in the sentence. "I must do the work of him who sent me." It was the work of God (and only that) that Jesus felt compelled to do, while it was yet day.

There are many people who can take the first part of this verse and say with great honesty and enthusiasm, "I must work." But there are few who can say, "I must do the work of him who sent me." Take as an example a man who is determined to get ahead in business. He rises early in order to get to the office before most of the other employees. He puts in a long day, skipping coffee breaks, even having his lunch sent in to him. After the others leave, he stays; it is late when he finally starts home. At night he is thinking about his business and planning for the next day. What time and what skill he puts into getting ahead in his work! How strong is his desire! It is a proper desire, of course. If a man wants to get on in the world, he must work. Hard work is good for a person. We would never want to encourage any active man to be idle. And yet—this is the point—Jesus came into the world not to get ahead in business or to get rich, but rather to do the work of him who sent him. It was upon this that he set his desire and bent every activity.

Do we apply the same discipline and enthusiasm that we have in other areas of our lives to the work of God?

Moreover, notice that Jesus was not selective in the works he felt compelled to accomplish. He did not pick and choose. Rather, he said, "We must do the work of him who sent me." That is, "We must do all of them." There were works of preaching and of praying, of rebuking and of suffering, finally, even of dying. But whatever they were and whether they were either personally appealing or unappealing—we remember that in the Garden of Gethsemane he sweat as it were great drops of blood as his soul shrank in horror from the spiritual suffering of the cross—Jesus determined to do all of them. Have we? Or have we pulled back from that which is distasteful? There is no doubt that much Christian work remains undone simply because of this: that all Christians have not yet learned that each believer is personally to do the works—all the works—of him who sent him.

Shortness of Time

Third, Christ's words about work also teach us about a limitation of the time allotted to work and, therefore, also about time's shortness. Jesus indicated this by saying, "As long as it is day, we must do the work of him who sent me."

These words are striking in the mouth of the Lord Jesus Christ, much more so than if they had been spoken by any mere man or woman. Christ is the timeless God. He lived in eternity past and will be living throughout eternity future. If anyone could have postponed work, surely it was the Lord Jesus. Yet we see him concerned for the moment and aware that the moment was passing. If that is true for Jesus, how much more true is it for us who are entirely creatures of time and for whom time is quickly passing!

Time is passing for ourselves, first of all. We are here today, studying our Bibles, listening to a radio broadcast. But there is not an ounce of assurance that we will be here tomorrow. Death may come. At the very least sickness may be upon us, and the opportunities for service that we have today may be over. Or, again, even if we remain in good health, the time of opportunity may pass for the one to whom we should be bringing the gospel or whom we should be serving.

Are you a preacher? If so, you will not preach to that same congregation for long. Some will die this year, more the next. What are you waiting for? What hinders you from preaching the full counsels of God with all the depth, maturity, and enthusiasm of which you are capable? Richard Baxter once said, "I preach as though I ne'er might preach again, and as a dying man to dying men." That should be your standard.

Are you a Sunday school teacher? If you are, the principle applies to you also. You will not have your children long. You have them for a little less than sixty minutes a week and for less than a year. What will you teach them in that time? What will they learn? For some it may be the only time in their lives in which they will have opportunity to hear about God's love for them in Christ and of his great plans for them. For some it may be the only time in which they will have an opportunity to memorize Scripture.

Are you a mother or a father? Then these truths are for you also. Now is the time to train your children. You must begin while they are young. You will not have them for more than twenty years, and they will be malleable to your teaching for even less than that. You must lead them to faith in the Savior. You must teach them the ways of God with men and help them to develop Christian character. God will not hold you guiltless if you fail to do this; for you are responsible for them, and the time is passing. In this as in other areas "night is coming, when no one can work."

The Night, the Night

Finally, and as a result of this last phase, we must consider the end of things historically. True, there is an end of life for each of us, for those to whom we witness and for ourselves. But it is also true that the night comes in history, so that opportunities for work that a particular age offers can be ended. Today there are great opportunities. How long will they last? Who knows but that a new dark age may soon be upon us?

In an address given on the occasion of his installation as Visiting Professor of Theology at Eastern Baptist Seminary in Philadelphia, Dr. Carl F. H. Henry spoke of the frightening rise of a new barbarianism in our age. "The barbarians are coming," said Henry, as he likened today's onrush of paganism to the barbarian conquest of Christian Rome. They are coming in science, through the misuse of new discoveries. They are coming in communications, as men discover ways to manipulate public opinion for bad ends. They are coming in the religious realm, as institutional Christianity increasingly gives way to the occult, the cults, and Satanism. "Obscure the vitalities of revealed religion," said Henry, "detour churchgoers from piety and saintliness, and in the so-called enlightened nations not only will the multitudes soon relapse to a retrograde morality, but churchgoers will live in Corinthian immorality, churchmen will encourage situational ethics, and the line between the Christian and the worldling will scarce be found."

The night is coming. Jesus said it is coming, and we can sense that it is so. But this is not all we can say. The night is coming? Yes! But Jesus is also coming. And so, the barbarians do not have the future to themselves. The Lord is returning to judge the barbarism and receive his own. One day we must stand before him. That is our hope. We rejoice! At the same time we recognize that it is also a day of reckoning. Have we worked for Jesus? Have we invested those talents that he has given us? God grant that we may and that one day we may hear him say, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Chapter 115.
The Sixth Miracle

John 9:5-12

The miracles recorded in John's Gospel have been chosen with a view to the spiritual lessons they can teach. There are only seven of them—the changing of the water into wine, the healing of the nobleman's son, the curing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, the feeding of the five thousand, Christ's walking on the water, the restoring of sight to the man who had been born blind, and the raising of Lazarus. Many more could have been included. But these were chosen— John says so explicitly—in order that those who read about them might be led to faith in Jesus Christ as the Messiah and the Son of God (20:31).

In John's mind, then, these miracles are particularly significant. They are significant precisely because they teach spiritual truths.

This has been becoming more and more obvious as our study of the miracles has proceeded. The first miracle pictured Jesus at a wedding, making wine. Clearly this reveals him as One who enters into human joys and who actually gives joy; but it is not a terribly profound lesson. Other people could be said to do that. In later miracles, however, we see him as the One who is able to restore lost health, provide for all human needs, and even save people when people do not desire saving. In these later miracles we learn of our terribly lost condition, of God's unmerited election of sinners to salvation, and of the irresistible nature of Christ's grace.

In the sixth miracle—the miracle of the restoring of sight to the man who had been born blind— this is no less true. Hence, we are able to turn to the story, not only for the story itself (it is a very good one) but also for what it has to teach about the nature of our salvation. To do this we look first at the blind man; second, at Jesus; third, at the means employed by Jesus in the miracle; and fourth, at his command. The conclusion is that we are to be saved from our spiritual blindness in the same manner.

The Blind Man

We begin, then, with the blind man. Indeed, it is a pitiable place to begin. There is not much we can say in favor of him at the moment in which Jesus found him. Later he becomes quite tenacious in hanging onto what he knows about Jesus. This is praiseworthy. But at the beginning of the story he is only a blind beggar, condemned by his condition to a life of hopeless deprivation and suffering.

He could not see Jesus, of course. Jesus could see him; but he could not see Jesus, even, we might add, when Jesus stood directly in front of him looking down on him as he sat begging. Perhaps he sensed that someone was there. But he did not know who was there or what his presence signified. It is likely that the man did not greatly value sight, for he had been blind from his birth and hardly had an idea of what it meant to see. Had he lived with good sight for thirty or forty years and then lost it as the result of an accident, or some such thing, we might expect him to have been bemoaning his loss. But he knew none of the world as we receive it through our vision and, hence, could not fully value vision. He knew that he was missing something, of course. But how could he value it properly, having never seen? Finally, notice that he also did not pray for sight. At least, we are not told that he did. He was a beggar. It is a beggar's task to beg. But he did not beg for sight. His condition was hopeless, and what is the use of asking for something that everyone knows cannot happen! The blind man certainly did not expect the miracle that was about to be performed by Jesus.

No, little can be said in favor of this man at the moment Jesus found him. Yet, to be perfectly fair, there is at least one thing. The one circumstance in favor of the blind man is that he was at least in the place where Jesus was likely to go. He had not planned it that way. He sat at the gate of the temple because thousands of people passed through the gate of the temple and he could ask them for alms. Yet, whether he had planned it or not, this was where Jesus passed by. And Jesus found him.

I wonder if that might not describe many who will read these words. I am sure that it will at least describe some. You are like the blind man. To begin with, you cannot see spiritual truths. You have heard the gospel preached—perhaps you have even been reading the Bible as well as Christian books—but you cannot understand what is said, and you cannot see Jesus. Moreover, you do not even properly value what you are missing. Since you have never understood spiritual truths, you hardly have a sense of what they are and therefore cannot value them. Then, as a consequence of this, you have not prayed to understand them. So far as you are concerned, your condition is as it is, and it will never be changed by anything.

What can be said for you in your condition? There is hardly a good thing that can be said. You are lost and blind, and your condition is hopeless—apart from the Lord Jesus Christ. Yet, like the state of the man who had been born blind, there is this at least to be said: you are in a place where Jesus is likely to go. You have not planned it that way, but, nevertheless, you are there. You are reading these words. Perhaps you have been attending a believing church. Perhaps another member of your family has been converted. These are good signs; and I at least am encouraged by them. You cannot see Jesus. But if you are one such as I have been describing, Jesus is seeing you. He is looking down on you, searching you out from head to foot, and thinking of what he is about to do in your life and what he will make of you.

Are you such a one? Then you are just whom he wants. Jesus said, "I am the light of the world" (John 9:5). It is with your darkness that he wishes to deal.

The Man Jesus

Second, I want you to look at the man Jesus. I call him "the man Jesus" because this is what the man who had been born blind called him. After he had been healed by Jesus, the neighbors of the man asked, "How were your eyes opened?" They were not even sure that the healed man was the right man; for, although they thought he was the man who had been born blind, he seemed different and they were unable to account for the miracle. "How were your eyes opened?"

The man replied, "The man they call Jesus made some mud and put it on my eyes. He told me to go to Siloam and wash. I went and washed, and then I could see" (v. 11).

Jesus is more than a man. The fact that he healed the man who had been born blind is proof of that, and there are many other proofs as well. Jesus is also God. He is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end. He is the King of kings and Lord of lords. He is the Ancient of Days. He is Jehovah-jireh, El Elyon, Adonai. He is the Lord of hosts. He is the Savior. Jesus is all these things. And yet—it is also his glory—he is a man, and this is not at all a bad place at which to begin to know him.

What a man he is, this man Jesus! He is a man's man. J. B. Phillips, the author of one of the modern paraphrases of the Bible, sensed this keenly in his translation work and has written of it. "I had deep respect, indeed a great reverence, for the conventional Jesus Christ whom the Church worshipped. But I was not at all prepared for the unconventional man revealed in those terse Gospels. No one could possibly have invented such a person: this was no puppet-hero built out of the imaginations of adoring admirers. 'This man Jesus,' so briefly described, rang true, sometimes alarmingly true. I began to see now why the religious establishment of those days wanted to get rid of Him at all costs. He was sudden death to pride, pomposity, and pretence.

"This man could be moved with compassion and could be very gentle, but I could find no trace of the 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild.' He was quite terrifyingly tough, not in a Bulldog Drummond-James Bond sort of way, but by the sheer strength of a unified and utterly dedicated personality. He once (at least) walked unscathed through a murderous crowd. I have known a few, a very, very few, men who could do that. But then I find that this sheer strength was still His after hours of unspeakable agony in the garden of Gethsemane. Those who were sent to arrest Him 'fell back to the ground.' ...Jesus was a man of such stature and quality that he could remain in command of a situation even when the odds were heavily against him."

This is the kind of man we meet in John 9. Thus, it is no surprise to find that, after his healing, the blind man had thoughts only for Jesus. To this man, Jesus had become the most important person in existence. He did not know much about him; he only knew that he was "the man called Jesus." He had not even seen him; for Jesus had sent him away to the pool of Siloam, where the healing took place. Still, Jesus was closer to him than his neighbors, family, or the Pharisees.

Moreover, his talk was all about Jesus. He told how Jesus had made the clay, how Jesus had anointed his eyes, how Jesus had sent him to wash in the pool of Siloam, and how (as the result of what Jesus had done) he came seeing. Indeed, in one sense, the miracle was not complete until he had been found by Jesus the second time and had come to worship him as Lord.

So it will be with you, if you are found by Jesus. You may not know much about him, but for you it will be "Jesus only." You will be able to sing:

> Jesus paid it all,
> All to him I owe;
> Sin had left a crimson stain, He washed it white as snow.

May Jesus do for you now that spiritual work that will enable you to see him, believe on him, and, as a result, be able to sing his praises forever.

The Humble Means

Third, there are lessons to be learned from the humble means that Christ employed to perform the miracle. The story tells us that Jesus spit on the ground, made clay from the dust and saliva, and then anointed the sightless eyes of the blind man. Does that offend you? Does it seem inadequate and even foolish? Does it seem harmful? In one sense it probably should; for the gospel, through which God gives spiritual light and sight, is all these things to the unconverted.

It is evidently offensive. For when we speak of it there are those who turn away as though it were coarse, old-fashioned, or beneath their dignity. To these men the age-old gospel of salvation through faith in Christ, who died for our sin, giving his blood as propitiation of God's just wrath—to these men all this seems hopelessly old and irrelevant. It is offensive to some minds. But offensive or not, it is by these means that God saves lost and sinful men. Clay? Yes, but it is clay made by Jesus. Saliva? Yes, but from his mouth. In the same way it is by the gospel declared in the words of Scripture—which came from the mouth of Christ—that God calls men and women to repentance. And it is even by preaching. For, as Paul writes, "God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe" (1 Cor. 1:21).

There are others—we must admit it—to whom the gospel is not so much offensive as it is inadequate. They point to the deep personal and social needs of men and turn from the gospel, trying rather to meet the need through psychiatry, politics, social action programs, and other devices. Well, let them try. It is good to have workers in all fields. Let them do everything they can. Still, while wishing them well, we will not abandon the gospel; for, simple though it may be, the gospel of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, believed and acted upon, has transformed millions. The gospel has made countless numbers of men and women into new creatures and, through them, has transformed their environment.

Finally, to some the gospel appears worse than inadequate. It actually appears harmful, just as the anointing of the blind man's eyes with clay might have been supposed to have hindered rather than aided his sight. To such the news of salvation through the unmerited grace of Christ seems actually to encourage sin. For, as they said in Paul's day, "Let us sin, that grace may abound." Is this true? Does our gospel encourage sin? Not at all! On the contrary, the gospel is the greatest purifying power in human life, as every true believer knows. This simple means has been a channel of great blessing and of displaying God's glory.

Will you accept this gospel? If you are still drawing back from it as the leper Naaman drew back from the water of the Jordan River, thinking it to be beneath him, then you have not yet seen your plight to be as desperate as it really is. But if, like the blind man, you know it to be desperate, if you sense that there is no hope for you unless Jesus himself comes into your life and does a miracle—if that is the case, then you will not draw back at the simplicity of that which is preached to you but rather will go on to accept whatever Christ offers and do as he tells you.

The Command

This brings us to our final point: the command. What was it? It was simply, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam" (v. 7). It was simple; it contains only seven words. It was personal; it was directed to the blind man and to him alone. It involved the test of obedience; for it involved a response to the Lord Jesus Christ. In the same way, the gospel that comes to you is simple— "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you will be saved." It is personal; you must believe.
Above all, it is a test of obedience; for the question is, "Will you believe? Will you trust Jesus?"

If you are hesitating, the blind man can be your guide. For if you are hesitating, you are blinder than he was by far. What did he do? He was blind, but as the old Puritan divine John Trapp quaintly observed, "He obeyed Christ blindly." As a result of his obedience he immediately received physical sight and entered upon a pathway by which he eventually received true spiritual sight in addition.

What a wonderful thing the Lord Jesus Christ did for this man! What a wonderful thing he is prepared to do for all who obey him! Will you obey him? If so, he will begin by giving you spiritual sight and will end by making all things new.

Chapter 116.
"He Is a Prophet"

John 9:13-17

I would like you to imagine for a moment that someone you know has just recently become a Christian and then ask yourself these questions: (1) From whom is the new Christian likely to receive the most encouragement? and (2) From whom is he likely to hear the most disheartening remarks?

Most of us would probably agree that the answer to the first question is: those through whom he became a Christian in the first place; for they nat-come up with an answer to the second question so easily. What would you say? Many, I am sure, would think that his greatest discouragements would come from those who are avowed enemies of the gospel, perhaps from skeptics or hedonists. Actually, it is probably true that his greatest discouragements would come from those who are outwardly religious, but who do not have the truly transforming love of the Lord Jesus Christ in their hearts.

One commentator says, "The ones who will treat worst the young believer are not open infidels and atheists, but those who are loudest in their religious professions."

Let me give you the following example. A number of years ago my wife and I worked with an older woman who became a Christian at about fifty years of age. She had been a faithful church woman for most of her life, but she had never actually understood the gospel or placed her faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. When she finally understood what it was all about and became a Christian, she found herself filled with joy and her life almost completely transformed. She wanted to tell her minister what happened; so she did. She went to him joyously, thinking that he would rejoice with her. But his reaction was not one of joy. Rather, it was a grim and deflating response. He urged her not to become emotional and above all not to do anything foolish. Later the relationship deteriorated to the point at which he actually asked her to leave his church, and she returned to the small fellowship of people who loved her and through whom she had been saved.

It would be nice if this were a single and unique incident. But, unfortunately, it is not. Instead, it is more like a pattern, and the discouraging words are often sharp barbs and the opposition intense. What about such circumstances? Should the new Christian be encouraged or discouraged? Strengthened or confused? There is a great deal of light to be thrown on this situation by the story of the confrontation between the man who had been born blind (but who had been healed by Jesus) and the Pharisees who were offended by his healing. The conflict was lopsided—between the simple beggar and the self-righteous and cocksure Pharisees. It was intense. But it ended, in spite of the man's excommunication, in his triumph. In short, it was a case of the triumph of fact over theory and of true spiritual experience over closed minds.

The Sabbath Problem

On the surface at least the problem was the old sabbath problem that had arisen early in Christ's ministry. That the man had been healed would have been bad enough, given the facts that he had been healed by Jesus and that the Pharisees hated Jesus for his exposure of their sin. But that he had been healed on the Sabbath and by means of clay that Jesus had made from his spittle and dust—well, this was intolerable!

There was no doubt at all that Jesus had broken the Sabbath—at least as they conceived it. What is more, he had done so previously in the case of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda (John 5:1-16) and in other instances. In this case there were at least three ways in which he had broken the sabbath laws. First, by making clay he had made himself guilty of working on the Sabbath. The law clearly said, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates" (Exod. 20:8-10). The rabbis had defined this as meaning that a man could not carry a handkerchief from an upstairs room to a downstairs room; that was carrying a burden, and carrying a burden was work. A man could neither light nor extinguish a lamp. He could not cut his fingernails, nor pull a hair out of his beard. Most certainly he could not spit in the dust to make clay; for making clay was manual labor.

Second, Jesus had broken the Sabbath by healing the blind man. According to rabbinic maxims, it was all right to practice medicine if life was in danger; that is, it was permissible to try to keep the patient from getting worse. But on the other hand, it was forbidden to do anything to make him get better. A doctor could not treat toothache, for instance. A person could not put cold water on a sprain. Clearly, since the man who had been born blind was in no danger of dying from his handicap or of getting blinder, Jesus broke the sabbath laws when he healed him.

Finally, as regards the actual method of healing, the law clearly stated that "as to fasting spittle, it is not lawful to put it so much as upon the eyelids." So, since Jesus had done this, he was obviously guilty on this count also.

Jesus was guilty of breaking the sabbath laws as the rabbis of Israel had constructed them. But these were man-made regulations; and Jesus, who understood God's law perfectly, knew it, and simply disregarded them. Moreover, they were actually harmful. For they were means by which those who were fundamentally incapable of keeping God's true law nevertheless buttressed themselves up in the conviction that they were doing all right as religious people, that they were going to earn heaven. They also convinced themselves that they did not need God's grace. If they were doing all right, they did not need a Savior. They did not need Jesus. Besides, within their system they could do almost anything they wished—so long as they did not violate the sabbath laws. Thus, they were ready to kill Jesus for breaking the Sabbath, but they were not prepared to let him heal on it. Later they would be ready to have him crucified, so long as the execution took place before sundown on Friday evening.

This was a horrible system. Religious formalism is always horrible. Yet, it was this that confronted the poor beggar when he was ultimately brought before the Pharisees by those neighbors of his who had witnessed the miracle. We can see it now—the leaders, elegant in their robes and secure in their positions, and the beggar, inelegant and insecure—save in Jesus. We can sense the tension. The man was healed. He had been blind for the whole of his lifetime, and now he was healed! We might expect the leaders to have rejoiced with him. But did they? Not at all! Instead, we see them dredging around in the dark recesses of their minds to discover what they can do about this unfortunate event. Can they discredit the miracle and thereby brand the carpenter from Nazareth a fraud? Or—this would be better yet—can they maneuver the testimony of the blind man to trap him?

As a blind man and as a beggar, this man had no interest for the Pharisees. They would have stepped on him as they made their impressive prayers on the street corners. But now, as a healed man, he was interesting in a negative sort of way. Perhaps he could become their tool to trap Jesus.

A Sharpened Testimony

So they began to ask questions, and the first was how he had received sight. Apparently they had already heard the story; the text says, "The Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight." But this was a formal hearing, perhaps even something of a cross-examination. Would the blind man say something contradictory and thus discredit himself and Jesus? Would he say something that could be used against Jesus? "Tell us again," they said. "Let's hear it from the beginning."

I can almost see the blind man's eyes narrowing as he replies to their question somewhat warily now and quite tersely, "He put mud on my eyes, and I washed, and now I see."

I find this very interesting. For the fact that the man who had been blind replied in such terse language shows that his testimony to the Lord Jesus Christ was sharpening. Notice that this version of his testimony is shorter than the version in verse 11. I can imagine that both are shorter than the story he told earlier in the day. Shortly after the healing the man might have told about it with many interesting but irrelevant details. "There I was, sitting by the temple gate," he might have said. "You know, the big one where so many people go in and out. I had gotten there a bit late because there was an unusual number of people on the streets. In fact, back on the other side of the square the crowd was so thick I actually got knocked down. Well, as I was saying, I got there late and took my usual place. You know—off to the right, near the bakery. Then, no sooner was I there than I heard this commotion in the temple courtyard, a great commotion. There was shouting. Someone was yelling, 'Stone him! Stone him!' I listened anxiously. Then the shouting died away and after awhile.... "Well, the story might have gone on like that for a long time with much irrelevant detail. But that would have been earlier in the day. Here, when opposed by the Pharisees, the man does not ramble but instead tells his story pointedly. There was much the Pharisees could question. Much might even be uncertain. But this much was at least clear: Jesus had put clay on his eyes; he had washed; he had come away seeing. Learn that this is what opposition should do to your testimony. It should sharpen it up. When you have great leisure and are among friends, no one will mind (and it may even be quite interesting) if you tell your story with many subjective details. That is all right in those circumstances. But when there is opposition, then something quite different is called for. Your words must count. You must stress basics. What has Jesus done?—that is the important thing.

And—equally important—what happened when you obeyed him? If you are giving such a witness, then your words will be effective. We might even say that it is to develop such an ability, in part at least, that God permits opposition to the Christian's testimony.

Growth in Perception

But there is another reason also, as we will see in the story. The man who had been born blind had given his testimony, and the first thing we notice is that it had been effective. The rulers had begun by questioning him. Now they turned to each other, some at least apparently accepting the reality of the miracle. "This man is not from God, for he does not keep the sabbath day," some said. Others replied that he must be of God because it would be impossible for a man who is not of God to do such miracles. They were clearly divided. So the only thing they could think of was to question the blind man again. They asked him for his opinion about Jesus. "What have you to say about him? It was your eyes he opened." "He is a prophet," the man answered.

Now here is the second thing we notice. It is the second reason why God often permits opposition to the new Christian's testimony. As a result of the conflict the man had grown in faith. He had grown in his perception of Jesus. In his first testimony the man had called Jesus only a man. "The man they call Jesus made some mud," he said. He was quite a man, but still the beggar knew no more than this. By the time we come to this point in the story, the man had come to see that calling Jesus a mere man was not enough; hence, he called him a prophet; that is, one who speaks and acts for God (v. 17). Later he advances to the thought that Jesus is One who is worthy to be a teacher and to have disciples (v. 27), then to the perception that he is "from God" (v. 33). Finally, he comes to believe on him as "the Son of God" to whom worship should be given (v. 38). By contrast, the Pharisees start from the view that Jesus is not from God (v. 16), question the miracle (v. 18), call Jesus a sinner (v. 24), acknowledge their ignorance (v. 29), and at last are by Jesus pronounced both blind and sinful (v. 41).

Opposition led the blind man into new understanding, and this should be the effect of opposition on us all—if we are faithful in giving our testimony. If a believer is faithful according to the light that he has, more is given to him. As Jesus said, "Therefore consider carefully how you listen. Whoever has will be given more; whoever does not have, even what he thinks he has will be taken from him" (Luke 8:18). In other words, if you would grow in your knowledge of Jesus, tell others what you know already and do not be afraid of opposition.

Be Bold

We have come to the end of our exposition of these verses, and a few words should be said by way of summary and conclusion. There are three main points and one conclusion. First, if you are a genuine believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, conflict will come. You will not always have conflict, but sooner or later in one form or another you will be opposed for the sake of the gospel. So do not be surprised when it happens. Remember that the Bible says, "In fact, everyone who wants to live a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted" (2 Tim. 3:12). It also says, "For it has been granted to you on behalf of Christ not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for him" (Phil. 1:29).

Second, even though conflict will come, you can know that God will not abandon you in the conflict—any more than he abandoned the man who had been born blind. When he was challenged concerning his opinion of Jesus, the man suddenly answered, "He is a prophet." He may not have been able to say that a moment before, but he did in that instant. In his hour of need divine grace did not fail him but rather enabled him to witness a good confession.

Third, when faced with such situations, you can know that God has his purposes in them and you should be encouraged by that knowledge. There may be many purposes, but among them are at least those two that we have seen in the case of the blind man. Opposition will (1) sharpen your testimony and (2) lead you into a deeper understanding of the gospel.

Finally, we may conclude that we, no less than the man who had been born blind, should be bold in our testimony. If the blind man, who had hardly met the Lord Jesus and knew little about him, was bold, why should we not be? On this point Calvin has written wisely, "If he, who did not yet know that Christ was the Son of God, courageously and freely confessed He was a prophet, how shameful is the treachery of those who out of fear either deny Him or are silent, though they know that He sits at the right hand of the Father and from thence will come to be the judge of the whole earth! If this blind man did not quench his tiny spark of knowledge, we should endeavor that a frank and full confession should blaze forth from the full brightness which has shone in our hearts."

Chapter 117.
We Know, We Know

John 9:18-33

We live in an age that places great value on knowledge. Since Christians have always done the same we might think that ours would be a great age for Christianity. Actually, this is not the case. Christians claim that they know many important things. They know whom they have believed (2 Tim. 1:12). They know that their Redeemer lives (Job 19:25). They know that they have passed from death to life (1 John 3:14). They know that all things work together for them for good (Rom. 8:28). They know that when the Lord Jesus Christ returns they shall be like him (1 John 3:2). But such claims generally do not mean much to our contemporaries, and Christians often find themselves asking: Do we indeed know what we claim to know? What do we know? Do we know it for certain? And how is it that we know it?

The basis for our study is the report of the interrogations of the parents of the man who had been born blind and the man himself by the leaders of Judaism, as recorded in John 9. The theme is suggested by the interesting fact that each of the parties is said to have claimed both to know something and not to know something. And since the claims and the reasons for the claims differ, the contrasts afford a means for examining the various types of knowledge, particularly Christian knowledge, as exemplified by the statements of the man who had been born blind.

The parties in the debate are the parents of the man, the Pharisees, and the man himself. We need to look at the claims of each one.

The Parents

The first people who are interrogated are the parents of the man whom Jesus healed. The questioning was an obvious attempt by the Pharisees to discredit the man's testimony; for if they could have gotten the parents to say that the man was not their son or that he was not really blind, then they could have branded the healing a fraud and have attacked Jesus. So they asked, "Is this your son? Is this the one you say was born blind? How is it that now he sees?" (v. 19). The overtones of the question were that the parents were to stop lying and come clean.

They answered, "We know he is our son, and we know he was born blind. But how he can now see or who opened his eyes, we do not know. Ask him. He is of age; he will speak for himself (vv. 20-21).

Notice that the parents affirm two things: (1) that the healed man was indeed their son and (2) that he was born blind. This was part of what they knew, and they were not afraid to affirm this. On the other hand, there were also two things they denied knowing: (1) how he came to see and (2) who did the miracle. This latter part was not entirely truthful, as is evident even from their testimony. For if they did not know how he was healed, then they would not have known that any person ("who") was involved. That they spoke of a person shows that they had at least heard the story and knew of Christ's role in it.

Why did they not acknowledge what they knew of Christ's role in the healing? John gives the answer when he says that "they feared the Jews." For, he says, they knew that the leaders had already agreed to excommunicate anyone who should confess that Jesus was the Messiah. In our terms we would say that the parents simply did not want to get involved. They knew, but they did not want to know. They were afraid to acknowledge what had been revealed to them.

This is an accurate picture of many in our age. The truths of Christianity have been proclaimed to them—perhaps by their parents or friends, or through their church. Intellectually they know and even believe such things. But they do not come out and say so. Were the parents of the blind man true followers of Jesus? We do not know. We can hope so. Failing that, we can hope that they became followers later. But we do not know from the story. Like many today they were afraid to acknowledge Christ for fear of the consequences.

The Pharisees

The second group was composed of the Pharisees who were conducting the interrogation. They also say "we know" and "we do not know." Since they had been unable to extract damaging testimony from the parents of the man who had been blind, they again called the man and began to interrogate him more thoroughly. He apparently had not been present during the questioning of his parents, for when he came back the leaders attempted to finesse a damaging admission out of him by pretending that they had learned the true story during his absence. "Give glory to God," they said. "We know this man is a sinner" (v. 24). There was an exchange of comments, and then they amplified their position. "We know that God spoke to Moses, but as for this fellow, we don't even know where he comes from" (v. 29).

Here is another situation in which a group of people claim both to know something and also not to know something. They claimed to know: (1) that Jesus was a sinner, and (2) that God had spoken through Moses. They claimed not to know Christ's origins. Interestingly enough, however, what they claimed and what they denied were contradictory. For one thing, in claiming not to know Christ's origins they contradicted what they are reported to have said earlier—"We know where this man comes from" (John 7:27). For another, even these statements were contradictory; for if they did not know Christ's origins, they could not know whether he was a sinner or not.

What can describe these men? Unlike the parents, who can be said to have known the truth but were unwilling to admit it, these men can be said to have thought that they knew the truth but actually to have been ignorant of it. They wanted to know. They wanted to be known as those who knew. But where Jesus was concerned they knew nothing.

Unfortunately, this too describes many in our age, particularly those pseudo-scholars and pseudo-leaders who claim to know all about Christ and Christianity but who have never really come to know Christ personally. This is true of many who write popular books about Jesus, for instance. Every year a number of these books appear, each one pretending to tell the truth about Jesus because the "truth" has become known through some manuscript discovery or some scientific advance. In one, Jesus will be pictured as a Messiah who planned a crucifixion from which he was to be saved in order to convince his followers that he was fulfilling the Old Testament prophecies. In another he will appear as the leader of an ancient drug cult. Such books are based on distortions of the most flimsy evidence, while at the same time they neglect the weighty evidence of the Gospels. Do these men know Jesus? Not at all. They are modern-day Pharisees; for although they claim to know and want desperately to know, they know nothing.

The Man Born Blind

The third party in the story is the man who had been born blind. What was his testimony? Quite simply, he readily acknowledged that there was much that he did not know—"Whether he is a sinner or not, I don't know" (v. 25). But then he added, "One thing I do know. I was blind but now I see" (v. 25). He could not tell his interrogators everything about Jesus. In fact, he was unable to debate the matter of his person. But one thing he did know and that was that Jesus had changed him; and because he knew it and really knew it, no one was going to shake him from his position.

In this the blind man becomes a type of those who are genuine Christians. They do not know everything—the finite cannot exhaust the infinite—but what they do know they know truly. And they know it because they have met Jesus personally.

Lack of Knowledge

This is worth some reflection. We have summarized the positions of the parents, the Pharisees, and the man who had been healed. What is it that makes the testimony of the healed man different? Why is his approach to knowledge to be emulated?

First, we notice that he, unlike the others, began with his limitations in knowledge. That is, he began humbly. Each of the parties in this report said both "we know" and "we do not know." But both the parents and Pharisees said "we know" first and, only after that, acknowledged that there was something they did not know. The parents said, "We know he is our son, and we know he was born blind. But how he sees now ... we don't know." The Pharisees said, "We know that this man is a sinner. ...We know that God spoke to Moses, but as for this fellow, we don't even know where he is from." Both of these groups were most interested in what they did know, and as a result were either cowardly or else knew nothing. The man born blind began with an admission of his ignorance but went on to affirm what he did know as the result of God's revelation.

Here is a great biblical principle. It is that no one can know God by means of the mind or by any other human instrument. The Book of Job asks, "Can you fathom the mysteries of God? Can you probe the limits of the Almighty?" (Job 11:7). The answer that our hearts must give is no, for "the man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

In Christianity we begin with our ignorance, just as we begin with our sin. We acknowledge both our inability in spiritual things and our shortcomings. Thus, we acknowledge that unless God chooses to reveal himself—which he has done in his Word and in Jesus Christ—we can know nothing.

Second, we notice from what is told us of the blind man that, starting from his own lack of knowledge, he was thereby prepared to recognize the absence of knowledge in others. In this case, he recognized the great ignorance of the so-called educated ones, the leaders of the people. This is the most humorous part of the controversy. The Pharisees had come to him with great claims—"we know, we know"—and they had spoken disparagingly of Jesus. "But as for this fellow, we don't even know where he comes from." But this was a fatal admission before their very shrewd witness, and he at once seized upon it.

"Now that is remarkable," he said sarcastically. "You don't know where he comes from, yet he opened my eyes" (v. 30). They did not know even the most basic things about Jesus, and the man who had been healed at once saw this—because he had recognized his own limitations.

This sounds contradictory, and yet it is true. Who are those who are most likely to be taken in by authority? We answer: the foolish. But who are the foolish? The answer to that question is not necessarily "those who are uneducated" and most certainly not "those who are aware of their own lack of knowledge." The answer is those who are overly sure of what they think they know. Thus, you will find professors being swept up into foolish theories by other professors, and ministers being led into nonsense concerning Christ by doctors of theology.

Third, having eliminated a false self-confidence as well as an unjustified confidence in the Pharisees, the man who had been born blind was left with what he truly did know. "Whether he is a sinner or not, I don't know. One thing I do know. I was blind but now I see" (v. 25). He had eliminated the fringe areas, you see. Oh, he would get to these later. In fact, he would become quite sure of some of them later on. But here, in the midst of the debate, he took his stand upon the certainties; and for him the certainty was that he had been healed by Jesus.

What are your certainties? Do you have any? You do, if you have been touched by Jesus. In this regard I think of Martin Luther. Luther was not always the great victor in debates that we sometimes imagine him to be. He was sometimes pressed into making admissions that he did not intend to make when he first entered the discussion. At Leipzig, in a debate with John Eck, Luther came to admit that the Hussites and other early reformers "were not all wrong." At Worms he admitted that the councils of the church had erred. At times Luther admitted his own lack of knowledge, for, as he said, he was "only a man and not God and was liable to make mistakes." Nevertheless, the more he was pressed, the more certain Luther became of that which he did know—namely, that salvation was by grace through faith and that the Word of God was powerful and would ultimately prevail.

If you are uncertain about spiritual matters, then you need to get your eyes off yourself and others and onto Jesus. What has he done? What has he said? What has he revealed about God? What has he made known to you? Spiritual knowledge is based upon the intervention of God in history and the personal revelation of God by the Holy Spirit to the human soul.

Knowing More

Finally, we notice that what the man who had been born blind truly knew (even though it was small) became the basis upon which he went on to learn more. His starting point was only this: that Jesus had healed him. But he went on to develop that point so that he came to know that Jesus was no mere man, but was God.

What the man comes to see in this final exchange with the Pharisees is remarkable—actually, the basic tenets of revealed religion. The Pharisees had argued that Jesus was a sinner, and the blind man had declared himself unable to argue with that proposition. He only knew that Christ had healed him. As he thought about it, however, he found that he could say more. First, he knew that God does not hear sinners; that is, that sinners have no claim upon him. This point involves the whole doctrine of man's spiritual depravity, his hopelessness in sin.

Second, he declared that God does hear those who do his will; that is, those who are in a right relationship to him. This is a declaration of the fact that God has revealed his will and that salvation is possible. Finally, the man argued that since God had heard Jesus in the matter of his own healing, Jesus must be in God's will in a special way and must therefore be "of God." In other words, Jesus becomes the Savior of man because of who he is and of his origins.

So it is for all Christians as they grow in knowledge. They do not know exhaustively, but they do know truly because they know on the basis of God's written and incarnate revelation—and they grow in knowledge. The Scriptures say, "The path of the righteous is like the first gleam of dawn shining ever brighter till the full light of day" (Prov. 4:18).

Chapter 118.
Last Resort of the Unconverted

John 9:34

The last resort of the unconverted is, simply, to refuse to listen. The subject comes to us from John 9:34. This verse concludes the report of the conversation between the man who had been born blind (but who had been healed by Jesus) and the Pharisees. The man who had been blind had seen the true purpose of the Pharisees' questioning—they were trying to trap Jesus—and he had begun to rebuke them for their unbelief. They were offended, naturally. So we read, "To this they replied, 'You were steeped in sin at birth; how dare you lecture us!' And they threw him out."

This is our text. It teaches that being defeated by the man's arguments, the Pharisees tried excommunication rather than acknowledge Christ's claims.

This is something that often happens. Sometimes it is official, as in this case. At other times it is more disguised. Not long ago I heard of a couple who were witnessing to one of their relatives by sending him books and other Christian literature. The material was received for a time, but eventually the answer came back—"I am glad to receive letters from you, but I am tired of receiving the literature. Please stop." They had to stop; but, fortunately, the relative later became a Christian through other channels. In many instances a person does the same thing by changing the subject whenever spiritual matters are brought up. To give one final example, I learned of a case in which a woman was witnessing to a certain man who became so exasperated by her witness that he knocked her down. In this case the man himself did not become a Christian, but another man who saw the incident began coming to church as a result, and eventually believed on Jesus.

There are many different ways of closing one's mind to the gospel; and it is one of these, a means often used by religious leaders, that we find in our story. The blind man was excommunicated. We also find this repeated many times in church history.

Four Attempts

To understand this fully we need to understand that excommunication was only the last of four attempts by the Pharisees to avoid the supernatural support that the miracle of healing gave to Christ's claims. The Pharisees did not refuse to listen at first. They began by trying to discredit the miracles, or, as they would have said, to uncover the true story. When that failed they tried to separate the miracle from Jesus; that is, they did not deny that the healing had taken place, but they denied that Jesus was the cause. Third, they retreated into law—"We know that God spoke to Moses." It was only at the last, when these attempts had proved inadequate, that they threw out the blind man.

The most interesting thing about these attempts to avoid the force of Christ's claims is that they are precisely the attempts that have been played out in church history.

Take the first one. This was the attempt to uncover the "true" story behind the healing and so do away with the miracle. It was what was involved in the early questioning of the man and his parents. We see this particularly in the nineteenth century. This might even be called the history of the nineteenth century so far as biblical scholarship is concerned. In the nineteenth century, rationalists, who had become rationalists as the result of their secular educations, confronted the obviously supernatural element in the biblical narratives. These men called themselves Christians, which meant that they had to have some well-thought-out relationship to the Bible.

But here were books, claiming to be by eyewitnesses of the events of biblical history, in which the supernatural was prominent. What were they to do? The only thing to do was to attempt to discredit the miracles. So, many years were spent in trying to explain how what seemed to be miracles actually happened. Thus, we find men writing that, in the incident referred to in John 6, Jesus was not actually walking upon the water but rather was standing in shallow water at the lake's edge. He was thought to be walking on water because the night was dark and cloudy and the disciples thought that they were still far from land. Or again, the miracle of the multiplying of the loaves and fishes was said to be accomplished through the foresight of the disciples who had stored sufficient food in a cave and who passed it up secretly to Jesus who, thereby, seemed to be making it multiply. Others suggested that what actually happened was that all the people, moved by the generosity of the young lad, shared their lunch.

It is hard to believe today that such theories were actually taken seriously. But they were, and in some cases they were obviously made in good faith. The men who made them thought that by stripping away the supernatural they would get to the true heart of the story, like getting to the nut after taking off the shell. What they found was that they were dealing with something more like an onion than a walnut. What happens when you take away the outer layer of an onion? You find another layer inside. Take away that layer, and another layer is visible. By the time all the layers are removed there is nothing left. This is precisely what happened in biblical scholarship. The supernatural was removed, but there was nothing left—at least nothing that was even vaguely reminiscent of Christianity. To summarize: the scholarship of the nineteenth century resulted in this, either a supernatural Bible with a supernatural Christ or no Bible and no Christ at all. The interesting thing is that in following this line of study it turned out to be the scholars themselves (like the Pharisees), rather than the miracles, who were discredited.

The second attempt by the Pharisees was to separate the miracle from Jesus. That is, they accepted the miracle—they could hardly deny it—but they denied that Jesus (whom they hated) was the one responsible. The argument went: "Give glory to God. We know this man is a sinner" (v. 24).

Unfortunately, this too has been played out in history. One example is theological. Following their failure in the nineteenth century to discredit the miraculous, scholars tried to divorce the socalled heart of Christianity from anything objective; that is, to divorce Christian experience from the actual life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. It is not so much what Jesus actually said and did that is important, we were told, but rather what Jesus means to Christians today. It would not matter if the body of Jesus should be found as the result of some archaeological expedition, so the argument went. That would disprove a literal, bodily resurrection. But the important thing is that what Jesus stood for continues to live in our hearts. That would continue in spite of the discovery. The answer to this argument is that it would not continue. In fact, if it were not for the literal resurrection of Jesus, there would be nothing to continue, for Christianity would have been forgotten about and buried long ago. No one can successfully separate cause from effect. So if there is a genuine Christian experience, there must be a genuine Christ, the Christ of the Gospels, to account for it. Without this cause there is no valid experience and no Christianity.

The attempt to separate Christianity from Christ is done in less scholarly ways whenever a person attempts to explain away conversion to Christ by calling it the product of wishfulfillment, escapism, high-pressured sales techniques on the part of an evangelist, or some such thing. This is an attempt to separate the results of conversion from the Christ who has produced the conversion, and this too is foolish.

Besides, it will never have much effect on the one who is converted. If he has really met Christ, he knows that the historic, objective Christ is inseparable from the experience.

Third, the Pharisees retreated into law or, as we could equally well say, into tradition. They could not discredit the miracle. They could not separate the miracle from Jesus. So they said in effect, "We do not know how this happened or what part Jesus may have had in it, but we do know that God has spoken to us through Moses; and this is all we need to know. So don't bother us. We are all right with our traditions." It is sad but true that traditions, even good traditions, have closed many hearts to the gospel.

The blind man also challenged this attempt to escape Christ's miracle. For he pointed out, rightly, that even the principles of the law encourage belief in Jesus. Would they retreat into traditions? Well, the best of these traditions should have caused them to be looking for Christ, to have recognized him when he came, and to have followed him and to have believed on him as the Savior. At this point, the Pharisees simply closed their ears and had the man removed from their assembly.

Strong Testimony

This brings us to the excommunication itself and to the fact that it often is the inevitable result of strong testimony. Fail to confess Christ, go along with the world and its values, compromise the standards of Christian conduct, and the world will welcome you. But confess Christ boldly, live as a Christian, and you will soon find yourself unwelcome in the world's assemblies.

A number of years ago, during the First World War, Donald Grey Barnhouse had the opportunity of leading the son of a prominent American family to the Lord. The young man was in the service. So when he professed to accept Christ as his Savior, he immediately made public testimony to that fact among the soldiers of his company. In time the war ended and the day came when he was to return to his prewar life in the wealthy suburb of a large city. He talked to Barnhouse about it and shared his fears that he might soon slip back into his old habits among his old friends. Barnhouse told him that he would not have to give these people up. Instead, they would give him up—if he made public confession of his faith in Jesus Christ. As a result of their conversation the young man agreed to tell the first ten people of his old set whom he met that he had become a Christian.

The soldier left his unit and went home. Almost immediately—in fact, while he was still at the suburban station at the end of his return trip—he met a girl whom he had known. She was delighted to see him and asked how he was doing. He told her, "The greatest thing that could possibly happen to me has happened."

"Oh," she exclaimed, "you're engaged to be married!" "No," he told her. "It's even greater than that. I have taken the Lord Jesus Christ as my Savior." The girl's expression froze; she mumbled a few polite words and quickly went on her way. A short time later the new Christian met a young man whom he had known. The young man informed him that there would be some good parties now that the soldier had returned. "I've just become a Christian," the soldier said. Again it was a case of frozen smiles and a quick change of conversation. After this the same circumstances were repeated with a young couple and with two more old friends. By this time the word had gotten around, and soon friends stopped seeing him. He had become peculiar, religious, and—who knows?—they may even have called him crazy! What had he done? Nothing but confess Christ! But the same confession that had aligned him with Christ had separated him from those who did not want him.

So it will be for all who are faithful in their testimony. If you are a Christian, it is not good to be spoken well of by everyone (Luke 6:26). All will not believe. And yet, you are to bear a testimony so that by the grace of God you might win some.

The Arms of Jesus

Finally, we need to see the results of the Pharisees' action upon the man who had been blind. In the first place, it was a great honor for this man.

He might not have felt it and was probably a dejected man when Christ later found him and revealed himself to him. Nevertheless, it was an honor to him to be ejected from the company of those who would not have Jesus.

So it is today. Believe me when I say that it is an honor to be thrown out of some churches. It was an honor when Martin Luther was expelled from the Roman Church in the sixteenth century. It was an honor when Calvin was forced to leave France for Geneva because of his testimony. Thus were the Waldenses, Huguenots, Covenanters, and Puritans treated. Thus are some treated today, and it is not tragic. It is an honor, as I have said. In many cases excommunication has been the brightest moment of some Christians' careers.

But then notice what the excommunication did. The gospel tells us that the Pharisees cast the man out. This was true. But to what did they cast him out? They cast him into the arms of Jesus. If there had been no one waiting, this might have been bad. It would have been bad to have been alone—without family, friends, spiritual counselors, or the benefits of the synagogue. But to be cast into the arms of Jesus—well, what could be better than that? His are great arms. In his arms we can each find all we need. Do you need strength? The arms of Jesus are strong arms. Do you need love? The arms of Jesus are loving arms. Do you need comfort and protection? You will find comfort and protection there. Jesus is waiting. Do not be afraid. The Scriptures say, "Though my father and my mother forsake me, the Lord will receive me" (Ps. 27:10).

It is easy to apply these truths to each person who is reading this book. If you are a Christian, first of all, do not be afraid to witness. Be bold in your witness. The worst that can happen is that you will be rejected, but that is not bad if at the same time you are received by Jesus. So do not hesitate to be identified with Jesus. Speak and allow him to use your testimony. Tell what you know and allow God to use that in bringing many others to the Savior.

Finally, if you are not yet a Christian, why should you not learn from this story? I do not say that you have been doing all that the Pharisees did, or, if you have been doing these things, that you have been doing them consciously. Yet this may be the case. You may have been trying to deny the miracles. That is why those popular books that seek to explain the "true" origins of Christianity appeal so strongly to you. Perhaps you have been seeking to detach the fruit of Christian experience from Jesus. That is why you are so concerned to prove that a Christian you know has become a Christian only because someone has pressured him into it or because he is seeking to fulfill some inner need. Perhaps you have been retreating into tradition. Perhaps you are just refusing to listen. I do not know where you stand, but if you stand here, do not refuse to listen any longer. Open your ears. Hear the voice of Christ. Believe him. Turn to him. Throw yourself upon him. Receive him as your Savior.

Chapter 119.
A Question for Everyone

John 9:35-38

We have already studied the story of the man who had been born blind sufficiently to be aware of the situation at this point. The man had been healed by Jesus. But as the result of his healing and of his testimony before the Pharisees, the man had been rejected, first by his family and friends, then by his church and nation. The man was undoubtedly dejected. Yet, this man, who had been rejected by everyone else, was not rejected by Jesus. We read that Jesus, when he heard that the man had been excommunicated, sought him out and asked him a question. It is unlikely that there are many reading this who have literally been excommunicated, though there may be some. Nevertheless, I am sure that many are in a similar condition. You feel cut off from other people and perhaps from God. It may even be that you have cut yourself off, for the knowledge of what you have done burns in your conscience, telling you that there is no hope for you of God's pardon. If that is the case, then you must listen to this great question and answer it. It is a question by which God can do you good.

Notice that this was Jesus' purpose in asking the question of the man who had been born blind. Unasked, he had been healed by Jesus. Unsought, he had been found by Jesus. Now, by this question he is helped to make a considerable advance in his faith. The man knew something about his benefactor already. He knew that he was a man called Jesus (v. 11). He had come to see that he was a prophet (v. 17). Later he began to understand that Jesus was from God; for, as he said, "If this man were not from God, he could do nothing" (v. 33). Nevertheless, the man who had been blind still did not know all that Jesus intended for him to know. So Jesus came with a question that was to bring him to the place where he was able to fall down and worship him—"Do you believe in the Son of Man?"

This was the question by which Jesus sought to do the man good, and it is the question by which I seek to do you good at this moment. Will you ask it of yourself? There is no more important question that can either be asked or answered.

An Important Question

Let me justify the fact that this is an important question. It is important, first of all, because it concerns salvation, and salvation is important. Here is a picture of Jesus coming to a man whom he had helped physically (he had enabled him to see) and whom he had also helped intellectually. But these two areas of life were relatively unimportant compared with the salvation of the man spiritually. So Jesus asked a question designed to quicken his faith and lead him to place his trust in Jesus himself regarding salvation. The situation is repeating itself today. There are many things in your mind that you think are important and that the world judges to be important, but none of them are as important as the great matter of salvation that I am pressing upon you. Do you believe on Jesus? The Bible stresses the importance of this matter when it asks properly, "What good is it for a man to gain the whole world, yet forfeit his soul?" (Mark 8:36).

Second, the question is important because it concerns the only way of salvation. It is not the case that there are many roads, all of which lead to heaven. Many believe this, but it is not true. It is not the case that there are many ways by which a man can become right before God, but rather that Jesus is himself "the way and the truth and the life" (John 14:6). It is because of who Jesus is that he is able to save sinners. He is God and, as God, is able to die for an infinite number of sins. He does what no mere man can do. Therefore, salvation is by him, through him, in him, of him. Indeed, as the Scriptures say, "Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:12).

In Christianity salvation is something achieved by Jesus. Hence, Jesus is at the center of Christianity as no other individual is in any other religion. When Buddha, just prior to his death, was asked by his disciples how best they might remember him, Buddha replied that they were not even to trouble themselves by such a question. His point was that it did not matter whether or not they remembered him. What mattered was his teaching, his teaching of the Way. In this respect, his teaching had the characteristics nearly of a truth of science, which exists entirely apart from the one who discovers it. This is not the way of Christian truth, for Jesus pointed men and women to himself. In our text he asks, "Do you believe in the Son of Man?" Later he instituted the Lord's Supper with the words, "This is my body, which is for you; do this in remembrance of me. ...This cup is the new covenant in my blood; do this whenever you drink it, in remembrance of me" (1 Cor. 11:24-25).

A person can gain a better feeling for the importance of Jesus as the sole way of salvation by imagining how the situation with the man who had been healed might have been approached by someone from another religion or with another commitment. If this had been Buddha himself or another teacher of an eastern religion, the teacher might have spoken to the man of the unimportance of the details of this life. The important thing is peace of mind, he might have been told. Therefore, the proper course is detachment as a first step in attaining to the divine life. If this had been one of our modern churchmen, the churchman might have been distressed by the rupture between the man who had been born blind and Judaism. Without Judaism he was cut off from the sacraments of Israel. Hence, the proper course (the man would have been told) would be a reconciliation with the religious leaders. If the man had been approached by one of our modern pastors, the kind who feels that pastoral counseling is more important than a proclamation of the Word of God, the healed man might have been asked to explore his own feelings and see whether he might not be able to accept the situation. This was not Jesus' way. Jesus was concerned with the man's salvation, and he knew that the man's salvation depended at its base upon the man's relationship to himself. Did he believe on Jesus? That was the question. So Jesus comes asking him about it—"Do you believe in the Son of Man?"

Do you believe in the Son of Man? The question is important because it concerns salvation and because it concerns belief in the Lord Jesus Christ as the sole means of salvation.

No Substitute

Third, the question is important because of the fact that no other experience eliminates the need to answer it. Think of this man for a moment. Think of all that he had already gone through. First of all, he had already been obedient to Jesus. Jesus had found him by the temple gate, had made clay of the dust, and had anointed the blind man's eyes. Jesus had said, "Go, wash in the Pool of Siloam." This the man did. We are told that as a result of his obedience he found himself seeing. Moreover, we do not read even of any hesitation in the man's obedience. He might have hesitated. He might have argued that the pool was far away and that nothing was to be gained by washing, so far as he could discern. But he was not another Naaman, who hesitated on the banks of the Jordan—"Are not Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus, better than any of the waters of Israel?" (2 Kings 5:12). The blind man obeyed immediately and without quibble. Still the Lord came to him with the great question, "Do you believe in the Son of Man?" The question needed to be asked even though the blind man had been unhesitatingly obedient.

It is the same with many. You may not have been obedient to what you know of Christ's teachings; if so, it is a fault. But you may have been obedient, and even then you need to face this question: "Do you believe on Jesus?" No religious observances, however perfectly carried out, can save you. You must believe on Jesus.

Then too, the man had passed through considerable experiences as the result of his obedience. He had been born blind, but as the result of Jesus' intervention in his life he had come to see. How could he forget the long years of darkness? He had lived in the dark throughout his youth and through much of his manhood. But now Jesus had healed him, and the light that he had never known before streamed in upon him. Here was a great change. It was a great experience. Still he needed to answer Christ's question: "Do you believe in the Son of Man?"

In the same way, the question needs to be asked of such persons today. Are you one who has tried to substitute religion, even Christian experience, for true faith? Perhaps you have been to a meeting in which the preaching has been eloquent and the spirit enthusiastic. Perhaps you have been moved to tears in such a meeting. Perhaps you have even come forward in response to an invitation. Perhaps you have received the so-called baptism of the Holy Spirit so that you have been able to speak in tongues or some such thing. Even you need to face this question. Experiences do not save anyone. Only Jesus saves. Consequently, you need to examine your relationship to him. Do you believe on Jesus? Jesus knows that changes have taken place in your life, just as he knew that changes had taken place in the life of the man who had been born blind. Yet he presses this question upon you.

Notice also that the blind man had borne a courageous testimony for Jesus, yet he still needed to answer this question. And what a great testimony he gave! It was not more than he knew. It was all that he knew. It was so well grounded in fact and so well supported by reason that it confounded the arguments even of the religious leaders of his day. Yet Jesus seeks him out and asks him this question. Are you such a one? Perhaps you have grown up in a Christian church and have even been asked to give a testimony on occasion. You have done it. You have spoken of the blessing of God in your life. You have spoken of Jesus, perhaps even of the fact that he died on the cross and that you are thankful that he loved you enough to do it. Yet you have never really believed on him. Such things are possible. And since they are possible the question I am asking is for everyone. Do you believe on Jesus? This question is for elders. It is for deacons. It is for Sunday school teachers. It is for parents, grandparents, and children. Do you believe on the Son of God? God grant that you may be able to answer that affirmatively and with full confidence.

Finally, notice that the man had also suffered for the cause of Christ. He gave his testimony to Christ and then had been thrown out of the synagogue. He was a dejected man when Christ found him. Still Jesus asked this question. In the same way, you may have suffered for Christ's cause and still have failed to believe on him unto salvation. Have you believed? Do not fail to ask yourself this question today and do not fail to answer it as Jesus wants you to do. Say, "Yes, Lord, I do believe on you. I believe that you died for my sin, and I do place my faith in you for salvation."

An Inescapable Question

A few more things need to be said in conclusion. First, you need to know that if you do not face this question now, you must face it later; for the question itself is inescapable. The very nature of the question makes it inescapable. Your answer must be a yes or a no. A maybe is a no. A delayed answer is a no. Even to fail to answer it entirely is a no. So if you have heard it, you must answer it. In addition, however, it is also true that you must answer it in the day of God's judgment, even if you have tried to avoid it in this life. This will be the basis of God's judgment. Have you believed on Jesus? If you have not yet believed, now is the time to do so.

Second, you should know that the question can be settled now. Perhaps you have agreed with me that this question is important, and you want to believe. Well, then, you can. In one of his messages, the great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon tells of a pastor whom he knew who had become converted suddenly in the midst of one of his own sermons. The pastor was much like the man who had been born blind. He had obeyed Christ. He had passed through considerable spiritual experience. He had witnessed for Christ. He had even suffered for him to some degree. Nevertheless, he was not converted. One Sunday as he was preaching he was taken up with the truth of the gospel. He was so taken up with it, in fact, that it affected his normal mode of speaking and he found himself declaring the truth concerning Christ's death with utmost conviction. The congregation began to notice the change. At last a Methodist, who was in the church, shouted out, "The preacher is converted; hallelujah!"

The others said, "Well, we believe he is too."

The pastor stopped preaching and added, "I believe you are right. Something wonderful has happened to me. I do believe on Jesus." Then all together they stood and sang "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." The question can be settled now. It can be settled instantly.

Finally, you should know that if you are having difficulty answering this question, you can have help from Jesus. You may be saying, "I would like to answer yes to this question, but I do not know that I can. I am not sure that Jesus is the Son of God or that I can believe on him." If that is the case, do what the man who had been born blind did. Ask Jesus to help you.

The man had been cast out, and Jesus had come to him asking, "Do you believe in the Son of Man?"

The man did not know whether he did or not because he did not know who the Son of Man was. So he turned to Jesus and asked him, "Who is he, sir? Tell me so that I may believe in him" (v. 36).

At this point Jesus revealed himself to the blind man. He answered his question, "You have seen him now; in fact, he is the one speaking with you" (v. 37). As a result the man born blind believed and worshiped him.

If you are having difficulty with these matters, turn to the One who helped the blind man. He has already helped you much or you would not even be considering the question. You would not even understand what it means unless he had already given you understanding. Well, then, turn to him. Ask him, "Who is he, Lord, that I should believe on him?" If you do, he will point you to himself and will lead you to true faith. Do you believe in the Son of Man? Let your heart say, "Yes, I believe." Then tell someone else about it.

Chapter 120.
Are We Blind Also?

John 9:39-41

I am fairly certain that the biblical writers never heard a joke in the "good news/bad news" category. But I am equally certain that the apostle John would have understood if someone had told him that parts of his Gospel have those characteristics. A good news/bad news joke is one like that involving the captain of a slave galley. The captain comes to the slaves one morning and asks them to put down their oars. Then he says, "Gentlemen, I have some news for you. Some of it is good and some of it is bad. I'm going to give you the good news first. Tomorrow we're going to dock at Caesarea, and you will all be getting shore leave. There will be plenty of parties, and you can all do anything you want. Now, the bad news. Today, the admiral wants to go water skiing."

Parts of John's Gospel have those characteristics. Thus we find a statement of the best news— that anyone who believes on the Lord Jesus Christ will be saved—followed by the worst, namely, that any who do not believe not only will be condemned but are condemned already. The difference lies in the fact that in John's case the good news/bad news is not funny.

This comparison is seen in the third chapter between verses 16 and 18—"For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish. ...Whoever does not believe stands condemned already." The contrast appears in chapter 12, in the words of Jesus—"I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness. ...There is a judge for the one who rejects me, and does not accept my words" (vv. 46, 48). The same is found in our text. In the verses we have just looked at we have discovered a great question used by Jesus to assist the growth in faith of the man born blind— "Do you believe in the Son of Man?" Now we see the dark side of the matter, as Jesus declares, "For judgment I have come into this world, so that the blind will see and those who see will become blind" (John 9:39).

Christ's Present Judgment

The way in which the statement is put should at once show us the nature of the present judgment about which Christ is speaking. It should also help us understand why there is no real contradiction between this verse and others in which Jesus says that he has not come to judge. In 12:47 Jesus says, "I did not come to judge the world but to save it." But that verse obviously is speaking of the immediate object of his coming-to die for our sin. In our text he is speaking of the indirect moral effect on everybody of his presence in the world, according to which some believe on him and others reject him.

We are helped to understand the nature of this effect by the illustration regarding the sun's light that we used earlier. The purpose of the sun is to warm things and make plants grow. Coupled with the effect of the warm spring rains the sun will make seeds germinate and will bring plants to flower and trees to foliage. At the same time, however, the light will also drive away the creatures of darkness, so that bugs and crawly things will slither away into dark places if the light of the sun is suddenly made to shine upon them. These were precisely the effects that the Lord Jesus Christ had on his contemporaries. He was the light of the world, as he said (John 8:12; 9:5). As the light of the world he caused faith to sprout and that which was alive spiritually to grow. A perfect example is the growth of the man who had been born blind. On the other hand, he also repelled the religious leaders who, as creatures of darkness, hated him and wished to extinguish his light.

In these concluding remarks on the incident of the healing of the blind man, Jesus says this in terms of blindness and sight. To some, like the man born blind, he was the restorer of spiritual sight. To others, like those who thought they could see, he caused an even greater darkness.

Moreover, if this was true of the moral effect of his life (which it is), it is more true of the effect of his death by crucifixion; for it is at the cross that the division concerning Christ is most apparent. Most persons do not have trouble accepting Jesus of Nazareth as a teacher. There have been many teachers in the long course of the world's history. There will be many more. We would be badly off without them. Hence, Jesus as a teacher is not offensive. But Jesus crucified—well, that is another matter. For a Jesus crucified speaks of man's inability to save himself, of the supremacy of Jesus by which he alone is able to make atonement for sins, of the truth that there is only one way of salvation, and that there is a future judgment against sin for any who reject him. Because of these truths the cross is indeed a stumbling block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks, as the apostle Paul discovered through his preaching (1 Cor. 1:23).

Years ago, on a trip through the western part of the United States, I visited a point along the Continental Divide high in the Rocky Mountains of Colorado at which the waters of a small stream separate in order to begin two long and very diverse journeys, one leading to the Atlantic Ocean on the eastern coast of the United States, the other to the Pacific Ocean on the west. The dividing point is a rock in the middle of the stream. One drop of water striking that rock might turn west, with the result that it would flow into a small stream that in turn flowed into another one and another one until it entered the White River of Utah, then the Grand River, followed by the Colorado, the Gulf of California, and eventually the Pacific Ocean. Another drop, turning east, would flow through various small streams into the North Platte River and from there into the Missouri, Mississippi, Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic. The destinies of the two drops are entirely different, though the turning point is a very small one at the rock. In the same way, the cross of Jesus is the rock that is the true turning point in man's destiny. Those who believe enter into eternal life and go on to eternal happiness in the presence of God. Those who reject Christ reject God and go on being separated from him forever.

So the conclusion of the first part of the study is this. Take heed to your relationship to Christ. Your relationship to him is not inconsequential. How you respond to him determines your destiny. Will you reject him? Or will you believe? The story of the blind man is told so that you and I might be like the blind man and believe on Jesus, rather than being like the Pharisees.

Those Who Are Blind

The verses we are studying also give indication of what is wrong with those who will not believe on Jesus. That is, it reveals their characteristics.

One characteristic is that they have no sense of need. They are all right by their own standards, and since they do all right by their own standards they imagine that they will do all right by God's. This is the point of the question that the religious leaders asked Jesus. He had just stated that one purpose of his coming into the world was to cause those who see to become blind. He did not mean by this that those who rejected him could actually see spiritually, but rather that they thought they could see (though actually blind) and therefore would not come to Jesus. But this offended them more. So they asked—we must understand the question to have been asked sarcastically—"Are we blind too?" (v. 40). The point of the question was to highlight how ridiculous the teaching of Jesus was in their opinion. How could he suggest that they might be blind? If he did, his opinion could hardly be taken seriously. Pharisees blind? How hilarious! Yet they were blind, and they showed it nowhere more strongly than in their total absence of a sense of need.

The second characteristic of these men was that they considered the teachings of Jesus foolish.
They had dismissed them as foolishness before—"Aren't we right in saying that you are a Samaritan and demon-possessed?" (8:48). They would do so again—"Many of them said, 'He is demon-possessed and raving mad. Why listen to him?'" (10:20). But they considered Christ's teachings to be foolish because they did not want to hear him and because their own judgment had been blinded by sin.

Finally, these men were also characterized as being guilty for their sin in rejecting Jesus. There is an interesting twist to the conversation that indicates this. When the Pharisees asked sarcastically, "Are we blind too?" they undoubtedly expected Jesus to answer that indeed they were. This was only what they could expect from one whom they had opposed so forcefully. But Jesus does not say this. It is true that in one sense they were blind. The story of the healing of the blind man is told to make this point among others. Nevertheless, Jesus does not actually say this in his reply. He turns it a bit and, instead of saying, "Yes, you are blind," he says that if they actually were blind, they would be guiltless. That is, they would have an excuse. But they were not totally blind. They knew the Scriptures and therefore were guilty. In the context of this discussion Jesus can only mean that they are guilty before the law, for it is a sin for men who know the law to act as they do. Leon Morris, one of the best commentators on John's Gospel, says, "His meaning is that they have enough spiritual knowledge to be responsible. Had they acted on the best knowledge they had they would have welcomed the Son of God. But they did not act on this. They claimed to have sight, but acted like the blind. Therefore their sin is not taken away. It remains with them."

Those Who Come

These, then, are the characteristics of those who are offended by Jesus. They are unaware of their need. They consider the teachings of Christ foolish. They are guilty before the great God with whom they have to do. How different are the characteristics of those who come to him!

First of all, these admit their need. They cannot see, but, like the blind man, they know they cannot see. They know that their case is hopeless unless the God of miracles should help them.
Second, they have all met Jesus and have found his teachings both comforting and reasonable.
There may be much they do not understand, but what they do understand makes sense. Therefore, they want to learn more. Third, they have obeyed Jesus. He has anointed their eyes, and they have gone to the source of living water, the Word of God, with which they have washed the clay away and then have returned seeing. Finally, and as the result of these things, they have found themselves growing in the knowledge of him and have found themselves worshiping at his feet. None of this has been due to themselves or to their spiritual ability—they have none—but solely to the grace of God that sought them out and healed them unasked. Such are God's children. Such are those who believe and whose guilt is washed away by Christ's blood.

Jesus died for these people. His death was the atonement for their sins so that the guilt of their sin might never rise up before them again. As a result of that death their sin has been removed as far as the east is from the west. It is blotted out as with a thick cloud. It is buried in the depths of the sea. It is forgiven, forgotten, and gone. As a result of Christ's death God is able to clothe these, his people, with the robes of Christ's righteousness, so that they might stand before him as acceptably as Jesus himself. He has made them heirs with Christ of all his riches. He has made them a kingdom of priests unto himself forever.

In which camp are you? Which way have you turned at Christ's cross? Is the gospel good news or bad news for you? If you have not yet believed, then the fullest extent of the good news is to be found in the fact that it is not too late for you to believe on Jesus. Believe on him. Even now you can find him to be the doorway to salvation.

A Future Judgment

We could certainly stop at this point, and it would be nice to do so. But since we are thinking of Christ's role as a divider of men, it is only honest to point out that his greatest acts in filling that role are yet future. They are those associated with his role in the final judgment, spoken about in many places in Scripture.

One such reference is from Acts. In that book, in the seventeenth chapter, there is a report of one of Paul's great sermons delivered on Mars Hill in Athens to an assembled crowd of Greeks. First, Paul speaks of the Greeks' obvious awareness of a divine being. He adds to this that they are also obviously unsure of who God is and of his nature. They worship him ignorantly, Paul says; and God has been patient. In these days, however, God calls upon all men to repent—that is, to turn from sin and to take sides with Christ—declaring that they must do so in that "he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed. He has given proof of this to all men by raising him from the dead" (Acts 17:31). It is possible to repent now, says Paul, but it will not always be so. For one day the same Christ who is an indirect divider of men now will be directly active in judgment, sin will be punished, and those who will not repent will be separated from God forever.

Are you saying as you read these words, "What are you trying to do, frighten me?" If you are saying this, I must admit that in a sense I am; for I could desire so to frighten you that you would turn from your sin and blindness to Christ, becoming God's son or daughter, and thereby not be frightened in a greater sense in the day of Christ's last judgment.

Suppose that a group of criminals has kidnapped your son and is holding him hostage. They think they cannot be discovered. But through the work of the police their hideout is detected and the building surrounded. Suddenly in the midst of their supposed peace and safety, the door bursts open and you and the armed officers enter. There is your son, and there are the gangsters. What is the attitude of each? The attitude of your child is one of delight and love as he immediately springs from his corner and rushes toward you. The attitude of the gangsters is of fright and a knowledge of their certain doom. So it will be at Christ's second coming to render his permanent judgment. Therefore, if the Bible and those who teach it do speak of judgment, it is that you might fear that greater fear and turn to the Lord Jesus Christ while there is hope.

Today the hand of God is extended toward you in grace. Will you not take that hand and receive the amnesty God offers? The doom of future judgment is one we all deserve, but it is one that Jesus has taken on himself for all who will trust him. Trust him, and ask him to be your Savior.

Chapter 121.
The Parable of the Good Shepherd

John 10:1-6

John 10 is a wonderful chapter in this most wonderful of books, rightly beloved by Christians everywhere. The reason lies in its striking portrait of Jesus Christ as the Good Shepherd and of ourselves as his sheep.

That this portrait has been beloved by Christians from every culture and from every period of history is easy to demonstrate, for the evidence abounds in Christian art and literature. A number of years ago on one of my trips through Italy, I had opportunity to visit Ravenna and spend some time among the masterpieces of Byzantine art and architecture to be found there. I thought that one of these was particularly interesting. On one of the walls of the burial chamber of Galla Placidia, a sister of one of the early Byzantine emperors, there is a mosaic portraying Christ as the Good Shepherd. He is seated on a low outcropping of rock, holding a shepherd's staff in the form of a cross, while the sheep gather around him. He strokes the head of one sheep. One sheep looks on. Another seems to be wandering away. In the background, water bursts from a rock in the midst of a verdant garden. The whole is composed of the softest shades of blue, green, yellow, and gold. No one who has seen that picture can miss the thought that the one who follows Christ will not lack any good thing. The artist seems to have been saying of him:

> The LORD is my shepherd; I shall > not be in want. he makes me lie > down in green pastures, > he leads me beside > quiet waters, he > restores my soul.

Christ's sheep will indeed be provided with all good things and will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

It is not just in the Twenty-third Psalm that this image is found, however. It is found in many places throughout the Old and New Testaments. The psalmist wrote, "We are his people, the sheep of his pasture" (Ps. 100:3). Isaiah declared, "He tends his flock like a shepherd. He gathers the lambs in his arms and carries them close to his heart; he gently leads those that have young" (Isa. 40:11). Mark wrote that Jesus had pity upon the crowds because "they were like sheep without a shepherd" (Mark 6:34). Before his crucifixion Jesus referred to Isaiah's prophecy of the suffering servant, saying, "You will all fall away, ...for it is written: 'I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered'" (Mark 14:27). The author of Hebrews spoke of Jesus as the "great Shepherd" (Heb. 13:20). Peter saw him as the "Chief Shepherd" to whom the undershepherds are responsible (1 Peter 5:4).

From this rich mine of biblical imagery the parable of the Good Shepherd, which begins the tenth chapter of John's Gospel, is taken. "I tell you the truth, the man who does not enter the sheep pen by the gate but climbs in by some other way, is a thief and a robber. The man who enters by the gate is the shepherd of his sheep. The watchman opens the gate for him and the sheep listen to his voice. He calls his sheep by name and leads them out. When he has brought out all his own, he goes ahead of them, and his sheep follow him because they know his voice. They will not follow a stranger; in fact, they will run away from him because they do not recognize a stranger's voice" (John 10:1-5).

The image speaks to us of the underlying sympathy between the shepherd and his sheep and of the unfailing love and vigilance of the Great Shepherd.

Shepherds, Thieves, and Sheepfolds

In view of the wide use of the shepherd theme throughout the Bible one would think that the shepherd parable in John 10 would be easy to interpret. But this is not the case, if we are to judge by the various interpretations given to it. In one interpretation the sheepfold is the world. In another it is the church. In a third it is heaven. In one interpretation the sheep are all mankind, in another only the Jews. All would agree that the shepherd is Jesus. But who is the porter? Who are the thieves? And how can Jesus be both the shepherd and the door of the sheepfold at the same time?

I believe that these diverse views arise from a failure (1) to take the story in context and (2) to recognize that Jesus is playing upon various aspects of the shepherd imagery, much as a composer might develop variations upon a musical theme.

The greatest failure is to neglect to take the story in its context. It is to be found in the preceding chapter in the story of the man born blind and in his mistreatment by those who were the leaders of the people. This is obvious because of the absence of any transitional words at the beginning of chapter 10. When John indicates a transition either geographically or in time he usually says something like "after these things," "after this," "on the next day," or "as Jesus passed by." Here the words of Jesus flow on immediately after his comments about the Pharisees at the end of chapter 9 and therefore are related to them. This does not mean that they were necessarily spoken on the same occasion. They may have been spoken later; in fact, they probably were. But it does mean that Jesus had the incident of the blind man in view as he told the parable.

As soon as we recognize this, we recognize that the thieves and robbers must refer to the false shepherds of Israel (the Pharisees) and that the sheepfold represents Judaism. The ones who hear Christ's voice and respond to his call are those of his own who are within Israel, of whom the man born blind is an example.

This understanding of the parable is further encouraged when we recognize the particular aspect of the shepherd imagery upon which Jesus is playing in these first verses—which, by the way, is not the same as that used later. In this chapter there are two kinds of sheepfolds. The first kind of sheepfold was that found in the countryside. It was nothing more than a circle of rocks into which the sheep could be driven. There was no door, just an opening across which the shepherd would place his body. This is the kind of sheepfold that Jesus is thinking about when he says, "I am the gate for the sheep, "just a verse or so later. The other kind of sheepfold was more substantial. This kind was found in the towns and villages and consisted of a room or enclosure with a regular gate or door. Into such an enclosure many shepherds together would drive their flocks when they returned to the village at night, and at such a place at night the sheep would be in the care of a porter. In the morning each shepherd would come to the fold, call his sheep by name —they, incidentally, literally knew his voice and would respond to his call—and then lead his own sheep out to pasture. This is the kind of sheepfold about which Christ is thinking in this parable.

What is the sheepfold then? It is not heaven, for thieves and robbers do not climb up into heaven. It is not the church, for the shepherd does not lead his flock out of that, as he does here. The sheepfold is Judaism, as we have already been led to suspect from the context of chapter 9; and the point is that Jesus presented himself to Judaism in order to call out from that body those whom God had given him. Later he says that he will soon call out sheep from other folds that there might be one great flock, the church, and one shepherd (v. 16). The porter—if we must identify him—is God, or God's Holy Spirit, who opens to Christ and releases the sheep to Christ's call.

The Shepherd and His Sheep

Having understood the parable of the sheepfold, sheep, porter, and thieves, we can now reflect upon it for what it teaches spiritually. What are the lessons of this parable?

First, the parable teaches that the Lord Jesus Christ knows his sheep and that it is a wonderful thing to be known by him. This truth is implied in verse 3 ("he calls his own sheep by name"). It is stated even more explicitly in verse 14 ("I am the good shepherd; I know my sheep and they know me"). Moreover, according to the further teaching of this chapter, the sheep are known to Christ because they have been given to him by the Father (v. 29), and it is for these and not for all sheep that the shepherd dies (vv. 14-15). What a wonderful collection of truths this is! God has given a certain number of individuals to Christ. Jesus knows who they are. And he dies for them in order that the way to heaven might be provided for them and that they might be safe.

Have you ever noticed that all this is done on behalf of God's chosen ones, even though God knows they are sinners and do not deserve it? Jesus not only knows us; he knows us as we are, and yet he died for us. Here Paul's words in Romans throw light on Christ's teaching. In the wonderful section of Romans 5 in which Paul writes of the results of our justification, there is a parenthetical statement saying that Christ died for us even though we were sinners: "When we were still powerless, Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:6-8). These verses are intended to help us to get our minds off ourselves and instead to rest in Christ's love.

While we were sinners, Christ died for us. That is a great truth; for if it were otherwise—if Christ did not know us or does not now know that we are sinners—we might fear that some fresh revelation of sin in us might discourage him and weaken his love. "As it is," says Bishop Brooke Foss Westcott, "nothing in his flock is hidden from him: their weaknesses, their failures, their temptations, their sins, the good which they have neglected when it was within reach, the evil which they have pursued when it lay afar. All is open before his eyes. He knows them ... and he loves them still."

Second, the parable teaches us that having known them, Jesus calls his sheep and that he does so by name (v. 3). This is the doctrine of election, which is so prominent in John's Gospel. It is not liked. It is not often preached. But it is in Scripture and must be preached, above all by anyone who is serious about expounding this Gospel. For what is the central point of Christ's parable? Election! That is the point. It is that God has given some sheep to the Lord Jesus and that Jesus comes to the door of the sheepfold and, knowing his sheep in advance, calls to them and leads them out. Not all people are saved. Jesus did not call the Pharisees. But all those are saved whom God has given to Jesus. Indeed, these shall never perish, never be taken from Jesus (v. 28).

This is not an impersonal, still less an arbitrary decree, however, though some have charged this. It is a very tender and personal thing, for Jesus says that the shepherd calls his own sheep by name. Being called by name, they follow him. In his commentary Arthur W. Pink points out a number of illustrations throughout the Gospels. "'And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose, and followed him' (Matt. 9:9). Here was a lone sheep of Christ. The Shepherd called him; he recognized His voice, and promptly followed Him.

"'And when Jesus came to the place, he looked up, and saw him, and said unto him, Zacchaeus, make haste, and come down; for today I must abide at thy house' (Luke 19:5). Here was one of the sheep, called by name. The response was prompt, for we are told, 'And he made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully' (v. 6).

"'The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me' (John 1:43). This shows us the Shepherd seeking His sheep before He called him. "John 11 supplies us with a still more striking example of the drawing power of the Shepherd's voice as He calleth His own sheep. There we read of Lazarus, in the grave; but when Christ calls His sheep by name —'Lazarus, come forth'—the sheep at once responded.

"As a touching example of the sheep knowing His voice we refer ... to John 20. Mary Magdalene visited the Saviour's sepulchre in the early morning hour. She finds the stone rolled away, and the body of the Lord gone. Disconsolate, she stands there weeping. Suddenly she sees the Lord Jesus standing by her, and 'knew not that it was Jesus.' He speaks to her, but she supposed Him to be the gardener. A moment later she identified Him, and says, 'Rabboni.' What had happened in the interval? What enabled her to identify Him? Just one word from him—'Mary'! The moment He called His sheep by name she knew his voice!"

This is the way it has always been, and it is how the call comes today. It is how he calls you. He knows you, of course, as we have seen. He knows you with all your failures and sin. But he also knows what he is going to make of you. As Paul writes, "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:29-30). This is what he intends to do—make you like himself, glorify you. For this end you are called. Mary! John! Peter! Susan! James! Do you hear his call? It is a wonderful thing to be known personally by the great God of the universe, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Finally, the parable teaches us that having known his own sheep and having called them, the Lord Jesus Christ leads them out (v. 3). To what does he lead them? To his own great flock, the church, and into green pastures. From what does he lead them? The answer is from anything that would keep them from his pasture. We have already seen one example in this story. Jesus led the man who had been born blind out of Judaism. But there are other examples. Later he will speak of other sheep and other folds, and he will state his intention to lead those sheep out of those lesser allegiances. The lesser allegiances can be many things. Jesus had led some out of paganism. He has led others out of western materialism. He has led some out of communism, some out of the worship of knowledge, some out of the rat race generated by our competitive society. These are our sheepfolds, whatever they may be, and it is from these that Christ calls us. Perhaps he is calling you from some lesser allegiance at this moment.

Hearing the Call

The story tells us that when Jesus told this parable the first time "they did not understand what he was telling them" (v. 6). But you have no reason not to understand. Moreover, if you are hearing Christ's call, you should respond to him quickly. To hear Christ's call is not the same thing as responding to emotional pressure in an evangelistic service. It is not the same as agreeing to become a member of a church. It is not agreeing to do anything. It is hearing, hearing Christ deep within your own spirit and personality. I will tell you what it is like. It is, above all, arriving at the conviction that what the Bible says regarding your need and the love of the Lord Jesus in answer to that need is true and that you should respond to it.

Have you been sensing that? Have you been saying, "Yes, what I am hearing is true. I have been waiting all my life for this. This is that for which I have been made"? If you have, do not make the mistake of being slow to answer Christ's call. Respond immediately, as Zacchaeus did and many millions of others have done, and follow Jesus. He is the Great Shepherd. Those who follow him do not want for any good thing.

Chapter 122.
"I Am the Gate"

John 10:7-9

The parable of the Good Shepherd is familiar and generally understood because it has been told so many times. But when the parable was spoken the first time, it was not understood. Thus, in developing the image, Christ changed it slightly, this time speaking of a second kind of sheep pen and of himself as the gate of the sheep rather than as the shepherd. This development throws more light on Christ's parable and prepares for the explicit identification of Jesus as the Good Shepherd (John 10:7-9).

A Rustic Sheep Pen

In our last study, as we began to talk about the ways of keeping sheep in Christ's day, we saw that there were two kinds of sheep pen. The first is the kind in view in the opening verses of this chapter. This kind of sheep pen was in the cities and villages. It was fairly large, large enough to hold several flocks of sheep at any rate, and it was public. Moreover, it was fairly substantial. A sheep pen like this was in the care of a porter, whose duty it was to guard the gate during the night and to admit the shepherds in the morning. The shepherds would call their sheep, each of whom knew his own shepherd's voice, and would lead them out to pasture. We saw from the context of this parable that by it Jesus was referring to his role in calling his own sheep out of Judaism.

The second kind of sheep pen was not public, nor was it in the villages. This sheep pen was in the countryside, where the shepherds would keep their flocks in good weather. Presumably this is where the shepherds were keeping their sheep at the time of Christ's birth when the angels appeared to them and invited them to Bethlehem. This type of sheep pen was nothing more than a rough circle of rocks piled into a wall with a small open space, a gate, through which the shepherd would drive the sheep at nightfall. Since there was no gate to close—just an opening—the shepherd would keep the sheep in and wild animals out by lying across the opening. He would sleep there, in this case literally becoming the gate. Clearly, this is the kind of sheep pen about which Jesus is speaking in the further development of the parable.

"I am the gate for the sheep." In this section Jesus is the gate. He speaks of leading his flock in rather than of leading them out. He talks about the church itself rather than about calling the church out of Judaism. In other words, he is dealing now with a particular body of people committed to his care and he is revealing the relationship in which he stands to them.

Only One Gate

What does this image teach us about Christianity then? What does the gate teach us about Jesus Christ? First, it obviously teaches that there is only one gate, meaning that Jesus is the sole way to God. This point is evident from the nature of the sheep pen that Christ had in view—if it had more than one gate, it would have been useless—and it is reinforced from many of Christ's other sayings. Thus, to give but one example, Christ says in the fourteenth chapter, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (v. 6).

This is crucial for Christianity. It is not so for other religions. It would make little difference to most of the world's religions if their founder were someone else, or even if they had no founder at all; for essentially they are collections of spiritual truths (or claims to truth) and methods, all of which could exist without their founder. They needed someone to discover them, of course. But the point is that anyone could have discovered them and that once they were discovered they existed in their own right much like scientific propositions. Besides, if they became lost, they could be rediscovered. This is the nature of the world's religions. Christianity is not in this category. Nor is Jesus like these other religious figures. Jesus did not claim merely to know the truth; he said that he is the truth. He did not merely show the way to God; he said that he is the way. Therefore, within Christianity, if there is no Christ, there is no way to God, no truth about God, and no vitality.

How could Jesus make such claims? If he were only a man, they are preposterous, of course. On the other hand, if he is who he said he is and if he did what he said he would do, they make sense. Jesus claimed to be God and to have come to earth to die for our sin. We deserve to die for our own sin, both physically and spiritually. We deserve to be separated from God. But Jesus died in our place. He who was sinless accepted the guilt of our sin and died for us. No one else could do it, but he could and did. Thus, he literally became the gate by which sinful people can approach God the Father. The author of the Book of Hebrews called him "a new and living way" (10:20). Paul wrote, "through him we ... have access ... to the Father" (Eph. 2:18).

We must admit at this point that the claim of Jesus Christ to be the gate is a contested claim, contested by those whom he terms "thieves and robbers." Yet, as Christians believe, it is a claim that can stand up to scrutiny.

There are two kinds of such men, and Jesus uses two different words to describe them. The first word is kleptēs, from which we get our word kleptomaniac. It refers to one who steals cunningly or by stealth. The other word is lēstēs, for which we have no English derivative. It refers to one who steals by violence. Thus, if we may imagine the first word to refer to someone who carries off department store merchandise under a coat, the second would refer to those who might use guns to rob a bank.

In the religious world both types are prominent. The first type uses cunning, as Satan did in his approach to Eve in the Garden—"Did God really say... ?" (Gen. 3:1). In this category are all who raise doubts in the minds of others—unbelieving ministers, Sunday school teachers, and professors of theology. By their questions they turn the minds of their learners away from Christ and instead cause them to rely upon the supposed wisdom of the teacher. These are those whom Paul terms "treacherous, rash, conceited, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God—having a form of godliness but denying its power." He advises, "Have nothing to do with them" (2 Tim. 3:4-5). The other type is violent, for he thrusts himself into a place of authority in the church and demands that others follow him. The Bible terms this ecclesiastical tyranny the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which God hates (Rev. 2:15).

There is only one gate, according to Christ's image; and Christ himself is the gate. Many have found this claim to be valid and have been willing to be sheep in his pasture.

For Any Man

The first lesson of the image, then, is an exclusive one—there is only one door. But there is a second lesson that is correspondingly broad. It is that anyone may enter it. Jesus indicates this in verse 9: "whoever enters through me will be saved. He will come in and go out, and find pasture."

This verse has sometimes been taken in a way that contradicts John 6:44, which says: "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him." But those who dislike John 6:44 either completely disregard it or else try to use our text to overturn its plain meaning. Actually the two verses are not in conflict. John 6:44 looks at the matter from the Godward side and declares, rightly, that no man ever made the first move toward God. Men come to God only because God draws them. On the other hand, as our text from John 10 shows, God does not respect persons; therefore, any man, regardless of who he is or where he comes from, may be among that number. Let me put it this way: the call of God is not restricted by anything we can imagine. It is not restricted on the basis of race, education, social position, wealth, achievements, good deeds, or anything else. Therefore, there is no reason why you (whoever you are) should not be among the number of those whom God draws to Jesus.

Do you hesitate to believe that? If so, look at the state of the man who had been blind and for whose sake the parable of the Good Shepherd was told. He had nothing; he was a beggar. He was nothing; no one would have paid attention to him for more than a moment, and then normally only to push him out of the way. Yet this man, despised by every one else, was saved by Jesus. Certainly, if this beggar could have entered in, then any one can. You can. So can others.

You Must Enter

But you must enter in; this is the third lesson that Christ's image teaches. To enter, in this verse, is the same thing as to "eat" of Jesus, "drink" of Jesus, or "come" to Jesus, all of which we have looked at earlier. It means to believe on him or trust him and do this personally.

I am sure that this is precisely why Jesus calls himself "the gate for the sheep." As the phrase stands it is a bit peculiar. We might say, "the door through which the sheep enter" or "the door to the sheep." But "the gate for the sheep"—well, that is just not good English idiom. If we change this into another form, however, then I believe we can understand it. We can understand it if we say "the sheep's door." What is the difference? Only that this particular form of the phrase makes the door personal. It makes clear that we are not talking about an abstract principle or concept. We are not trusting an object. We trust a person, Jesus Christ. And, because Jesus gave himself for us by dying for our sin, we find that he becomes ours through our believing on him, just as surely as we have become his by the same act.

Have you believed on him? It is not hard. There is no complicated course to follow. If Jesus had compared himself to a wall we should have to climb over, it might be hard work. If he had compared himself to a long, dark passageway, we should have to feel along it; some might be afraid to try. But he is not a wall or a passageway. He is a gate, and a gate can be entered easily and instantly.

Let me demonstrate how instantly by this story. A number of years ago a woman sat in a pew in the Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which I now serve as pastor. At the time, the pastor was Donald Grey Barnhouse. He was talking about the cross and of the need to believe on the Christ who died upon it. The woman I am talking about was not a Christian. She had been raised in a religious home and had heard about Jesus. She had heard about the cross. But she did not understand these things and therefore obviously had never actually trusted in Jesus for her salvation. In order to make clear that for salvation only belief in Jesus Christ is necessary Barnhouse said, "Imagine that the cross has a door in it. All you are asked to do is to go through. On one side, the side facing you, there is written an invitation: 'Whosoever will, may come.'

You stand there with your sin upon you and wonder if you should enter or not. Finally you do, and as you do the burden of your sin drops away. You are safe and free. Joyfully you then turn around and see written on the backside of the cross, through which you have now entered, the words 'Chosen in him before the foundation of the world.'" Barnhouse then invited those who were listening to enter.

The woman later said that this was the first time in her life that she had really understood what it meant to be a Christian and that in understanding it, she had believed. She believed right there— in that church at that moment. She entered the door. Moreover, the rest of her life bore witness to the fact that a great change had occurred and that she was God's child. I am certain of the facts of this story because that woman was my mother.

Three Benefits

Finally, I want you to see that these verses also speak of three great benefits of entering into God's flock through Christ. They are consequences of belief in one sense. In another sense they are inducements to come. Each begins with an "s," so I know you can remember them.

First, Jesus says that anyone who enters in will be saved. This promise is not the limited promise that we sometimes make it out to be. That is, it is not purely future, as if Jesus were offering a "pie in the sky by and by" salvation. Salvation is partially future; that belongs to it. But it is also past and present. It affects who we are and what happens to us from beginning to end. A better way of talking about it is in terms of sin's penalty, power, and presence. By entering in through Christ we immediately escape sin's penalty, so that we need not fear our sins will ever rise up against us. This is justification. Then, too, we also enter into a life in which we are increasingly delivered from sin's power. The Bible calls this sanctification. Finally, we look forward to a day marked by the return of Christ or else our passing into his presence through death, in which even the presence of sin will be gone and our salvation will be perfected. The Bible calls this glorification.

Second, Jesus promises that anyone who enters in will be safe. This is the point of his reference to going "in and out." If we did not know better from other references and from a knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic idiom, we might think that this referred to entering and leaving the church or to salvation itself. But this is not what Christ means. To be able to go in and out means security (cf. Deut. 28:6; 1 Kings 3:7; Ps. 121:8), for in Christ's day when a man could go in or out without fear it meant that his country was at peace and that the ruler had the affairs of the nation under control. When danger threatened, the people were shut up in the cities under siege. Thus, Jesus promises safety for those who trust him.

Third, he also promised that they would be satisfied—saved, safe, and satisfied—for he said that they would be able to go in and out and "find pasture." Palestine is a barren land for the most part, and good pasture was not easy to find. Consequently, to be assured of good pasture was a wonderful thing. It spoke of prosperity and contentment, of health and happiness. It was in this sense that David wrote of the care of his Good Shepherd: "He makes me lie down in green pastures, he leads me beside quiet waters, he restores my soul" (Ps. 23:2-3). It was this that Paul wrote of when he told the Philippians, "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (4:19). This last verse does not speak of all our desires, of course. We often desire that which is wrong or is not good for us. It speaks only of our needs, but even in that form it is a great promise. It is the promise that the one who enters in by Christ will not lack any good thing.

God Provides

Finally, let me indicate one more verse by way of conclusion. It comes from the Old Testament, from a passage in which Moses is asking God to raise up a leader for the people. Moses is about to die, and he wants God to provide a person to succeed him. "Moses said to the Lord, 'May the Lord, the God of the spirits of all mankind, appoint a man over this community who will lead them out and bring them in, so the Lord's people will not be like sheep without a shepherd'" (Num. 27:15-17). In the context of this book God answers the prayer of Moses by choosing Joshua, who then goes on to lead the people in the conquest of the Promised Land. But in the longer view God answered that prayer through the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the Great Shepherd, our Savior. He leads us in, and he leads us out. Under his care we find pasture.

Chapter 123.
Life, More Life

John 10:10

I am pausing in our study of the tenth chapter of John's Gospel to give particular attention to verse 10; for it contains an idea that has become popular in some Christian circles, and it is important that we understand it. The idea is that of the abundant life. Verse 10 suggests it: "The thief comes only to steal and kill and destroy; I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full."

What is the full or abundant life? It is not necessarily a long life, although there are verses that promise a long life to some, such as to those who honor their father and mother (Exod. 20:12; cf. Eph. 6:2-3). It is not necessarily a life free from sorrow or sickness either, although God certainly does spare us many sorrows that we might otherwise have and often preserves us from sickness. It is not a life of sickly piety, where everything is "beautiful" or "precious" or "just wonderful." The abundant life, as Scripture sneaks of it, is, above all, the contented life, in which contentment comes from the confidence that God is equal to every emergency and does indeed supply all our genuine needs according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

The contented life is the life of the sheep who finds himself in the hands of a good shepherd. There may be dangers; in fact, there will be dangers. There may be storms at times, even drought and famine. Still, in the hands of a good shepherd the sheep is content and life is bountiful.

Abundance

Contentment means satisfaction, and satisfaction means to have enough. This understanding is reinforced by the meaning of "abundance" in English and in most ancient languages.

Our English word "abundance" comes from the two Latin words ab and undare which mean "to rise in waves" or "to overflow." The first translation gives a picture of the unceasing rise of the waves upon a seashore. There the waves rise again and again. One wave surges forward and exhausts its force on the sand, but another follows and another and another. Thus it will continue as long as time lasts. The other picture is of a flood. This makes us think of a river fed by heavy rains, rising irresistibly until it overflows its banks. The abundant life is, therefore, one in which we are content in the knowledge that God's grace is more than sufficient for our needs, that nothing can suppress it, and that God's favor toward us is unending.

The Greek word for "abundance," perissos, has a mathematical meaning and generally denotes a surplus. In this sense it is used of the twelve baskets of food that remained after Christ's feeding of the five thousand, as related in Matthew's Gospel (14:20). It is translated "remains." The comparative is used to say that John the Baptist excelled the Old Testament prophets in dignity and importance (Matt. 11:9) and that love is more important than all sacrifices (Mark 12:33).

Made Alive

Before one can know the abundant life, he must first know life. That is, he must first be made alive through faith in Christ. Christ is speaking of this when he says, "I have come that they may have life." It is only after this that he adds, "and have it to the full."

Are you aware that you have been made alive spiritually? You should be just as certain of this as you are that you have been made alive physically. In fact, one whole book of the Bible has been written so that Christians (who have been made alive through the new birth) might be certain of it and might grow in Christ on the basis of that assurance. The book is 1 John, and John tells us that this is his purpose in writing. He says, "I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God so that you may know that you have eternal life" (1 John 5:13). A few verses earlier he tells us that God has given life to all who believe on Jesus as God's Son and that they can be assured of this because God himself tells them that this is what he has done.

The Twenty-third Psalm

This brings us to the abundant life itself, and in order to discuss it in its fullest biblical framework I want to take you to the Twenty-third Psalm. This psalm is, above all, the psalm of the contented life. When it begins by saying "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not be in want" this is precisely what it is talking about. Not to be in want is to be content, and this state can exist only when the sheep is in the care of a good shepherd. In the psalm David tells us that he is content in the Lord in reference to five things.

First, he does not lack rest. He indicates this by saying, "He makes me lie down in green pastures; he leads me beside quiet waters, he restores my soul."

In the small but very rewarding book, A Shepherd Looks at Psalm 23, author Phillip Keller, who was himself a shepherd, tells of the difficulty there is in getting a sheep to lie down. Sheep do not easily lie down, he says. In fact, "It is almost impossible for them to be made to lie down unless four requirements are met. Owing to their timidity they refuse to lie down unless they are free of all fear. Because of the social behavior within a flock sheep will not lie down unless they are free from friction with others of their kind. If tormented by flies or parasites, sheep will not lie down. ...Lastly, sheep will not lie down as long as they feel in need of finding food. They must be free from hunger." Freedom from fear, tension, aggravation, and hunger! These are the four necessities. And the important thing, as Keller points out, is that it is only the shepherd himself who can provide them.

This is an interesting picture. For when the psalm begins with the sheep at rest it begins with a picture of sheep who have found their shepherd to be a good shepherd, that is, one who is able to meet their physical needs and to provide them with release from anxiety. Moreover, it is interesting that it begins at this point. For the other advantages of the contented life—guidance, comfort, safety, provision, and a destiny—come only to one who has found the Lord adequate to his every need.

Guidance

Second, the psalmist tells us that he does not lack guidance. For "he leads me beside quiet waters" and "he guides me in paths of righteousness for his name's sake."

Sheep are stupid creatures. In fact, they are probably the most stupid animals on earth. One aspect of their stupidity is seen in the fact that they so easily wander away. They can have a good shepherd who has brought them to the best grazing lands, near an abundant supply of water— still they will wander away over a hill to where the fields are barren and the water undrinkable. Or again, they are creatures of habit. They can have found good grazing land due to the diligence of the shepherd; but then having found it, they will continue to graze upon it until every blade of grass and even every root is eaten, the fields ruined, and themselves impoverished. This has actually happened to sheep and the land they graze on in many parts of the world—Spain, Greece, Mesopotamia, North Africa, parts of the western United States, and New Zealand.

No other class of livestock requires more careful handling and more detailed directions than do sheep. Therefore, a shepherd who is able to give good guidance is essential for their welfare. He will move the sheep from field to field (before deterioration sets in) and will always stay near water. He will chase strays. He will plan the grazing to fit the seasons of the year. In the same way, we too need the Good Shepherd. We do not lack guidance if we will but have it.

Safety

Third, David tells us that he does not lack safety, even in the presence of great danger. "Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me; your rod and your staff, they comfort me."

This verse often has been taken as providing words of comfort for those who are dying; and it is not wrongly used in that way. God certainly is a source of comfort in death. Primarily, however, the verse speaks of the shepherd's ability to protect the sheep in moments of danger. The picture in this verse is of the passage from the lowlands, where sheep spend the winter, through the valleys to the high pastures where they go in summer. The valleys are the places of richest pasture and of abundant water. But they also are places of danger. Wild animals lurk in the broken canyon walls to either side. Sudden storms may sweep down the valleys. There may be floods. The sun does not shine so well into the valleys. So there really is shadow, which at any moment might become death's shadow. It is through such experiences that our Lord leads us in safety.

In the book that I referred to earlier, Keller notes how often Christians speak of their desire "to move on to higher ground with God," wanting to move above the lowlands of life and yet not realizing that mountaintop experiences are entered into only by passing through the valleys. Strong faith comes from having faith tested. Patience comes from having lived through tribulations. This means that life will not necessarily be smooth under the direction of our Shepherd. He will sometimes lead us through rough places. Nevertheless, as we go through them we can know of his ability to keep us from falling and to present us before the presence of his Father with great joy.

Keller writes: "The basic question is not whether we have many or few valleys. It is not whether those valleys are dark or merely dim with shadows. The question is how do I react to them? How do I go through them? How do I cope with the calamities that come my way? With Christ I face them calmly. With His gracious Spirit to guide me I face them fearlessly. I know of a surety that only through them can I possibly travel on to higher ground with God." Provision

Fourth, Psalm 23 speaks of the shepherd's provision for each physical need of the flock. "You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies, you anoint my head with oil; my cup overflows."

Keller thinks that the reference to preparing the table refers to the shepherd's advance preparation of the high tablelands or mesas where the sheep graze in summer. If so, it refers to the elimination of hazards, the destruction of poisonous plants, and the driving away of predators—all before the sheep arrive. If it does not refer to this, it must be taken merely of God's provision of peace and feeding even when enemies lurk nearby. In such a time, says David, God anoints him with oil and fills his cup of wine to overflowing.

In biblical imagery oil and wine speak of joy and prosperity; for the growing of olives and grapes and their transformation into oil and wine take time and gentle care. In times of domestic turmoil or war these tasks were forgotten.

Moreover, oil and wine well suited the inhabitants of a dry and barren land and were therefore highly valued. In Palestine, where the sun shines fiercely most of the year and the temperature continually soars up into the hundreds, the skin quickly becomes cracked and broken, and throats become dusty and parched. Oil soothes the skin, particularly the face. Wine clears the throat. Therefore, when a guest arrived at the home of a friend in Palestine in Christ's or David's day, hospitality demanded the provision of oil and wine so that the ravages of travel might be overcome and friends might make merry in each other's company. David spoke of this elsewhere when he prayed, "O LORD ...let your face shine on your servant" (Ps. 31:14, 16). A shining face was the face of a friend. In another passage he thanks God for "wine that gladdens the heart of man, [and] oil to make his face shine" (Ps. 104:15).

David knew of God's great love and provision; his face shone, and his heart was made merry because of it. Oh for the shining face and the merry heart today! Far too many have scowling faces and gloomy hearts, but that is not what God intends for his children. Instead, if we will allow him to lead us to the high pastures of the Christian life we will find our table prepared, our heads anointed with purest oil, and our cups overflowing with the wine of joy.

A Heavenly Home

Finally, having spoken of all these provisions, David adds no less gladly that he does not lack for a heavenly home. He is blessed in this life, but it is not in this life only that he knows God's goodness. He will know it forever. Thus he declares, "Surely goodness and love will follow me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the LORD forever" (Ps. 23:6).

To have a sure home is one of the great desires of the nomadic people who have generally occupied that area of the Near East bordered by the Mediterranean Sea, the Red Sea, and the great Arabian desert. T. E. Lawrence, who gained fame as Lawrence of Arabia during World War I, has written of this eloquently in his classic Seven Pillars of Wisdom. He tells in the opening pages of that book how, because of the geography of this area, one tribe after another came out of the desert to fight for the lush Judean highlands, which contained the best trees, crops, and pastures. The Israelites in their conquest of Palestine under Joshua were just one of these peoples. When one group (like the Israelites) succeeded, the conquered people generally moved just a bit south into the Negev (which was also good land but not quite as good as that to the north) and displaced others. Those who were displaced in turn displaced others, and those displaced still others, with the result that there was always a constant movement around the entire area. The last of the peoples would be forced back into the desert with nothing before them but Damascus. At some point all the peoples of the Near East had this background. So, for most of them, Damascus with its ample rivers and fields became the symbol of true abundance at the end of life's pilgrimage. It symbolized home.

For us who know the Good Shepherd there is also a similar longing; but the longing is not for Damascus or any other earthly home. Our longing is for that great and final home that the Lord Jesus Christ has himself gone to prepare for us. He has said, "I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am" (John 14:2-3). With such a promise we know that we will dwell in the house of the Lord forever. Of our state in that home John the evangelist later wrote in the Book of Revelation: "Never again will they hunger; never again will they thirst. The sun will not beat upon them, nor any scorching heat. For the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd; he will lead them to springs of living water. And God will wipe away every tear from their eyes" (Rev. 7:16-17).

The blessings of this life and heaven too! Nor can we forget that this was achieved for us by One who himself became a lamb in order to die for us so that we might be able to enter into the fullness of such a great salvation.

Chapter 124.
"I Am the Good Shepherd"

John 10:11-18

The claim of the Lord Jesus Christ to be "the good shepherd" is the fourth of the "I am" sayings in John's Gospel. But if we were to order these sayings in terms of their popularity, I am sure that "I am the good shepherd" would be number one. It is not that we understand it so completely, for there is certainly much about shepherds and their care of sheep in Christ's time that we do not know. It is rather that there is so much in Christ's saying that our hearts know intuitively and for which Jesus is loved.

The Good Shepherd For one thing, Jesus claimed to be the "good" Shepherd. And we know by comparison with other people—particularly with those who are in positions of responsibility, whether parents, pastors, or politicians—that he is uniquely good. That is, he is good in a way that they are not. The word "good" is itself interesting, and we sense its meaning even though we may never have heard of the Greek word it translates or what the Greek signifies. The word means "good" in the sense of being morally good; but it also means "beautiful," "winsome," "lovely," "attractive," or even "possessing all and whatever qualities make the object described a good thing or the person a good person." Moreover, if we compare Christ's "I am the good shepherd" with his parallel claims to be "the true bread" or "the true vine," we also see that the word means "genuine" or "true," as opposed to "false" or "artificial." But we all sense this; that is my point. At least, it is my point as regards all Christians. We sense that by this phrase we are to recognize Jesus as the good, beautiful, winsome, lovely, attractive, true, and genuine Shepherd.

Moreover, we understand that he is claiming to be that exclusively. For he is not a good shepherd, as though he were one of many in that class. He is the Good Shepherd. There have been other shepherds, of course. The Old Testament speaks of both good and bad shepherds of Israel. The New Testament speaks of shepherds for our day; for Jesus is termed the "Chief Shepherd" from whom the leaders of God's people, the undershepherds, have assigned responsibilities (1 Peter 5:4). But compared to Jesus, we who are shepherds in the lesser sense scarcely seem to be that at all. For who of us could call ourselves "a good shepherd," much less "the good shepherd." Yet we instantly confess that he is both and love him for it.

Why does he call himself the Good Shepherd? Or, to put it in other language, what is he like or what has he done that he should bear this tide? The verses of John 10 answer the question in two parts. First, Jesus is the Good Shepherd because he lays down his life for the sheep.

We find that in verse 11. Second, Jesus is the Good Shepherd because he knows his sheep and directs them properly. We find that in verse 14. In both of these aspects Jesus is above all other men or women.

His Death, No Tragedy

I am amazed at the amount of teaching about the death of Jesus that we find in verse 11, and the more so because the teaching is more or less incidental to Christ's statement. The point Jesus is making is that he can be called the Good Shepherd primarily because he gives his life for the sheep. This is obvious, first, because he repeats it four times—in verses 11, 15, 17, and 18—but also because it is emphasized in contrast to the hired hand who runs away when danger threatens. The good shepherd is the one who sticks by his sheep, who defends them, and who will even die for them if necessary. This is the main point. What is amazing is the amount of teaching about Christ's death that occurs over and beyond this.

First, we are led to see that the death about which Jesus speaks is voluntary. This is evident in two places: in verse 11, which says, "I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep," and in verses 17 and 18, which add, "The reason my Father loves me is that I lay down my life—only to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord. I have authority to lay it down and authority to take it up again."

We must never think, in contemplating the death of Christ, that this death was somehow an accident or, even worse, a tragedy. It may or may not have been a tragedy when Alexander the Great fell sick and died at an extremely young age, or when Keats died in his early twenties. But it was most certainly not a tragedy when Jesus died at approximately thirty-three years of age. This was no accident. This was and is the great turning point of history. It was planned before the foundation of the world, for Peter spoke of Christ, saying, "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:23). It was this for which Christ was born, for the angel told Joseph, "You are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). It was this toward which Jesus' life consciously and deliberately moved, as these and many other sayings of the Lord indicate. Jesus did not have to come to this earth, any more than a man has to be a shepherd. He did not have to die. Nevertheless, he both came and died voluntarily for our salvation.

Second, we are told that his death was vicarious; that is, Jesus died not for his own sin—he had none—but for ours and in our place. He indicates this by saying, "The good shepherd gives his life for the sheep."

I cannot understand why so many have been urged to deny this. The words are plain enough, both here and elsewhere. They tell us that Jesus died, not only for others in the sense of "on their behalf," but and even stronger than this, in the sense of "in their place." The Greek preposition is hyper, the sense of which is given beyond any doubt in Romans 5:6-8, where the same phrases occur: "When we were still powerless Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man some might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrated his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us." The meaning is this: We are sinners; as sinners we deserve to die (both physically and spiritually); but Christ willingly died in our place, taking our punishment, so that we might be set free from sin and its penalty to serve God.

Third, the death of the Lord Jesus Christ was specific; that is, he died for a specified number of people designated in this verse as his sheep. We do not know who these sheep are, of course, and I am glad that we do not. If we could, we would be constantly prying into other persons' lives to see whether or not the other one is chosen; and in that case we would be little better than spiritual peeping toms. It is not for us to know. We cannot know. If we had lived in Sodom, would we have judged Lot, Abraham's nephew, to be a saved man? Probably not! Yet the New Testament tells us that he was accounted righteous in the sight of God, though he undoubtedly erred greatly in going to Sodom (2 Peter 2:7). Would we have considered Judas to be saved? Probably yes, in his case. But Jesus told us explicitly that he was a tool of Satan (John 6:70-71).

We cannot know precisely who these are for whom Christ died. But Jesus does know them and died for them. The result of this is that he literally paid the penalty for their sins and theirs only, with the further result that they are now fully justified in the sight of the Holy God and can stand boldly before him.

Finally, we are told the cause of the Shepherd's death for the sheep. It is because he cares for them (v. 13) or, as we should more properly say, because he loves them.

"What? Love sheep? Do you mean to say that you really love sheep, Jesus, and that you love them enough to die for them?"

"Yes, that is right," says Jesus. "I really do love them."

"But they are just sheep, and sinful sheep at that! We would understand if you should say that you felt pity for them, that you hated or were even grieved to see them torn by wild animals or scattered. But surely you would not go so far as to give your life for these poor silly creatures? Your love cannot be as great or as strong as that?"

"But it is," says Jesus. "I do love them. I love you."

"Me? Me, with all my sin?"

"Yes," says Jesus. "You are the one. I love you. I died for you. I want you to become a happy and useful sheep in my flock."

I do not know about you, but I cannot understand such love. I cannot fathom it. I cannot trace the reasonings of such love. But I do believe it and respond to it rejoicing. That is all we can do after all. David once wrote, "How can I repay the LORD for all his goodness to me?" He answered, "I will lift up the cup of salvation [that is, I will believe God concerning his offer of salvation] and call on the name of the LORD [that is, I will praise him for it]" (Ps. 116:12-13). And so we do, knowing that ours is the loveliest, most glorious song of the universe.

> Awake, my soul, in joyful lays,
> And sing thy great Redeemer's praise: He justly claims a song from me, His loving-kindness is so free.
> He saw me ruined in the fall,
> Yet loved me notwithstanding all,
> And saved me from my lost estate, His loving-kindness is so great.

Foolish men may be ashamed of such a song and of such great love. But Jesus is not ashamed of it. It is rather his boast and glory: "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep." God forbid, then, that we should glory save in that which is his glory, even the cross "through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal. 6:14).

Knowing and Known

In the second place, Jesus is the Good Shepherd because he knows the sheep and is known by them. There is comfort in that.

Why is that comforting? It is comforting because we long to be known and know others, and yet are basically incapable of it. It is true that there is a certain amount of knowledge of one another between human beings. Friends know one another. Parents know their children, children their parents. There is often a special and beautiful knowledge between husband and wife. But in spite of these things, for each of us deep in our hearts there is a hunger to be known better, to be known for what we really are, and to share a corresponding and similar knowledge of another. It exists on the human level. It exists above all on the divine level. For though we are sinners and in rebellion there is, nevertheless, a certain emptiness or hunger to know God and be known of God. Augustine called it restlessness, adding, "Our hearts are restless until they find their rest in Thee."

Moreover, there is comfort in the claim that Jesus knows his sheep because it is precisely as "his sheep" that he knows them. In other words, to be known of him is at the same time to be a member of his flock and thereby to be one for whom he died and who, as he says later, will never be snatched from his hand. This is a permanent relationship, then, and a personal one. I am his sheep? Yes, forever! Then he is my Shepherd, and that is forever too.

Finally, there is comfort in the fact that Jesus knows his sheep. I therefore need not fear that something about me might suddenly rise up to startle him and diminish his love.

There is a wonderful illustration of this point in the nature of sheep themselves. It is because of it, no doubt, that we find the image of the sheep and the shepherd so apt. Think of the characteristics of sheep. For one thing, they are all different. In our time, we are so oriented to mass-produced products and, even in ranching, to such large herds that we seldom think of differences. To us a sheep is a sheep, a cow is a cow, a dog is a dog ... yes, even a person is a person. But sheep are different from each other, people are different from each other; and the Good Shepherd recognizes those differences. In fact, it is by their differences that he knows them. If they were all alike, they would be indistinguishable.

I sometimes think that half our problems in the Christian church come from our trying to be exactly like another person, or from other people trying to make us be like them. Sheep are different. Jesus made them different and knows that they are different. So, be yourself, and strive to become all that Jesus wants you personally to be.

Not only are sheep different, they also are helpless. Jesus knows they are helpless, and that is why he has become our Good Shepherd. Did you know, for instance, that a sheep will often get stuck on its back like a turtle, so that it is unable to move, and that in warm weather it can die in that position within a few hours? A sheep in that position is called a "cast" sheep, and it must be rescued. Or again, did you know that a sheep is undiscriminating in its choice of food, so that it will eat anything, even poisonous roots and weeds? Or again, that a sheep is helpless in the face of predatory animals, so terrified, in fact, that it often will simply stand there without uttering a bleat until it is attacked and killed? I see myself in these characteristics, and as I do I am even more grateful for my Good Shepherd.

Jesus knows his sheep! Well, then, he also knows that they are wayward. A sheep can have perfect pasture, all that it needs or can ever need; yet, if there is so much as a tiny opening in an otherwise secure fence, somehow the sheep will find the opening, wriggle through, and wander away to less ample fields and into danger. I am like that, and so are you.

Prone to wander, Lord, I feel it;
Prone to leave the God I love, reads the hymn; and it is true. All we like sheep have gone astray yet in Jesus we have a Shepherd who is constantly on the alert to keep us from wandering and to seek us out when we succeed (as we often do) in going astray. Finally, a sheep is useful. Each year, under proper management, it produces a valuable crop of wool. Thus, when we are told that Jesus knows his sheep, we know that he knows that of us also and that he desires to have us be useful both to himself and to others. I know that he does not need us. He who created the heavens and earth and all that is in them does not need sheep for what they can give him. He does not need our good works. He does not need us to convert people, or even to sing his praises. He has angels to do that. But the fact is: he has created us; he has called us into his flock; and he has given us work to do. How, then, will we do it? Will we be useful or useless? Industrious or lazy? Our attitude should be, "Lord, what would you have me do?" To be willing is to express gratitude to the One who is indeed our Good Shepherd.

Chapter 125.
The Chief Shepherd

John 10:11-18

The parable of the Good Shepherd is a parable in which believers can learn about the Lord Jesus Christ. But it is not only that. Like most passages of the Bible that tell us about the Lord Jesus Christ it also is one in which we can learn what we are to be as we are made like him. In other words, as Christ is the Good Shepherd, so, too, are we to be shepherds; and we are to find the standards for our shepherd work in his own.

The Bible points to this truth in an interesting way. Three times in the New Testament Jesus Christ is represented as the Shepherd, but in each case the word "shepherd" is preceded by a different adjective. In John

10, Jesus is called the good Shepherd, as we have seen—"I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep" (v. 11). Here the emphasis is upon the voluntary and vicarious death of the Shepherd. In Hebrews 13:20-21 Jesus is called the great Shepherd —"May the God of peace, who through the blood of the eternal covenant brought back from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, equip you with everything good for doing his will, and may he work in us what is pleasing to him, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen." In this verse the emphasis is upon Christ's resurrection and therefore also upon his ability to work through and accomplish his purposes in his sheep. The third passage speaks of Jesus as the Chief Shepherd and stresses his second coming to reward those who have served him as undershepherds. It is 1 Peter 5:4—"And when the Chief Shepherd appears, you will receive the crown of glory that will never fade away."

These passages highlight the focal points of Christ's ministry. As the Good Shepherd, Christ dies for the sheep. As the Great Shepherd, Christ rises from the dead so he might serve the sheep. As the Chief Shepherd, Christ returns to reward those who have been faithful in the responsibilities to which they have been assigned as undershepherds. It is the last of these that highlights the point I am making.

When Jesus described himself as the Shepherd he revealed many important aspects of what he is to us, but at the same time he also revealed what we should be to others. For we are all shepherds—if we are believers in Christ. To a greater or lesser extent we have all been given an oversight of others. Do we exercise our responsibility as Jesus exercised it—in the family, in business, in the affairs of the church, in government, or in other areas? Do we show Christ's selfsacrifice and sympathy? Are we faithful? Whether we are or not, we may improve our service by reflecting on the characteristics of the Good Shepherd.

Found Faithful

The first and most obvious characteristic of the Good Shepherd is that he is faithful; that is, he is faithful in his responsibilities, not only when the skies are sunny and the countryside is peaceful but also when times are hard and when danger threatens. This is apparent from Christ's contrast of himself to the hired hand who, unlike the Good Shepherd, "sees the wolf coming, ...abandons the sheep and runs away. Then the wolf attacks the flock and scatters it" (v. 12).

The hired hand is one who is doing a job primarily for what he can get out of it rather than out of a true sense of responsibility toward the sheep. So the question becomes: Am I a hired hand in relation to those for whom God has made me responsible? Am I faithful or faithless? Do I stay with the work? Or do I abandon it when I see the wolf coming?

Before we try to excuse our conduct in this area (and we do try to excuse it), we need to hear one other thing said about the hired hand. It is in the next verse: "The man runs away because he is a hired hand and cares nothing for the sheep" (v. 13). At first reading this may seem trite, but it is not at all trite. It reflects a profound principle: a man does what he does because of what he is. Pink writes, "The drunkard drinks because he is a drunkard. But he is a drunkard before he drinks to excess. The liar lies because he is a liar; but he is a liar before he tells a lie. The thief steals because he is a thief. When the testing time comes each man reveals what he is by what he does. Conduct conforms to character as the stream does to the fountain." Therefore, before we try to excuse ourselves, let us learn that our conduct in testing proves what we are. Let us ask God for the character that proves faithful.

There is much in the Word of God about faithfulness. Jesus spoke of stewards who proved that they were faithful by the way they handled their master's goods (Matt. 24:45-46; 25:14-30; Luke 12:42-43; 19:11-27). Paul wrote, "It is required that those who have been given a trust must prove faithful" (1 Cor. 4:2). He also encouraged Timothy to commit the gospel "to reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others" (2 Tim. 2:2). He calls Onesimus a "faithful and dear brother" (Col. 4:9). Peter calls Silvanus "a faithful brother" (1 Peter 5:12). In Revelation, Antipas is called "my faithful witness" (Rev. 2:13). Faithfulness is of primary importance in Scripture. So whatever good characteristics we may have, we will prove of little value to the work of Christ if we do not possess this primary and essential characteristic.

Hardworking

Second, we must be hardworking and diligent. Nothing worthwhile is done without hard work. Yet many Christians act as though they have been saved by Christ merely to be transported to heaven on "flowery beds of ease," as the hymn acknowledges. Our standard is to be that of the Good Shepherd who works hard for his sheep.

In our study of John 10:10 we had occasion to look at Psalm 23, which tells us that the one who has God for his Shepherd does not lack any good thing. Specifically, he does not lack rest, guidance, safety, provision, or a heavenly home. These provisions are worth reflecting on in themselves—we did reflect on them earlier—but they also lead us to ask: Why does the sheep of the psalm not lack them? The answer obviously is that the Shepherd provides them and that he does so through much diligence and hard work. The sheep does not lack rest because the Shepherd seeks out green pastures in which he may lie down. He does not lack guidance because "he leads me beside quiet waters" and because "he leads me in paths of righteousness for his name's sake." He does not lack safety because the Shepherd defends him against natural disasters and wild animals. He does not lack provision because the Shepherd finds all that he needs and spreads it before him. He does not lack a heavenly home because the Shepherd has gone to prepare it for him and will return to lead him to it. All these items are provided through the hard work of the Shepherd.

In the same way, the needs of God's people—whether in families, homes, or churches—are provided by the hard work of those whom the Lord has appointed as undershepherds. This includes most of us. If God's people do not receive good spiritual food, it is usually because some minister is not working hard enough to provide it. If a family lacks love and security, it is because the parents are not working hard to provide these things in the home. If the widows are not cared for, it is because the deacons are slothful. If the church is not given proper spiritual direction, the elders are failing in their responsibility. The list could be carried on indefinitely.

Are we diligent? Do we work hard? One very hard worker, Watchman Nee of China, once wrote, "Only a diligent servant is of use to [the Lord. So] do not let us regard this matter lightly. ...We shall have to deal with ourselves unsparingly before the Lord if we are to become workers who are not 'unprofitable' in his service."

Patient

Third, we need to be patient—not with ourselves, of course, but with the sheep. This arises from the fact that sheep are sheep and that they need to be dealt with patiently.

A Christian humorist once said, "To look at the behavior of some ministers you would think that instead of having said, 'Feed my sheep,' the Lord had actually said, 'Teach my trained dogs new tricks.'" This stimulates an interesting train of thought, for it is true that some regard God's people as anything but sheep. Some, as the humorist indicated, act as though God's people were circus dogs. Others act as though they were attack dogs; so they are always telling them to "Go, get the liberals" or "Go, get the Communists." Some treat Christians like horses, getting them to charge some obstacle. Still others regard them as robots—they don't have to think; they just need to be programmed. But we are not dogs or horses or robots. God calls us sheep, and sheep need patience.

Moreover, sheep are different, as I pointed out before. Some go too fast; we need to be patient with those. Others are too slow; we need to be patient with those who fall behind. In this as in other matters we need to learn from the Chief Shepherd.

A Good Example

Fourth, we need to be a good example. This is what Peter is talking about primarily in the verses in which Jesus is called the "Chief Shepherd." He is writing to elders in these verses, though his words also apply more widely. He says, "To the elders among you, I appeal as a fellow elder, a witness of Christ's sufferings and one who also will share in the glory to be revealed: Be shepherds of God's flock that is under your care, serving as overseers— not because you must, but because you are willing, as God wants you to be; not greedy for money, but eager to serve; not lording it over those entrusted to you, but being examples to the flock. And when the Chief Shepherd appears, you will receive the crown of glory that will never fade away" (1 Peter 5:1-4). Are we like that? Are we examples of mature Christian understanding, faithfulness in the midst of persecution, Christian morality, love, joy, peace, patience, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, self-control, and all the other virtues? The point of these words is that we should be such and that we also should be examples in our careful feeding of the sheep.

Self-Sacrificing

A shepherd must be self-sacrificing. This is the fifth characteristic. What is it that characterizes the good shepherd in Jesus' description of him in John 10? Above all, that he gives his life for the sheep. We will never be able to give our lives as Jesus gave his life for us—he died for us as our sin-bearer—nevertheless, there are other ways in which we can give our lives for others. We can give our time in order to help them. We can sacrifice things that we would rather do or rather have in order to serve and give to others. In other words, we must put others ahead of ourselves. Our primary desire must be for their spiritual well-being and comfort.

The world says, "Me first; others second; God last." The order for believers should be, "God first; others second; myself last." It does not sound like a very attractive order to the natural mind, but the truth is that this is the way to a full life and a joyful existence. It takes self-sacrifice if a parent is to raise children properly, if a pastor is to guide and teach his people effectively, if a Sunday school teacher is to help her pupils, or if any worthwhile thing is to be accomplished. But it is rewarding. It is a source of great joy.

Moved by Love

Finally, the shepherd needs to be moved by love. Jesus loves us; he cares for his sheep. So ought we to love one another and care for one another. By this men should know that we are his disciples (John 13:34-35).

But where are we to learn this love? The only answer is: from Jesus. Therefore, we must learn to love him first of all, for it is only after this that we shall be able to love those whom he entrusts to our care. This was the last lesson the Lord Jesus Christ had for Peter. Peter had denied him three times, and the Lord wished to recommission Peter for service. So he came to Peter with the question: "Peter, do you love me?" It was repeated three times. On each occasion Peter answered, "Yes, Lord, you know that I love you," and Jesus then replied, "Feed my sheep." He knew that once Peter had come to love him he would love others also and would care for them.

So it is with all the lessons we are to learn. It is from Jesus himself that we learn them. Take the men from the Old Testament who are known as having been shepherds, and ask them where they learned to be shepherds.

Look at Jacob. He was not a particularly praiseworthy character. He was a cheat and a coward. But in one respect he was praiseworthy—he was a good shepherd. He was known for his faithful care of the sheep (Gen. 30:31; 31:36-42). Moreover, later (after the Lord had dealt with him), he was known for his care of his family in exactly the same way. We say to him, "Jacob, where did you learn to be a good shepherd? Where did you learn to care for the sheep?"

Jacob replies, "Well, it is true that I did care for the sheep; but I did not learn it of myself. It was not that I was faithful. I learned it rather from the Good Shepherd, the Shepherd of Bethel, who revealed himself to me and who cared for me during the years of my exile."

We turn next to Joseph and say to him, "Joseph, you too were a shepherd in your youth; it is said of you that you were faithful in feeding the sheep (Gen. 37:2). Moreover, you were used by God later to feed people; for as ruler in Egypt you were used to store up grain that helped preserve millions of people during a great famine. Where did you learn that? Where did you learn to be faithful in feeding the sheep?"

Joseph answers, "From the God of my fathers, who fed me during the years of my slavery and imprisonment."

"Moses, even you were a shepherd. You were raised in Egypt in the court of Pharaoh, but you spent the next forty years of your life in the deserts of Midian caring for the flocks of Reuel. It is said of you that you watered, protected, and guided the sheep (Exod. 2:16-17; 3:1) Just as under God you later watered, protected, and guided the people of Israel during the forty years of their desert wandering. Where did you learn to do that? Where did you learn to give such care?"

Moses tells us that it was not from himself that he learned it, but rather from God's protection and guidance of him as he fled from Egypt.

Finally, we see David. "David, you are preeminently the shepherd of Israel, the great shepherd king. As a boy you cared for the sheep; for you were the youngest in the family, and it was the job of the youngest to care for them. During those years you showed prowess in defending the sheep, for we read that you killed both a lion and a bear in rescuing them (1 Sam. 17:34-36). Later you showed similar prowess in defending Israel against even greater enemies. Where did you learn such courage?"

David says he learned it from the Great Shepherd about whom he had written. "Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me; your rod and your staff, they comfort me. You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies" (Ps. 23:4-5).

Each one learned what he learned from the Shepherd of Israel. We can be good shepherds too if we can first say, "The Lord is my shepherd," and then learn from him.

Chapter 126.
One Flock, One Shepherd

John 10:16, 19-21

In previous studies of the parable of the Good Shepherd in John 10, we have passed over one very important verse to which we must now return. It is a verse that deals with the church—for the first time in the Gospel—and that therefore sets the pattern for much of the teaching about the church that follows. It tells us about those who are members of the church, about how they become members, about the unity of the church, and about the Shepherd who is its sole head. In terms of the imagery involved, we may say that it teaches about the sheep, the flock, and the shepherd.

The verse is John 10:16: "I have other sheep that are not of this sheep pen. I must bring them also. They will listen to my voice, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd."

Other Sheep

The first part of the verse deals with "other sheep" who in the context of the parable are Gentiles.

The opening verses of the chapter have already spoken of one pen, or fold. That fold was Judaism; it was Christ's teaching that he had come to call those who were his own out of Judaism. The man who had been born blind was one example. The disciples were others. In the next chapter Mary, Martha, and Lazarus also are seen to be Christ's sheep, similarly called out of Judaism. Now Christ teaches that there are other folds from which many more sheep must be called—the fold of the Greeks, of the Romans, the barbarian fold, and others. In each of these folds Christ has those who are his own, who have been given to him by the Father, for whom he was about to die, and whom he would call. These are now to form that one great flock, the church, of which he is the one true Shepherd.

What wonderful things Jesus says about these sheep. In the first place, he says that he has them—"I have other sheep"—that is, he says they are his already. If they were not, he would have had to say, "I will have other sheep" or "I hope to have other sheep," assuming that all things would go as he hoped they would go. But this is not the expression used. Jesus says they are his and he has them.

I am sure that as he said this none of these sheep were in the minds of the disciples. They were hoping that Jesus would become the Messiah of Judaism, and they probably hoped that many, if not all, of the Jews would believe on him. But did their minds stretch beyond the fold of Judaism to see that Christ had sheep in Samaria, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Macedonia, Rome, Gaul, Spain, or other countries of the then known world? I doubt it. I doubt if Peter or James or John ever thought of Rome or Greece as eventual recipients of the gospel. And yet, Jesus was thinking of these places even then and was teaching that he had those living in them who would believe on him.

Spurgeon once wrote on this theme, "Our Shepherd-King has greater thoughts than the most large-hearted of his servants. He delights to enlarge the area of our love."

This verse reminds us of Christ's similar words to the apostle Paul recorded in the eighteenth chapter of Acts. On this occasion Paul was in Corinth, having come there from a not-toosuccessful preaching mission in Athens. Moreover, he had just experienced opposition from the Jewish population in Corinth. No doubt Paul was somewhat discouraged at this point. But here in Corinth, at this very point in his ministry, the Lord appeared to him by night in a vision and said, "Do not be afraid; keep on speaking, do not be silent. For I am with you, and no one is going to attack and harm you, because I have many people in this city" (Acts 18:9-10). Many people! What a comfort that must have been to Paul and how bold he must have been as he set out to find these sheep who belonged to the flock of the Great Shepherd. There is also comfort for those of God's people who love their fellowmen and who wish to witness to them of Christ's love. I have been told, "If Christ already has his sheep, what is the use of witnessing to them?" But I say, "What is the use of witnessing if he does not?" It is the fact that the sheep are his that makes us bold in Christ's service. If they were the devil's sheep, I would not bother. The devil is stronger than I am. Besides, to steal his sheep would be wicked. But they are not his sheep; they are Christ's sheep. God the Father gave them to Christ. Christ died to pay the price of their full redemption. Therefore, I can be bold in searching them out. If they are Christ's, I can step to the very borders of hell to call them back to him.

Then, too, notice this saying. Jesus says he must bring them—"I have other sheep that are not of this sheep pen. I must bring them also." It would be a great enough encouragement were Christ to have stopped after the first statement, telling us that he had certain sheep. That is great, but when he tells us that he must bring those sheep—well, if the first statement is sufficient to get us witnessing, the second should literally propel us forward.

Years ago I preached a sermon entitled "The Musts of the Master." The message considered this verse and three others. First, "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up" (John 3:14). This spoke of the necessity of Christ's death. Second, "Knew ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2:49 KJV). This referred to the whole of Christ's life. Third, "Zacchaeus, come down immediately. I must stay at your house today" (Luke 19:5). Here the divine necessity is applied to the calling of the individual. Then, our text, "I have other sheep that are not of this sheep pen. I must bring them also." Here the principle is applied to the calling of God's people throughout the world.

Most of us do not like the thought of necessity. We do not like to be told, "You must!" Kings certainly do not like necessity. Yet here is One who is a King of kings, above all kings, who nevertheless glories in the fact that he must bring these people.

Moreover, when Jesus says "must," things happen. When I say "must," things may happen, although not necessarily. When he says "must," difficulties vanish, mountains are torn down, life comes out of death, hell is vanquished, men believe. Do you not feel that you should have a part in that conquest? Do you not feel compelled to go out into the highways and byways and draw God's people to the wedding feast that the tables may be filled? If this does not move you, what will? If this does not encourage you, how can you be encouraged?

Then, too, notice that Jesus tells us how those who are to believe will come to him. It is by hearing—by hearing his voice, by hearing the gospel. There is no other way by which men and women can be brought to him. I believe that we should be alert to any means by which the gospel may be conveyed to people, and we should certainly be as clear and contemporary in our presentations as we know how to be. But we must not confuse our methods with the gospel, thinking somehow that it is the method rather than the gospel that saves people. It is by the proclamation of the cross that men and women are won (1 Cor. 2:1-5). It is through the foolishness of preaching that God saves some (1 Cor. 1:21). Speak the word of the cross, and some will believe. The word of Christ guarantees it. Moreover, the history of the church confirms the truth and wisdom of Christ's teaching.

One Flock

The second major subject in this verse is the flock, and it is the teaching of Christ that there is to be one flock for those whom he calls to himself. "There shall be one flock and one shepherd."

Here, of course, we must understand precisely what Christ says; for this verse has been both badly translated and misused, with the result that serious damage has been done to the church and to Christian thinking. The initial error can be traced to Jerome and the Latin Vulgate, for in that version Jerome failed to distinguish between a "fold" (which is mentioned in the first part of the verse) and a "flock" (which is mentioned later). There are two entirely different words in Greek, yet Jerome treated them the same, and many of our translations have followed him. The error is corrected in the RSV, NEB, NASB, and NIV. In Jerome's version, Jesus seems to be saying that there is only one organization, and the obvious deduction was that there could therefore be no salvation outside the formal organization of the Roman Church. This became official Roman teaching. Thus, Catholics were taught that Jesus was speaking of an organization and that, since there can be no salvation apart from membership in that organization, there could therefore be no salvation apart from the church of Rome. But all this is based upon a wrong translation, as I have said.

The church about which Christ was speaking is not an organization (though it obviously has organized parts) but rather the entire company of those who own the Lord Jesus Christ as their Shepherd. Thus, the unity comes not from the fact that the sheep are all forced into one organization but in the fact that they have all heard Jesus and have left lesser loyalties to follow him. Moreover, to the degree that they do follow him there is also a visible (though not necessarily a structural) unity that follows.

The question is: Do we truly acknowledge such unity? The answer, even for evangelicals, is that we often do not. The error of the Roman Catholic Church is the error of supposing that the Holy Spirit must work and, in fact, will only work along ecclesiastical lines. That is a real error. But precisely the same error exists within Protestantism. It is not so much that there are different denominations within Protestantism. That in itself does not bother me; for people are different, and there is no reason at all why there ought not to be different organizations with different forms of service and church government to express those differences. The fact that there are different denominations is not the problem. Indeed, to insist that there must be one great Protestant denomination (which some in the ecumenical movement insist on) is the precise error of Romanism. No, the problem lies along another line entirely. It is that believers within one denomination refuse to cooperate with believers within another denomination, justifying this on grounds that the other Christian is somehow contaminated by his associations, or is disobeying the Lord by remaining in his church, or is not actually (which is sometimes said) a Christian.

That is the problem. Evangelicals are more guilty of this than anyone, and I do not hesitate to say that this is the greatest single cause for the hindrance of the advance of the gospel in the world today—greater than liberalism, greater than humanism, greater than the materialism and rampant immorality of our time. Moreover, it is sin. We will not have great revival until true believers repent of this sin and ask God to cleanse them of it.

What are we to conclude about the church of the Lord Jesus Christ, then, on the basis of these and other biblical passages? I can state it in the following four principles:

1. According to the Lord Jesus Christ, there is one church to which all who confess him as Lord and Savior belong. Therefore, all who are Christians are one with all other true Christians and should acknowledge that to be true, even though the other believer is wrong about or denies what we consider to be important doctrines.

2. Nothing in the Bible tells us that there is to be or that we should desire one allencompassing organization. As a result of this we may expect God to call people to faith in Christ within various organizations and to lead believers into Christian service within those organizations. We dare not say that another believer is out of God's will because he is serving there.

3. God's people need one another and must learn from one another. This does not mean that each of us will therefore think other believers are completely right in church matters or even in doctrine—we do not dare say that we are totally right—but it does mean that we need to learn something about the body of Christ and receive help for the body of Christ from all other Christians.

4. Because of the love that is to bind the true church together, we also have an obligation to demonstrate that love-unity tangibly, over and above denominational programs and concerns. Indeed, we must; for it is the indispensible basis for our mission. "By this"— your love for one another—"all men will know that you are my disciples," said Jesus (John 13:35).

One Shepherd

Is there a cure for such problems? Of course. It is to be found in the third great subject of this verse—the Shepherd. He is the source of our unity and its basis. Therefore, it is only in Jesus Christ that two men, or women, or races can ever become one.

In his commentary on this passage William Barclay tells of an incident from the life of Egerton Young, the first missionary to the Red Indians of Saskatchewan, Canada. Young had gone to these Indians with the message of the love of God the Father, and they had received it like a new revelation. When he told his message an old chief said, "When you spoke of the great Spirit just now, did I hear you say, 'Our Father'?"

"Yes, I did," said the missionary. "We know Him as Father because He is revealed to us as Father by Jesus Christ."

"That is very new and sweet to me," said the chief. "We never thought of the great Spirit as Father. We heard Him in the thunder; we saw Him in the lightning, the tempest and the blizzard, and we were afraid. So when you tell us that the great Spirit is our Father, that is very beautiful to us." The chief paused, and then, as though the glory of it were even then breaking over him, he asked, "Missionary, did you say that the great Spirit is your Father?" "I did," said Young.

"And," said the chief, "did you say that He is the Father of the Indians?" "Yes," said the missionary.

"Then," said the old chief, like one on whom the light had now burst, "you and I are brothers. "

This is the only possible unity for men on this earth. Nothing we ever do will abolish distinctions between nations. There will always be nations. Nothing (so far as I can see) will ever abolish denominations. But in spite of these things—in spite of race, nations, and denominations—there can be a real and visible unity for those who acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ as their Lord and Shepherd. As Dr. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says in his volume on the second chapter of Ephesians, "We are all equally sinners. ...We are all equally helpless. ...We have all come to one and the same Savior. ...We have the same salvation. ...We have the same Holy Spirit. ...We have the same Father. ...We even have the same trials. ...And finally, we are all marching and going together to the same eternal home." It is a knowledge of these truths and, above all, of the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for us that will draw us closer to one another.

Chapter 127.
True Words Plainly Spoken

John 10:22-26

Several years ago, when I was speaking to someone about the gospel, the person to whom I was speaking replied that the discussion was merely a question of "semantics." I suspected that he had just learned that word, for he used it several times in the course of our discussion, in each case suggesting that there is no such thing as truth, that all ideas are relative, and that a person may therefore call himself a Christian while at the same time believing anything he wishes to believe. His reason was his feeling that language cannot be pressed to the point of precise definition. I acknowledged that it is sometimes hard to define words, particularly theological words. Theology is the art of defining precisely what certain words mean and do not mean. But at the same time I denied that this was any excuse for failing to grapple with the precise demands of God made in Scripture or for refusing to alter one's life accordingly. The young man would not accept this, however. So he continued to use "semantics" as an excuse for failing to believe on Jesus Christ. He also, so it seemed to me blamed God for his problem, for he was suggesting that things would be very different had God only expressed himself more clearly.

To this person and to all who think that God has not been clear enough in his revelation, the verses in John's Gospel to which we now come should be important.

The Complaint

At this point the Lord Jesus Christ was approaching the end of his public ministry. He had been in Galilee and Judea for nearly three years and had been teaching publicly for that time. He had not often said, at least explicitly, that he was the Messiah—the people were looking for a political messiah—and if he had done that he would have raised false hopes. Still, he had been open in many claims, saying that he had a right to other persons' loyalties and was able to satisfy all legitimate wants and needs. He had healed the sick, given sight to the blind, and done many other things that were in fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. These were sufficient grounds for anyone to have recognized the nature of his claims or at least to have followed him in order to have learned more. But the people did not want this. So, rather than simply saying that they did not want it or did not want to believe Christ, they said that he had not taught them plainly.

The text says, "The Jews gathered around him, saying, 'How long will you keep us in suspense? If you are the Christ, tell us plainly' (v. 24).

We need to see, moreover, that in asking this question Christ's hearers were actually trying to place the blame for their lack of belief on Jesus. This is clear from the language; for they prefaced the complaint with the question: "How long will you keep us in suspense?" In other words, they were saying that their failure to believe was his fault, in spite of the fact that he had been clear in his teaching and had been doing miracles among them for three years.

That makes me think of the story from Genesis in which Adam tried to do the same thing. God had given the man and woman the greatest freedom anyone has ever known. They were free to subdue the earth, free to eat of any tree of the Garden. But there was one tree, a symbol of the fact that they were still God's creatures and were dependent on him, the fruit of which they were not to eat. God had said, "You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:16-17). In other words, God had said, "You may eat of anything north of here, east of here, south of here, and west of here; but this tree is a symbol of your dependence upon me, and you shall not eat of it."

This bothered Adam. It did not bother Eve so much, for there is nothing in the Bible to indicate that she found God's command offensive. Eve, we are told, sinned through being deceived. The serpent told her that if she ate of the tree her eyes would be opened to discern between good and evil and that she and Adam would become like God. She believed the serpent, rather than trusting God; so she ate of the fruit. The Bible says, "The woman who was deceived ... became a sinner" (1 Tim. 2:14).

On the other hand, Adam was not deceived. He sinned deliberately, saying in effect, "I do not care if I can eat of every tree north of here, east of here, south of here, and west of here; so long as this tree is forbidden to me I hate it, and I hate God who gave it." So Adam ate deliberately, understanding precisely what he had done.

When God came to them—this is the point for which I tell the story—he came to the man first (because his sin was greater) and found that Adam denied responsibility. When he turned next to the woman she admitted what she had done and did not attempt to excuse herself. She said, "The serpent deceived me and I ate" (Gen. 3:13). But Adam ... Adam tried to escape his guilt by shifting it both to God and the woman. Adam said, "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree and I ate it" (Gen. 3:12). In other words, Adam blamed the woman as a secondary cause; and he blamed God as a first cause because it was God who had given him the woman. This is what we are all guilty of, for it is the nature of sin to blame others. Thus, we find the people of Christ's day blaming him for their lack of belief and (in the same way) many in our day blaming him also.

Do you do this? If so, may I warn you of how dangerous it is. The Bible says, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1:9). But if we blame God, our hearts are hardened and the day of grace passes by. I am certain that John is suggesting that this was so for those who asked this question of Jesus. Here both the context and the language are important. The incident took place near the end of Christ's public ministry. It was winter. For these quibblers the summer of Christ's ministry was over and the warmth of his life and teaching was about to be withdrawn. As he gives these details John most certainly has these overtones in mind. So what can be said of these quibblers? Surely, as Jeremiah declared, "The harvest is past, the summer has ended, and we are not saved" (Jer. 8:20). I trust that this is not true of you. Unbelief may seem logical to our way of thinking, but it is not logical to God's way of thinking; and it is with his thinking that you and I have to do. According to him we have been told everything we need to know and are therefore without excuse if we fail to believe on Christ as our Savior.

Christ's Answer

This is precisely what the Lord Jesus Christ replied to these who had voiced their complaint, "If you are the Christ, tell us plainly." He said that he had told them plaintly. Moreover, his works substantiated his teachings. He said, "I did tell you, but you did not believe. The miracles I do in my Father's name speak for me" (v. 25).

What gracious works these were and how richly they substantiate Christ's claims! The words alone had caused some to believe. It was the testimony of the Samaritans that they had believed Jesus because "we have heard for ourselves," rather than because of the testimony of the woman whom Jesus had met at the well (4:42). The nobleman who had his son restored to health by Jesus "took Jesus at his word" (4:50). Peter had testified, "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life" (6:68). These had believed on the basis of the words alone. Yet, there were also Jesus' many works that substantiated them.

In John's Gospel the works are called "signs," as we saw in chapter 5. A sign is a symbol; that is, it points to something signified. The miracles are signs in that they point to the unusual ability or character of the one performing them.

There are seven great miracles recorded in the Gospel of John. The first is the miracle at Cana of the changing of water into wine (2:1-11). John tells us that this was the first of Christ's signs and that, as a result of it, the disciples believed on him. The second miracle is the healing of the nobleman's son (4:46-54). This work shows Christ's power to overcome sin and sickness and to instill peace and faith in the human heart. The third sign is the healing of the impotent man (5:116). The meaning of this is that all men are spiritually impotent—they cannot come to Jesus — but that Jesus acts in grace to call them to himself in spite of their inability. Fourth, there is the feeding of the five thousand (6:1-14). Here Jesus is revealed as the One who alone can satisfy the hunger of the human soul. Fifth, there is the walking of Christ upon the water in which his power over the elements is dramatized (6:15-21). The sixth miracle is the healing of the man who had been born blind (9:1-41). Finally, there is the raising of Lazarus (11:1-44). Each of these reveals something about Jesus that we would not have seen so clearly otherwise, and each supports his claim upon men's loyalty.

"But these are not enough," some say. "Let him do more." Well, says John, Jesus did quite a bit more. In fact, he says, if everything about Jesus was written that could be written, even the world itself would not be able to contain the books. This is enough—that is the point. These words and works are sufficient. Consequently, "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:31).

To ask for evidence or for plain speech is a good procedure if evidence or plain speech is lacking. But if these are present, then to ask for more evidence or for plainer speech is only an attempt to avoid responsibility and shift the blame. Suppose that you are driving down a super highway at sixty-five miles per hour and that the speed limit is fifty-five. A policeman stops you and says, "What are you doing? Don't you know that the speed limit is fifty-five?"

"That's a good question," you say. "Actually, I was wondering about that. Is it fifty-five? Or is it sixty-five? I was going sixty-five."

"I'll say you were," says the trooper, "and sometimes it was seventy. Didn't you see that sign back there?"

"Oh! That sign!" you answer. "Well, actually I did see it; but that was a quarter of a mile back. It seems to me that if the state wants drivers to move along at that speed, it should mark the speed limit more plainly. There should be a sign here, for instance. And there should be one another hundred feet ahead, and another hundred, and so on."

What does the trooper do? Does he say, "I am so sorry that I stopped you. I see your point. There should be more signs. Go on your way. We'll put up a dozen new signs by next week"? Of course not! If you would answer a trooper like that, he would have you ticketed so quickly that you would hardly know what happened. The fault is not in the signs. The fault is in the driver who does not like to abide by regulations and who prefers to be his own authority.

Do not tell God that he has not revealed the truth plainly. Say rather that you do not like the truth he has revealed. And let that truth move you to repentance and faith in the Savior.

Do We Follow?

We must stop at this point for a few conclusions. But before we do, let me point out that what we have seen thus far is not the whole of Christ's answer to the demand that he speak plainly. His first answer, as we have seen, is that he had spoken plainly. He had said everything that could be said. He had done everything that could be done. If they had not believed by this time, nothing else he would ever say or do would move them. But they had asked him to speak plainly. So in the second part of his answer this is precisely what he does. It is a dangerous thing to ask Christ to speak plainly, for when he speaks plainly he really speaks plainly. He tells it like it is. In the verses that follow, and which we will discuss in our next chapter, Jesus gives the most highly condensed statements of the doctrines of grace in the entire Gospel, saying that in themselves men and women are unable to believe, that those who believe do so only because God acts in grace to elect them into the company of his people, that all whom God elects do, in fact, come and that none of those who comes is ever lost. These are the central doctrines of the reformed faith as it has been expressed by Jesus, Paul, Augustine, Calvin, and a host of others. If you want it plainly, this is it. This is pure biblical teaching.

At the same time we must add that the doctrines of grace cannot be used as an excuse to escape responsibility. It is true that we cannot choose God unless he first chooses us, doing a miracle in our hearts by which we understand these things and respond to him. But we are, nevertheless, responsible for the things we do choose and for the way in which we handle his revelation. What about Christ's words? What about his works? You cannot escape them. If they are true—and what possible reason do you have to doubt them save that someone has told you at one time or another that the Bible is not true, that it is only a collection of stories, and that without evidence—if they are true (I repeat it), then wisdom and simple honesty demand that you drop all lesser loyalties and follow Jesus. This is what he wants. He says, "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me" (v. 27). So, listen! Really listen! And follow Jesus!

But perhaps you already are a Christian. If that is the case, then this applies to you also. You say,
"But I already believe that Jesus is God and that his words are truthful. I do not doubt what the Bible says." Good! But that is not in itself the full definition of those who have been called to be his sheep by the Father.

Jesus says that those who are his sheep both hear his voice and follow him.

So, do you hear? Do you really hear? And do you follow? If you are going your own way, what right do you have to think that you are one of his sheep? If you will not listen to God's truth, what right do you have to think that you belong to him?

In the eleventh chapter of Hebrews we are told about some of Christ's sheep and of what they did when they heard the voice of their Shepherd and followed him. Abel heard and offered a better sacrifice. Enoch heard and pleased God. Noah heard and built an ark. Abraham heard and obeyed. Isaac blessed Jacob concerning things to come. Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph in accord with God's promises. Joseph gave instructions about his bones. Moses chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Rahab heard and received the spies in peace. Others, we are told conquered kingdoms, administered justice, gained what was promised, shut the mouths of lions, quenched the fury of the flames, escaped the edge of the sword, had weakness turned to strength, became powerful in battle, routed foreign armies. Women received back their dead raised to life again. Others were tortured and refused to be released so that they might gain a better resurrection (vv. 33-35).

In each of these cases life was different because the one involved had heard God's call and followed his leading. Do we hear? Do we follow? God grant that it might be so increasingly for Jesus' sake.

Chapter 128.
Christ, the Calvinist

John 10:27-29

One time, after I had preached a sermon from John touching on some of the main points of the Reformed faith, I found a copy of that week's bulletin on which someone had scribbled his opinion of the message: "I'm sick of Calvinism in every sermon."

The message did not particularly bother me. Notes like that seldom do. But I found it surprising that the person who wrote the note somehow regarded Calvinism as a system of thought that could well be dispensed with while, nevertheless, as he assumed, still preserving Christianity. In other words, this person, like many others, somehow regarded the doctrines that go by the name of Calvinism as at best an addition to the pure gospel and at the worst a system that is opposed to it. Is this true? Are the doctrines of grace wrong? One proof that they are not is seen in the verses to which we come in this chapter.

Historic Calvinism

The verses I have in mind are those in which the Lord Jesus Christ spoke plainly to his enemies, saying that those who do not believe on him do not believe because they are not his sheep, that those who are his sheep believe and follow, that this is true because they are given to him by the Father, that these who are given to him by the Father inevitably come to him and, finally, that these who come will never be lost. This is a message of man's complete ruin in sin and God's perfect remedy in Christ, and it can be expressed in the distinctive points of Calvinistic theology. Before we look at these points in detail, however, we should see that far from being an aberration or addition to the gospel, these truths have always belonged to the core of the Christian proclamation and have been characteristic of the church at its greatest periods.

To begin with, the doctrines of grace that have become known as Calvinism were most certainly not invented by Calvin, nor were they characteristic of his thought alone during the Reformation period. As we shall see, these are the truths taught by Jesus and confirmed for us in Scripture by the apostle Paul. Augustine argued for the same truths over against the denials of Pelagius and those who followed him. Luther was a Calvinist. So was Zwingli. That is, they believed what Calvin believed and what he later systematized in his influential Institutes of the Christian Religion. The Puritans were also Calvinists; it was through them and their teaching that both England and Scotland experienced the greatest and most pervasive national revivals the world has ever seen. In that number were the heirs of John Knox: Thomas Cartwright, Richard Sibbes, Richard Baxter, Matthew Henry, John Owen, and others. In America, thousands were influenced by Jonathan Edwards, Cotton Mather, and George Whitefield, all of whom were Calvinists.

In more recent times the modern missionary movement received nearly all its direction and initial impetus from those in the Calvinistic and Puritan tradition. The list includes such men as William Carey, John Ryland, Henry Martyn, Robert Moffat, David Livingstone, John G. Paton, John R. Mott, and many others. For all these the doctrines of grace were not an appendage to Christian thought but were rather that which was central and which most fired and gave form to their preaching and missionary efforts.

This, of course, is precisely why I am reviewing this history—to show that the doctrines known as Calvinism are not something that emerged late in church history but rather are that which takes its origins in the teachings of Jesus, which has been found throughout the church in many periods, and which has always been characteristic of the church at its greatest periods of faith and expansion. It follows from this that the church of Jesus Christ will again see great days when these truths are widely proclaimed, and proclaimed fearlessly.

Jesus is our example. We sometimes think of these doctrines as household doctrines; that is, as truths to be proclaimed only to those who already believe. But this was not Jesus' procedure. He taught them also to his enemies. In this case, they had come to him with the implication that he was responsible for their failure to believe; they had said, "If you are the Christ, tell us plainly." He answered this, not so much with a statement concerning his identity as the Messiah (although he did say that his words and works authenticated him), but much more importantly by a full statement of man's utter inability to choose God and of the necessity for divine grace in each step of salvation. Did they want it told plainly? Well, this is the truth told plainly: "You do not believe because you are not my sheep. ...My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all, and no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand" (vv. 26-29).

State of the Lost

First of all, Christ's words reflect the desperate state of the lost; that is, the state of all men as they are apart from Christ. The teachings on this point are not so much direct as indirect. Still they underlie the positive points made in this passage.

In reference to man's desperate state apart from Christ, these verses show that he has lost spiritual life; otherwise it would not be necessary for Christ to speak of it as a gift. Originally, man had life. When the first man and woman were created by God they were created with that life that shows itself in communion with him. Consequently, we learn that they communed with God in the Garden in the cool of the day. When they sinned, this life was lost, a fact evidenced by their hiding from God. This has been the state of people ever since. Consequently, when the gospel is preached, those who hear it turn away unless God intervenes to do a supernatural work of regeneration in their hearts.

Moreover, the desperate state of people apart from Christ is suggested by the fact that no one can recover this life except as a free gift from God. Jesus calls it a gift, for it is undeserved and unearned. If it were earned, it would be wages; if it were merited, it would be a reward. But eternal life is neither of these. It is a gift, which means that it originates solely in God's good will toward men.

As a last thought on this subject, it is also true, is it not, that men and women will perish except for this gift. Jesus says of those to whom he gives life that "they shall never perish." But since he makes this promise, it must be because we will perish if he does not intervene. We are sinners. Sin makes us heirs of God's wrath. If God does not intervene, we stand under divine judgment, without hope, facing the punishment due us for our own sins. According to these verses, we cannot even come to Christ, for we are not of his sheep and so lack the ability to hear his voice and turn to him.

Grace

This brings us to the next thought. For while it is true that in ourselves we cannot come to Christ and so lie under God's just condemnation, the main point of these verses is that God has nevertheless acted in grace toward some. Earlier this was expressed by saying that Christ died for the sheep; in other words, by the doctrine of a particular redemption (v. 11). In this section we are told that Jesus has given eternal life to the same people (v. 28), and that these are those whom God has given him (v. 29).

You cannot trace the origins of our salvation farther back than that. In this, as in all things, the origins are to be found in God. Some say, "But surely God called them because he foresaw that some would believe." But it does not say that. Others say, "He chose them because he knew in advance that they would merit salvation." It does not say that either. What it does say is that the initiative in salvation lies with God and that this is found, on the one hand, in God's electing grace whereby he chooses some for salvation entirely apart from any merit on their own part (which, of course, they do not have) and, on the other hand, in Christ's very particular atonement by which he bore the penalty for the sins of these people.

I need to say also, however, that there are aspects of the death of Christ that apply to the world at large. I am not denying that. The death of the Lord Jesus Christ is a revelation of the nature of God. It is a revelation of his hatred of sin in that Christ died for it. It is most certainly a revelation of God's love, for love lay behind it. It is an example to the race. These things are true. But in addition to these there is also a sense in which the Lord Jesus Christ died particularly and exclusively for his own, so that he literally bore the penalty for their particular sins, that they might be forgiven.

These truths do not make us proud, as some charge. Rather they increase our love for God who out of pure grace saves some when none deserve it.

An Effective Call

The third of the reformed doctrines presented by Jesus is the effective call: that is, that God's call of his people is accompanied by such power that those whom he calls necessarily come to him, believing on Christ and embracing Christ for salvation. Jesus expresses this by saying: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me" (v. 27). It is a mark of the sheep that they both hear and follow their shepherd.

In the Puritan era it was the habit of many preachers to play on these two characteristics, calling them the marks of Christ's sheep. In days when there were many flocks of sheep it was necessary to mark the sheep to distinguish them. In our day, at least on cattle, this is done by branding. On sheep it was often done by cutting a small mark into the ear. "Well," said the Puritans, "each of Christ's sheep has a double mark —on his ear and on his foot. The mark on his ear is that he hears Christ. The mark on his foot is that he follows him." This is true, of course. It leads us to ask, "Do we hear? Do we follow?" How many of those who come to church on a typical Sunday morning really hear the voice of Christ ox have ever heard it? They hear the voice of the preacher; they hear the voices of the members of the choir. But do they hear Christ? If they do, why are they so critical of what they hear? Why are their comments afterward so much more about the Lord's servant than the Lord? Those who are Christ's hear Christ. And they follow him.

But how many who come to church are really following? Most seem to make good leaders—in their own cause—but they are poor followers. They make good critics—of the Bible and of Christ's people—but they are poor disciples. They make respectable wolves, for they ravage the flock, but they do not have the traits of the sheep and would even be contemptuous of them if they had an understanding of what those traits are.

Do not presume on your relationship to Christ. You are not his unless you hear his voice and follow him. Jesus said, "If you love me, keep my commandments" (John 14:15). He said, "He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (Rev. 2:7).

Never Lost

Finally, notice that these verses also speak at length of God's perseverance with his saints. That is, they teach us that none whom God has called to faith in Christ will be lost. Indeed, how can they be, if God is responsible for their salvation? Jesus says, "I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (v. 28). "But," says someone, "suppose they jump out of their own accord?" "They shall never perish," says the Lord.

"Never?"

"No, never," says Jesus. "They shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand."

This does not mean that there will not be dangers, of course. In fact, it implies them; for if Jesus promises that no one will succeed in plucking us from his hands, it must be because he knows that there are some who will try. The Christian will always face dangers—dangers without, from enemies, and dangers within. Still the promise is that those who have believed in Jesus will never be lost. We may add that the Christian may well be deprived of things. He may lose his job, his friends, his good reputation. Still he will not be lost. The promise is not that the ship will not go to the bottom, but that the passengers will all reach shore. It is not that the house will not burn down, but that the people will escape safely.

Do you believe this promise, that you are safe in Jesus' hands, that you will never be lost? Are you able to trust God for this as you have for other truths? I suppose there is a way of explaining away almost everything, but I must say that I do not see how the opponents of eternal security can explain away this text. Am I Christ's? Then it is he who has promised that neither I nor any who belong to him shall perish. If I do perish, then Jesus has not kept his word, he is not sinless, the atonement was not adequate, and no one in any place can enter into salvation.

I wish that all God's children might come to know and love these truths. I wish that many might be saved by them.

We live in a day that is so weak in its proclamation of Christian doctrine that even many Christians cannot see why such truths should be preached or how they can be used of the Lord to save sinners. This was not always so. It was not always the case that these truths were unused by God in saving sinners.

Did you know that it was these doctrines, particularly the doctrine of God's perseverance with his people, that God used to save Charles Haddon Spurgeon, one of the greatest preachers who ever lived? Spurgeon was saved when he was only fifteen years old, but before that time he had already noticed how friends of his, who had begun life well, made shipwreck of their lives by falling into gross vice. Spurgeon was appalled by such things. He feared that he himself might fall into them. He reasoned like this: "Whatever good resolutions I might make, the probabilities are that they will be good for nothing when temptation [assails] me. I [will] be like those of whom it has been said, 'They see the devil's hook and yet cannot help nibbling at his bait.' I [will] disgrace myself." It was then that he heard of the truth that Christ will keep his saints from falling. It had a particular charm for him and he found himself saying, "If I go to Jesus and get from him a new heart and a right spirit, I shall be secured against these temptations into which others have fallen. I shall be preserved by Him." It was this truth along with others that brought Spurgeon to the Savior.

I wish it might be the same with you! I do not preach a gospel that has a shaky foundation. I do not proclaim a religion of percentages and probabilities. I proclaim the message of Christ, Paul, Augustine, Luther, Calvin, and all others who have found God to be their pure hope and salvation. It is the message of man's complete ruin in sin and of God's perfect remedy in Christ, expressed in his election of a people to himself and his final preservation of them. God grant that you might believe it wholeheartedly.

Chapter 129.
The Hands of God

John 10:28-29

If you have ever watched a carpenter do rough construction work, you may have seen him do something that will illustrate what the Lord was doing as he was speaking these words to the disciples. Since he had been a carpenter Jesus may have done this same thing himself.
Sometimes in rough carpentry a workman will drive a long nail through a thinner board so that the point sticks out the back. Then with a blow of his hammer he will drive the point of the nail over sideways, embedding it in the wood. This is called clinching the nail. It makes the joint just a bit more firm since the nail cannot work itself out from this position.

Two Nails, Four Hands

In a sense this is what Jesus did in these verses. He was so interested in getting the doctrine to stick in his disciples' minds that he not only drove one nail, he drove two, and clinched them both. This is what I mean. First, he taught that those who are his own have been given eternal life. This alone makes the truth fast; for eternal life is life that can never be lost. If it could be lost after a few years or even after many years, it would not be eternal. Nevertheless, Jesus knew that there would be many who would find this difficult to accept and who would attempt to explain it away by saying perhaps that eternal life is a quality of life rather than a life of unending duration. Lest they succeed in doing that, he went on to drive the nail over sideways, thereby clinching it into the wood. "They shall never perish," he said.

"I give them eternal life"—that is the nail. "They shall never perish"—that is the clinch by which the doctrine is reinforced and made fast.

One nail, however well fastened, does not always make a good joint. So Jesus went on to drive a second nail and clinch that. His second nail is found in the phrase "no one can snatch them out of my hand." The clincher is this—"My Father who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand." It is hard to see how anyone can be safer or any doctrine clearer than that.

Moreover, there is the matter of the hands. First, Jesus says that we are secure in his hand. We can imagine ourselves as a coin around which his fingers have folded. That is a secure position for any object, but especially for us, considering whose hand it is that holds us. But then, lest we think that this is not enough, Jesus adds that the hand of God is over his hand so that we are enclosed in two hands. We are therefore doubly secure. If we feel insecure, we should be reminded that even when we are held in this manner, the Father and Son still have two hands free to defend us. I wish that all Christians might enter into an assurance of that security. "They shall never perish," says Jesus. Believe it! Believe it, too, when he tells us that no man will ever pluck us out of those hands.

"But," says someone, "it may be true, but to teach it is dangerous. If people believe that nothing can ever snatch them from Christ's hand, then surely they will feel free to sin. If I thought so, I would sin."

Would you? If so, I feel sorry for you. I even doubt that you know the Lord, for my experience indicates that it is a knowledge of the love and grace of God that, more than anything else, keeps a believer from sinning.

"Even if there is a possibility of these truths encouraging sin, would it not be better not to preach them? Would it not be better to tell Christians that they might be overcome by sin and so perish?" No, it would not! Moreover, how could I tell what I do not believe? Shall I slander God with falsehoods? Let me put it in terms that you will surely understand. Shall I come to your house and tell your children—little Mary, just two years old, or Michael, just six—that if they disobey you they will cease to be your children and that you will throw them out into the streets? If I were to do that, you would be angry, and rightly so. Rather, you would want me to say, "Children, do you not know that your father loves you, that he will never stop loving you? Therefore, do not disappoint him. Love him and do what he says."

Do you understand that illustration? If so, do not impute lesser motives or lesser love to God.
Believe these truths, and allow them to become a great incentive to godly conduct in your life. Moreover, do not be afraid to have them preached, and do not fear to share them with other believers.

Hands of the Father

Let us be specific about the words of our text, particularly about the hands. Jesus said that we are secure in his hand and in the hand of the Father. What do we know about these hands? We recognize, of course, that to talk in this way is at least in part to use poetic language. But the truths are not less true because they are expressed poetically; and in the case of the Lord Jesus Christ the reference to the hands is not even primarily poetic. His hands were real hands. So what do we know about them? And what do we know about the hands of the Father?

Well, the hands of the Father are creative hands, for one thing. These are the hands that made the world, that formed man from the earth's dust. The Book of Genesis says: "The LORD God formed man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being" (Gen. 2:7).

In biblical thought three truths are closely tied up with this teaching. First, God knows us. He knows us because he made us. So nothing that is within us ever surprises him. That is what David had in mind when he said, "For he knows how we are formed, he remembers that we are dust" (Ps. 103:14). We do not need to fear that something in us will suddenly rise up to startle God and cause him to change his attitude toward us.

Second, the fact that we have been made by God means that we have been made for a purpose and that it behooves us to realize that purpose. To realize God's purpose is to find fulfillment and joy, not to find misery. Moreover, it is not for us to question the purpose any more than a pot should question the shape it has been given by the potter. This image is used by the apostle Paul in Romans in order to justify the ways of God in his dealings with Israel.

Third, the fact that we have been made by God means that we should acknowledge that and worship him thankfully. One of the Psalms says: "Come, let us bow down in worship; let us kneel before the LORD our Maker, for he is our God and we are the people of his pasture, the flock under his care" (Ps. 95:6-7).

Loving Hands

The hands of the Father are creative hands, then. But they are also loving hands. That is, they are hands that continue to care for and provide for that which they have made.

My favorite picture of this is found in Hosea. It is of God, as a literal father, caring for Israel, pictured as a child who is just learning to walk. The child can also represent ourselves in spiritual infancy. God says, "When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son. ...It was I who taught Ephraim to walk, taking them by the arms; but they did not realize it was I who healed them. I led them with cords of human kindness, with ties of love.

... How can I give you up, Ephraim? How can I hand you over, Israel?"

(Hosea 11:1, 3-4, 8). God says that he has been as a father to us, teaching us to walk. His hands have held us up while we were learning and have caught us when we were about to fall down. Moreover, he tells us that this is proof of his love and that he will not give up on those who are his true children.

Angry Hands

Finally, we need to see something that is not so pleasant to contemplate. God's hands are creative hands. They are caring hands. But they can also, so says the Scripture, become angry hands. They are hands by which judgment can be administered and by which it will be administered to all whose sin is not covered by the blood of Christ and who are therefore not among the company of God's people. John the Baptist spoke of this, saying that when Christ came it would be with fan in hand and that he would thoroughly purge his floor (Matt. 3:12). John was thinking of the way by which, in Mediterranean lands, wheat was separated from the chaff. Usually this was done by tossing the two into the air so that the wind could blow the lighter chaff away. If the wind did not blow, the winnowing would have to be postponed. However, in Christ's day, says John, Christ will provide his own wind; he will use his fan to separate the righteous from those who will not have him as Savior.

It is of the same judgment that the author of Hebrews writes, saying, "The Lord will judge his people," and then adding by way of stern warning, "It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:30-31).

There is a progression at this point. The hands of God are hands that have created. The hands of God are hands that have loved and cared. But man in general has despised the creation and turned from God's love. There is therefore nothing ahead for such men but God's righteous anger and judgment. This thought so possessed Jonathan Edwards that he preached often upon it. In fact, his best known sermon is on precisely this theme. It is "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," a title taken from the text that I have just mentioned. The text of the message is Deuteronomy 32:35—"in due time their foot will slip." The point of the sermon is that nothing withholds a man who will not have Christ from God's judgment except God's sovereign will, by which for a time he withholds punishment.

I am told that such truths cannot be preached today, that such teaching will drive listeners away. That may be. At any rate, I am sure that at least one of three things will happen. Either these truths will drive the people away, or the people will drive the minister away, or there will be a great awakening, as there was under Edwards's preaching.

Some say, "Where is revival today?"

I say, "Where are the faithful teachers of God's Word?" I say, "Let the angry God be proclaimed, as well as the God of love, and men's hearts will be stirred to repentance. They have been before. Do it, and many will flee out of a true sense of need to the Savior."

The Hands of Jesus

Look now at the hands of the Son. What do we know about these hands? Well, first, they are the hands of a workman; they are rough hands. These hands know labor; they understand toil. He is not remote, this Jesus. He understands us and feels with us in our infirmities.

Moreover, I see this truth and then turn to a text like John 14:2-3 and find an even greater truth there. We are told: "I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am. "Jesus tells us that he has gone to prepare a home for us. Well, then, I will not worry about the condition of that home or even whether it is going to be finished by the date of occupancy, for the greatest carpenter that ever lived is going to build it for me. In the same way, I do not worry about the condition of my resurrection body. For Paul tells us that if our earthly body "were destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven not built by human hands" (2 Cor. 5:1).

The hands of Jesus are also outstretched hands. I see the outstretched hands of Jesus everywhere in the New Testament. They are outstretched in healing, for example. I see him reaching out to touch and heal the leper when no one else would touch him (Matt. 8:3). I see him reach out to heal Peter's mother-in-law when she lay sick of a fever (Matt. 8:15). I see him reach out to restore life to the young daughter of the ruler, recorded in Matthew 9 (vv. 18-26). He touched the son of the widow of Nain to restore his life (Luke 7:11-18). His outstretched hands restored sight to the man who had been born blind (John 9:6-7).

Christ's hands also are outstretched to save such as are floundering. I love the story of Peter walking on the water toward Christ. The disciples were in the boat on the Sea of Galilee when they saw Jesus. He was walking toward them on the water. When Peter saw it he concluded rightly that if Jesus could do it, then by the power of Jesus he could do it also. So he said, "Lord, can I come?" When Jesus agreed, Peter started out. But soon he took his eyes from Jesus, looked at the water instead, and began to sink.

"Lord, save me," he cried.

Immediately, we are told, "Jesus reached out his hand and caught him" (Matt. 14:31). Sinking into the waves? That seems to be a picture of losing salvation. But then we see the outstretched, saving hands of the Lord Jesus. Peter's faith failed, but Jesus did not fail to save Peter.

These hands are stretched out also in blessing. We see the Lord blessing the children, even when the disciples in a fit of self-importance wished to keep them away (Matt. 19:13-15). We find the same thing at the end of Luke's Gospel, in the last picture we have of the Lord Jesus while on earth—"When he had led them out to Bethany he lifted up his hands and blessed them. While he was blessing them, he left them and was taken up into heaven" (Luke 24:50-51).

Wounded Hands

The last thing we need to see is, in some respects, the most obvious truth of all. The hands of Jesus are also wounded hands. The imprint of the nails of the crucifixion is in those hands, and it is for us that they were wounded. God told us that they would be. It is prophesied in Psalm 22, in which the crucifixion of the Lord is presented: "A band of evil men has encircled me, they have pierced my hands and my feet" (v. 16). Isaiah wrote: "But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities; the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed" (Isa. 53:5). Zechariah foretold that this would be a sign by which the true prophet, the Messiah, would be recognized (Zech. 13:6).

It is by this that we recognize him. Thomas is our pattern. Thomas had not been present on that first occasion when Jesus appeared to his disciples. The others told Thomas about it afterward, but Thomas replied, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it" (John 20:25). A week later Jesus appeared again, Thomas being present, and offered to fulfill the conditions of Thomas's test. But the mere sight was enough for Thomas. Thomas fell at Christ's feet and worshiped, saying, "My Lord and my God" (v. 28).

Is that sight not clear enough for you also? Are Jesus' wounded hands not evidence enough for you of his love?

God says that his action in Christ is perfectly clear, so much so that there is no excuse for a failure to believe it. In fact, he says that the way of salvation in Christ has been "made known" (Rom. 3:21). The way of salvation has been made as clear as a striking hand or a blow to the face. Today it is the hand of a gracious God who holds out the way of salvation to you. If you reply that you cannot see it, he asks you to look at the hand itself; for it is a wounded hand, one bearing the print of the nail received by Jesus in dying for your salvation. By faith you may put out your hand and touch that wound. You may know that it is evidence, irrefutable evidence, of God's great love for you. That hand was struck for you. The one extending that hand died for you. Allow him to enclose your hand, to enclose you, and to bring you into that great company of those who possess eternal life and who shall never perish.

Chapter 130.

The Issue in Six Words

John 10:30-39

The Gospel of John is filled with statements of the full divinity of Jesus Christ, but no statement is clearer than the one to which we come now. The opponents of the Lord asked him to speak plainly, implying that his lack of candor was the cause of their unbelief. So Jesus did speak plainly: first, to say that he had already spoken and acted plainly (it was their sin rather than a lack of evidence that caused their hostility) and, second, to outline the doctrines of God's grace whereby men and women are saved entirely apart from any merit in themselves and are kept secure entirely by God's unchanging good pleasure. It is this latter teaching that leads to the statement of Christ's total divinity with which the discourse closes.

Is Jesus God? That is the great question of John's Gospel. Is he fully divine? In this verse, Jesus declares that he is, doing so in just six words. "I and the Father are one," he says (v. 30). Because of their obvious importance, these words and their sequel deserve both careful study and a personal response.

One in Essence

First of all, what do these words mean? What did Jesus mean when he stated, "I and my Father are one"?

We may begin by saying that at the very least Jesus was claiming to be one with the Father in the matter of his will. This grows out of the context, for he had been speaking of the security of believers and had added that the will both of the Father and of himself was to that end. Believers would never perish, first, because no one could snatch them out of his hand and, second, because no one could snatch them out of the Father's hand. Someone might imagine that the will of the Father and Son in the matter of preserving believers might not be in perfect agreement. But lest they think this, Jesus immediately adds that it is precisely in this that they are united. Because of this unity we know that when we see Jesus working we see God working, and we know that God is like Jesus.

On the other hand, the phrase "I and the Father are one" obviously also means more than this, for only a full claim to divinity by Jesus explains the way in which the leaders reacted to Jesus' statement. What was their reaction? We are told that "the Jews picked up stones to stone him" (v. 31). Why did they do this? Clearly, because they saw that his statement was not only a claim to be one with the Father in respect of his will but also to be one with him in power—"no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand," and, "no one can snatch them out of my hand"—and that this latter was the same thing as claiming to be fully divine. In theological terms, this is the same as saying that the Son is one in substance with the Father and that they are equal in power and glory.

Four important conclusions follow from this truth concerning Jesus' nature: (1) we have the knowledge of God in him, for he is God; (2) we have forgiveness of sins in him, for his death had infinite merit in atoning for sin; (3) we have victory over circumstances in him, for he lived above circumstances; and (4) we have triumph over death in him, for he rose from the dead and has promised to so raise all whom the Father has given to him, that is, all who believe on him and have eternal life (John 6:39-40, 44, 54).

This is not a "pie-in-the-sky" philosophy. It affects our life now. Let me illustrate this by the following poem written by a good friend of mine who recently died of cancer. The death of this woman was a prolonged affair, accompanied by great pain. But she was not bitter. On the contrary, her speech was full of praise as she thought of Jesus, the one through whom she had come to a knowledge of God and who was even then preparing a place for her in heaven. Her son Peter recorded this testimony six months before her departure:

I read the Psalms when yet my eyes could read And I discovered, oh, so many ways, That the great psalmist felt the urge and need To magnify his God in songs of praise.

Praise is an effort—both when times are good And happiness fills our hearts And in dark times not fully understood. Then it is hard to say: "I'll praise, I will."

I will—a conscious effort. I will praise!

I will love Thee! I will extol!

I will rejoice and make a joyful noise!

Yes, I will praise Thee, Lord, with heart and soul.

But once the songs of praise roll off my tongue I'll serve the Lord with gladness and with joy.
But more than that—I may not praise alone. Praise ye the Lord; ye nations, praise His name. Sing of His mercy. Make His goodness known.

A testimony like that does not come easily to the tongue. But it does come through a knowledge and love of God as he is seen and known in the Lord Jesus.

Three Arguments

The fact that Jesus made a claim to be God is not the same as proving it, of course. And the fact that it needed to be proved is seen by the reaction of his listeners. They dismissed it outright and were ready to stone Christ for having spoken it. But was there proof? Was there evidence that Jesus is who he said he is? In the verses that follow Jesus responds to these questions with three lines of argument.

First, he told his opponents that he had done nothing to merit stoning. He said, "I have shown you many great miracles from the Father. For which of these do you stone me?" (v. 32). This was a perfectly valid argument. We recognize the force of it when we refuse to judge a person until we see what he can do. A man may claim to be a good worker, but we do not conclude that he is one until we see him at work. A child may claim to have been good while the mother was out shopping, but the mother does not accept the claim at face value until she sees the condition of the living room. So it was with the Lord Jesus Christ. He had made a great claim. All right! What was the evidence? Was the claim unverified or was it backed up by works? We all know the answer. Jesus had healed the sick, raised the dead, cured lepers, taught the multitudes. For which of these works did they reject his claim, then? For which of these were they attempting to stone him?

Strangely enough, his opponents reacted to this argument by reversing it, which we know to be wrong. "We are not stoning you for any of these," they said, "but for blasphemy." In other words, they were willing to skip over the issue of whether his works backed up his words, so intent were they on his destruction.

Today there is not quite the same movement to do away with Christ physically—he is not here to be crucified—but the argument is voiced by many who will not have him to be God in their lives. They will admit that he did good works, but they will not accept him as God; they will not consider whether his works support his claim to be divine. One woman who thought this way, declared, "I do not doubt that Jesus was a good man and did many wonderful things, but I will not accept the claim that he is God. I will not follow him."

Because the Jewish leaders thought this way, Jesus introduced another argument. What they were doing was willfully rejecting his words. So Jesus next showed that there was nothing about his words for which they could fault him either. Here's how he put it, "Is it not written in your Law, I have said you are gods'? If he called them 'gods,' to whom the word of God came—and the Scripture cannot be broken—what about the one whom the Father set apart as his very own and sent into the world? Why then do you accuse me of blasphemy because I said, 'I am God's Son?'" (vv. 34-36).

I want to admit, before we get into these verses, that the argument that they contain is a difficult one for most contemporary people to understand. For one thing, it is obviously a rabbinic argument, which means that it depends upon distinctions that were of great importance to the rabbis but that seem at best to be of minor importance to people today. For another thing, the drift of the argument seems to be in the opposite direction from what we understand Christ to have been saying previously. He was claiming to be God in a unique and absolute sense; but in these verses he seems to be watering down the claim by saying that he meant no more by it than what the Old Testament means when it applied the word "gods" to men. What are we to do in the face of these difficulties? How do we begin to understand Christ's argument?

We need to turn to the text he is quoting and see what the words mean there. Jesus is quoting from the eighty-second psalm, and when we turn to it we discover that the phrase "You are gods" (v. 6) is used of the judges of Israel. The judges in this psalm are called gods, not because they are divine but because they act as God in their role as judges. They are consecrated to a special task, indeed a holy task; and in God's name they exercise authority and power. "Now," says Jesus, "I too have been sent into this world by God the Father and that for a specific task. In that task I exercise authority and power, just as the judges of Israel did. If the word 'gods' can be used of mere men because of their function—if judges can be called gods—then how much more should I be called God in the full sense since I have received a unique commissioning and exercise unique power?"

In other words, Jesus was not denying that he is God in a unique sense—far from it. He was only denying that he had spoken words that were improper. The words are proper enough if spoken merely in relation to man. How much more appropriate are they then of Jesus, who is more than man? Do you see the force of the argument? To our way of thinking it may not be entirely satisfactory, but it should be understandable. We can express it by saying that, not only is there nothing in Christ's works to merit stoning, neither is there anything in his words to merit stoning.

Finally, we come to Christ's third argument, that to which the others lead up. It is this. Since there was nothing in Christ's words to which these men could properly object and since they acknowledged his deeds, these deeds alone should have led them to faith in him. Jesus put it in these words, "Do not believe me unless I do what my Father does.

But if I do it, even though you do not believe me, believe the miracles, that you may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (vv. 37-38). Christ's works should lead men to faith in him. It is as simple as that.

Belief and Good Works

This argument confronts you. If you are not yet a believer in Jesus, this argument is one approach to your heart. Can you accuse Jesus of sin or of an inadequate lifestyle? Hardly! It is rather that he, by his life, accuses you. Do you find his works inadequate, his words unsupportable? Certainly not! Instead, you confess with the many of Christ's own time, "No one ever spoke like this man. ...No one ever did what this man has done." Well, then, let the facts impel you to belief. Throw aside your rebellion and commit yourself to him as his disciple.

Above all, believe on him. I like to distinguish among three different levels of belief. The first level is that on which someone simply believes something. It has to do with factual knowledge. A second level of belief is what we might intend when we say that we believe in something. In some expressions that word "in" suggests the addition of a value system so that we are saying that the thing we believe in is important. In this sense we may believe in America, in motherhood, in apple pie. The third level of belief is that expressed when we say that we believe on someone. This level of belief involves trust and action. It is the kind of faith we exercise when we step onto a bridge, believing that it will hold us up, or when we get into a boat, believing that it is seaworthy and will not go down. This is saving faith. It is the kind of belief Christ calls for on the basis of who he is, what he has done, and what words he has spoken. If you will accept the facts and commit yourself to him in this way, he promises to save you from your sin, give you peace and victory over the circumstances of life, and eventually take you to be with himself in heaven in a place that he has prepared for you. Will you come to him? Will you believe on him as your Savior?

We need to see, too, that there is an application in these verses for the Christian. In these verses the Lord Jesus Christ laid stress upon his works—not his words but his works—and his point was that these should point men to him. That is a wonderful argument. But if it is true for Jesus, it also is true in some sense for his followers. If you are a Christian, you claim to have been saved by Jesus in such a way that his spirit now lives within you and directs your life and life choices. Do you live like it? Is there anything in your life that is evidence of his spirit within you? Jesus indicated that this should be true of you, for when some marveled at his deeds he answered, "I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father" (John 14:12).

"Full Moon" Revival

We need to acknowledge that even at best there will always be a great difference between the works of Christ and our works. But for that reason we need all the more to turn to him and draw strength from him. Or, to change the metaphor, we need to turn to him so that we may reflect his brilliance to others. He is the sun. When he was in the world he said, "I am the light of the world," and when he was thinking of leaving this world he turned to those whom he was leaving and said, "You are the light of the world." But they were not suns; they were moons. They, like ourselves, could shine only by reflecting his light.

Now is this world's night, for the sun is gone. But here is the moon, the church, composed of those who know the Lord Jesus. How will it shine? Will it shine as a full moon or a new moon? A waxing or a waning quarter? I want it to be a full moon. I think of the early church, the church of the apostles. The church was just a new moon then. But it grew and came to reflect the glory of its departed Lord to such a superlative degree that the entire world eventually sat up and took notice. It can happen again, if we turn our faces toward him. Let us confess that we have no brightness in ourselves. Let us admit our inability to do works worthy of his presence within us. But then, by his grace, let us also allow him to use us to reflect his glory to the world. Let us have a full moon of revival once again.

Chapter 131.
Word of the Living God

John 10:35

In the midst of Christ's reply to the religious leaders of his day, who were accusing him of blasphemy, there is a reference to the nature of Scripture that is so important that it deserves special consideration.

The leaders had accused Jesus of making himself the Son of God, and he had replied by a reference to Psalm 82:6 in which the word "gods" was used of the judges of Israel. "If the word can be used of mere men, how much more can the word be used of me?" was his argument. If Jesus had said nothing more at this point, his use of the psalm would be important; for he was basing his argument on a single word of the Old Testament that he clearly accepted as trustworthy. But he did say more, and what he said are the words we want to study. He said that "the Scripture cannot be broken" (v. 35). In our terms this was an affirmation of the Bible's total inspiration, inerrancy, and utter indestructibility. A great statement! It needs to occupy our attention in this study.

Early Christianity

However, before we look at the precise meaning of the phrase "cannot be broken" we need to see that the high view of the Bible expressed by Jesus in this and many other statements has always been the accepted view of the church—until relatively modern times. In the last two centuries or so the orthodox view of the Bible has been denied by large segments of the church so that for many the Bible has become man's word about God rather than God's word to man, and its authority has been lessened. But this was not always so. In fact, when we turn to past ages we discover that until recently all who claimed to be Christians, even heretics, acknowledged that the Bible was infallible and authoritative.

In the documents of the early Catholic Church there are many statements to substantiate this claim. Cyril of Jerusalem, who lived in the fourth century, said, "We must not deliver anything whatsoever, without the sacred Scriptures, nor let ourselves be misled by mere probability, or by marshalling of arguments. For this salvation of ours by faith is... by proof from the sacred Scriptures" (Cathechetical Lectures, IV, 17).

In a letter to Jerome, the translator of the Latin Vulgate, Augustine said, "I have learned to hold the Scriptures alone inerrant." And in his "Preface to the Treatise on the Trinity" he warned, "Do not follow my writings as Holy Scripture. When you find in Holy Scripture anything that you did not believe before, believe it without doubt; but in my writings, you should hold nothing for certain." He wrote: "I believe most firmly that no one of those authors has erred in any respect in writing" (Epistles, 82, 1, 3).

The same position holds good for Luther. It is common today, in surveying works that deny a high view of Scripture, to find Luther's reference to the Bible as "the cradle of Christ" quoted as proving that Luther believed in a revelation within the Bible, not identical with it, and held the Scriptures, which speak of Christ, in less esteem than the Christ whom they contain. For some this means that the "cradle" may be discarded in order to reach its treasure. For others it means that not all of the Bible is the Word of God. It is obvious, however, that this is not what Luther meant. Luther's evaluation of the Bible as the "cradle of Christ" occurs at the end of the third paragraph of his "Preface to the Old Testament." And there, as the late Lutheran scholar J. Theodore Mueller has ably demonstrated, Luther is actually defending the value of the Old Testament for Christians. Far from deprecating Scripture, Luther is actually concerned "to express his most reverent esteem of Holy Scripture, which offers to man the supreme blessing of eternal salvation in Christ." Luther himself says in this context in speaking of the Old Testament, "I beg and faithfully warn every pious Christian not to stumble at the simplicity of the language and stories that will often meet him there. He should not doubt that, however simple they may seem, these are the very words, works, judgments, and deeds of the high majesty, power, and wisdom of God" ("Preface to the Old Testament").

He says elsewhere, "The Scriptures, although they were also written by men, are not of men nor from men, but from God" ("That Doctrines of Men Are to be Rejected"). And again, "We must make a great difference between God's Word and the word of man. A man's word is a little sound, that flies into the air, and soon vanishes; but the Word of God is greater than heaven and earth, yea, greater than death and hell, for it forms part of the power of God, and endures everlastingly" (Table Talk, xliv).

In some places, Calvin is even more outspoken. Commenting on 2 Timothy 3:16, he maintains: "This is the principle that distinguishes our religion from all others, that we know that God hath spoken to us and are fully convinced that the prophets did not speak of themselves, but as organs of the Holy Spirit uttered only that which they had been commissioned from heaven to declare. All those who wish to profit from the Scriptures must first accept this as a settled principle, that the Law and the prophets are not teachings handed on at the pleasure of men or produced by men's minds as their source, but are dictated by the Holy Spirit." He concludes, "We owe to the Scripture the same reverence as we owe to God, since it has its only source in Him and has nothing of human origin mixed with it."

John Wesley says the same thing: "The Scripture, therefore, is a rule sufficient in itself, and was by men who were divinely inspired at once delivered to the world" (A Roman Catechism, Q. 5). "In all cases, the Church is to be judged by the Scripture, not the Scripture by the Church" (Popery Calmly Considered, 1, 6).

It was the glory of the church that in its first sixteen or seventeen centuries all Christians in every place, despite their differences of opinion on theology or on questions of church order, exhibited at least a mental allegiance to the Bible as the supreme authority for the Christian in all matters. It might have been neglected. There might have been disagreements about what it actually teaches. It might even have been contradicted. But it was still the Word of God. It was the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

An Infallible Bible

The fact that the Christians of an earlier day thought along these lines is not an accident of history or, still less, a product of wishful thinking. Christians of an earlier century had a high view of the Bible because the Bible has a high view of itself. Or, to put it in other language, Christians regarded the Bible as the infallible Word of God because the Lord Jesus Christ himself so regarded it.

This is where our text comes in. For when Jesus Christ said, somewhat as an aside, "the Scripture cannot be broken," he was saying (at the very least) that the Scripture cannot be "broken into" or "faulted." That is, Scripture cannot be wrong. Leon Morris comments: "The term 'broken' is not defined, and it is a word which is not often used of Scripture or the like. ...But it is perfectly intelligible. It means that Scripture cannot be emptied of its force by being shown to be erroneous."

This attitude of Jesus to Scripture is confirmed by other statements of his. For one thing, Jesus often appealed to Scripture as an infallible authority. When tempted by the devil in the wilderness, Jesus replied with three quotations from Deuteronomy (Matt. 4:1-11). By quoting Exodus 3:6 ("I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob"), he rebuked the Sadducees for questioning the heavenly status of marriage and the reality of the resurrection (Luke 20:27-40). He taught that "not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will be any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished" (Matt. 5:18). On many occasions he appealed to Scripture in support of his actions—in defense of his cleansing of the temple (Mark 11:15-17), in reference to his submission to the cross (Matt. 26:53-54).

In the second place, Jesus saw his life as a fulfillment of Scripture and consciously submitted himself to it. He began his ministry with a quotation from Isaiah 61:1-2—"The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners and recovery of sight for the blind, to release the oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor" (Luke 4:18-19). He taught that he had not come "to abolish" the law and the prophets "but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17). On the night of his arrest he foretold the scattering of the disciples. This would occur because, he said, "It is written: I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered" (quoted from Zech. 13:7 in Mark 14:27). You "search the Scriptures," he told the Jews, "[because] you think that by them you possess eternal life. These are the Scriptures that testify about me" (John 5:39). Even after the resurrection, he chides the disciples for being "'foolish ... and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?' And beginning with Moses and all the prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself (Luke 24:25-27).

On the basis of these and other passages it is beyond doubt that Christ highly esteemed the Old Testament and constantly submitted to it, as to an authoritative revelation. Because they are the words of God, Jesus assumed their complete reliability even to the smallest point of grammar.

Infallibility Unfortunately, the idea of an infallible Bible is widely rejected in our day, even among some evangelicals—first, by those who allege specific errors in the record, and second, by those who interpret the doctrine incorrectly. There are those, for instance, who interpret the claim of infallibility to mean that the Bible cannot report sin or errors. This is not correct. Many people in the Bible spoke lies and acted sinfully, and the Bible records it. But the Bible does not endorse either their lying or their sin. The Bible quotes the devil, but it does not suggest that we believe him.

In the same way, infallibility does not imply completeness, as though the biblical writers were under an obligation to tell all that happened in any given moment. In fact, sometimes they explicitly disavowed this aim (John 20:30). The doctrine of infallibility does not mean that all the existing manuscripts of the Bible are free from error; they certainly are not. The Holy Spirit inspired the original manuscripts, not the scribes who copied them. The doctrine of infallibility does not imply the infallibility of interpretations of the Bible. These views are misconceptions. The doctrine of infallibility simply means that in their original form the books of the Bible are free from factual errors and that they possess absolute, binding authority when they present teaching that purports to be from God.

Recently the heart of the debate over infallibility has shifted to the function of languages as a vehicle of truth. Some scholars imply that truth transcends language or that Scripture truth resides only in the thoughts, not the words, of Scripture or in the subjective experience of the hearer. But this is nonsense. If the Bible is inspired at all, it must be inspired verbally. And verbal inspiration means infallibility.

Of course, there are parts of Scripture where the choice of a word may make little difference in the recording of a fact or doctrine. The wording of some verses can be changed, as translators sometimes do to convey the proper meaning. But there are other places where the words are supremely important and where the understanding of a doctrine will inevitably suffer if we fail to take the words seriously. Certainly, if we are to have an authoritative Bible at this point, we also must have a verbally inspired and therefore an infallible Bible, a Bible that is infallible at this point and consequently at other points as well.

What happens when the function of language as a vehicle for truth is denied may be illustrated by this story. In one of the classes of one of our prominent theological seminaries a professor had been denying that words have a one-to-one relationship to meaning and had concluded that all truth is subjective. One of the conservative students challenged his professor. He argued that while it is true that we often misunderstand what is meant by a word or words, nevertheless words do have meaning and do convey literal content. The word "airplane" makes all who speak English think of a certain kind of object flying through the sky, he argued. If you say, "Look, an airplane!" people will look up. He gave other illustrations. Finally, the student said to his professor, "If language is what you say it is, then conversation is meaningless. In fact, this class is meaningless: There is no point in our being here."

There was a moment of silence as the truth of his words sunk in. Then someone said, "If this is meaningless, what shall we do for the rest of the hour?"

"Let's play squash," someone suggested. So the class got up and walked out, leaving the professor alone in his classroom.

God's Hammer

Through the ages men and women have sought to discredit Scripture and remove it as a force in their lives. But it has been those who have sought to destroy the Bible who have been destroyed, not the Bible. There are many images for the Bible in its own pages. It is called a lamp, a mirror, a sword, a seed. Notice that it also is called a fire and a hammer, a fire because it will burn in judgment and a hammer because it will break in pieces all who will not bow before it. "Is not my word like fire?" wrote Jeremiah; "and like a hammer that breaks a rock in pieces?" (Jer. 23:29).

Will you resist that Word? If so, then you will be broken; for the Scripture cannot be broken. Or will you submit to it and to the Christ who upheld it?

The Bible is not just another book. It is God's book, and as such it is powerful. It will change you, if you will let it. It was a section of the thirteenth chapter of Romans that changed the life of Augustine as he turned to the Bible in the garden of a friend's estate near Milan. Luther tells how in meditating upon the Scripture he felt himself to be "reborn," and relates how Romans 1:17 became for him "a gate to heaven." Wesley's meditation upon Scripture led to his conversion in the little meeting in Aldersgate.

Here is a modern example: "Some years before the publication of the New English Bible" writes J. B. Phillips, "I was invited by the BBC to discuss the problems of translation with Dr. E. V. Rieu, who had himself recently produced a translation of the four Gospels for Penguin Classics. Towards the end of the discussion Dr. Rieu was asked about his general approach to the task, and his reply was this:

'"My personal reason for doing this was my own intense desire to satisfy myself as to the authenticity and the spiritual content of the Gospels. And, if I received any new light by an intensive study of the Greek originals, to pass it on to others. I approached them in the same spirit as I would have approached them had they been presented to me as recently discovered Greek manuscripts.' "A few minutes later I asked him, 'Did you get the feeling that the whole material is extraordinary alive? ...I got the feeling that the whole thing was alive even while one was translating. Even though one did a dozen versions of a particular passage, it was still living. Did you get that feeling?' "Dr. Rieu replied, 'I got the deepest feeling that I possibly could have expected. It—changed me; my work changed me. And I came to the conclusion that these words bear the seal of—the Son of Man and God. And they're the Magna Charta of the human spirit.'"

J. B. Phillips concludes, "I found it particularly thrilling to hear a man who is a scholar of the first rank as well as a man of wisdom and experience openly admitting that these words written long ago were alive with power. They bore to him, as to me, the ring of truth."

Chapter 132.
Blessing before the Storm

John 10:40-42

The Bible says, "There is a time for every thing and a season for every activity under heaven" (Eccl. 3:1). There is a time to advance, regardless of the opposition, and there is a time to retreat. We see an example of the latter in the actions of the Lord Jesus Christ that close the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Jesus had been in Jerusalem for some time, according to John's account. But he had not been well received there, and the time for his earthly ministry was running out. We do not know all Christ's movements during this period, but we do know that he had gone to Jerusalem from Galilee in the fall of his final year, at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:2, 10), and that he had presumably been there after that for most of the winter. During these months he had preached widely and sharply, and opposition had grown, particularly on the part of the Jewish leaders. They had disliked him initially because of his views about the Sabbath. Now their dislike of him had grown into hatred and attempted murder. Once in chapter 8 and now twice in chapter 10 they have tried to kill him.

Clearly, the door to an effective ministry in Jerusalem was closing. So we read that Jesus left Jerusalem. He "went back across the Jordan to the place where John had been baptizing. There he stayed" (10:40).

It is hard to imagine an action more simple than that. Yet this decision on Christ's part is filled with lessons. For one thing, it is an illustration of the value of returning to places that have been of great blessing in our lives; for beyond the Jordan was where Christ had been baptized, John had preached, and the first disciples had followed Jesus. It was not far from the place in which Christ was tempted by the devil. For another thing, it is an illustration of the value of working at all times; for even though this was a time of retreat from Jerusalem it was not a time of inactivity.

Any one of these themes could be developed. But what I want to focus on particularly is the fact that this became a time of great spiritual blessing, so much so that we read, "and many people came to him. They said, 'Though John never performed a miraculous sign, all that John said about this man was true.' And in that place many believed in Jesus" (vv. 41-42). Driven out of Jerusalem? Yes, in a sense. But not out of a place of God's blessing. In the first chapter of the Gospel, John tells us that the name of this place was Bethabara, which means "place of passage." This undoubtedly referred to a place where a ferry could be used to cross the river; but in these days Bethabara became a place of passage in another sense, for many passed from death to life as the result of Christ's ministry.

The storm is coming. In a short while Christ again will be in Jerusalem and this time he will be crucified. But here is blessing before the coming storm. As we look into the characteristics of this time, which led to blessing, let us pray that these might increasingly become characteristics of our own time and that blessing might follow.

A Quiet Place

We should notice, as we do this, that not every time is a time of blessing. Nor is every place. Jesus had just come from Jerusalem, and that, far from being a place of blessing, was actually a place of persecution. Are there some who have been going through a time of persecution, testing, a dark night of the soul? So did Jesus. He was not always successful in his preaching. So, do not despair. Take heart. The time is coming when night's shadows will pass and the day of blessing will dawn.

What made this time, as opposed to other times, a time in which the Spirit moved and many believed on Jesus? First, we can notice that it was a quiet time. Jerusalem was a city of great bustle and activity, as cities are. But here was a quiet spot and little activity. In Jerusalem Jesus had come to men and had preached to them, but we sense that it was a situation in which he had to fight for their attention. He used dramatic events, like crying out on the last great day of the Feast of Tabernacles as water was being poured on the altar, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink" (John 7:37), and miracles, like the healing of the man who had been born blind. Then (we sense it, do we not?) he found his hearers quickly returning to the activities that pressed in upon them. Here, beyond the Jordan, it was different, and those who came to him came not to do things but to hear what he said and reflect upon it.

Let me encourage you to be quiet and to think of spiritual things. If you do not, how can you expect any blessing? One of the earliest preachers from whom we have any substantial writings, Chrysostom, once preached a sermon on these verses in which he commented on the fact that more women than men seem to receive Christ's teachings. Why is it? he asked. He then suggested that in his opinion it is because women for the most part are at home during the day and have time to think, while men are so often entirely caught up in the world's business. Is that true? Perhaps in part, I do not know. But I do know that there will never be blessing unless we take time to think about spiritual things.

So do it. Do it now and also throughout the week in your times of personal Bible study and prayer. Spurgeon once wrote, "Surely, heaven is worth a little thought if it is to be gained." That is certainly true of all spiritual blessings. So be quiet; wait upon God.

A Large Congregation

The second characteristic of this period is that Jesus had a large congregation. "Many people came to him," we are told. Therefore, we are not surprised to read one verse later that "many believed in Jesus."

I do not want to let this point get out of proportion, and I do not want to spend too much time on it. But at the same time I do not want to overlook the fact that Jesus often preached to large crowds. He did not neglect small numbers; in fact, his closest disciples, those with whom he worked most closely and whom he trained, numbered only twelve. But Jesus would also preach to the multitudes, and it is in times like these that we often read of great blessing. Let me state this in simple language. If God chooses to save but one or two, we are glad. If he assigns us to just a small group, we are content; for we are content to do his will, whatever it may be. But if there are no restrictions—and indeed there hardly seem to be any at this moment—then how can we be fully content or experience the fullest measure of delight unless many come to him? There is no special virtue in small numbers. There is nothing honorable in poor results. So let us have great blessing! Let us bring many to hear the faithful preaching of God's Word, and let us have many faithful men to proclaim it.

If we are to have many converts, we must obviously have many hearers. Let us bring them to hear the Word. Whom have you brought to hear God's Word this week? this month? this year? Is there no one whom you can bring? Of course, there is! Then bring him or her, and ask God to send blessing.

A Faithful Testimony

A third feature characterized these days spent in the wilderness beyond the Jordan. It was the memory of John the Baptist's preaching. Jesus preached, but his preaching was not sowing. It was reaping because another faithful minister had sown seed before him. This was where John had preached. Many remembered his teaching and, hearing Jesus, said, "Though John never performed a miraculous sign, all that John said about this man was true" (v. 41). Oh, that this might be true for us as it has been true of others! Do we reap? It is because others have sown. Will we sow? We must, if those who follow us are also to gain a harvest.

These verses also tell us what characterized John's testimony. That is, they tell us why his testimony was fruitful.

To begin with, John spoke of Christ. This does not mean, you will understand, that he did not speak of other things too. John spoke to the moral corruption of his time. He rebuked the Pharisees and Sadducees, when they thought to come for baptism without having truly repented of sin. He counseled priests and soldiers and many others, always giving sound biblical instruction and speaking to the times. John did and said many things, but his main work and testimony was to speak of Christ. And this is what remained in the minds of his listeners. John made it his business to speak of Christ—first, last, and always. Consequently, when others looked back on his testimony they remembered that he had taught them of Jesus.

What great preaching this was, this preaching of John. John stood on the far side of the cross and the empty tomb, but he understood what was coming and did not fail to proclaim it. He said that Jesus was the Son of God and gave this testimony, "I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God" (John 1:34). Is that in your testimony? That Christ is a man is also true. But if his humanity is taught without the addition that he is also God, there will be no blessing. John saw his divinity, rejoiced in his divinity, proclaimed his divinity. We should do so also.

Then, too, John testified that Jesus was the Lamb of God who would take away the sin of the world (John 1:29). Here John had the full sacrificial system of Israel in mind, and he was declaring Christ to be that Lamb sent by God of whom all the other lambs were but figures. Jesus was to die the death of the substitute. He was to die for sin, and not only for sin in general but for the sin of his people. Do you proclaim that message? You may talk about love and grace and social needs and prophecy and countless other items, all of which are good, but if the message of the substitutionary death of the Lord Jesus Christ for sin is missing, the other points will count for nothing. Christ crucified! That is the gospel. It is that which men and women remember.

We have already seen that John spoke of Christ. Notice secondly that what he spoke about Christ was true. This was acknowledged by those who had both heard John and met Jesus.

Here we see a great weakness in much preaching. Some preach anything but Christ. They talk of civil rights, about corruption in government, about politics, and seldom speak of Christ. But it is also true that some do speak about Jesus and yet fail in their task because they do not preach the truth concerning him. They have a limited Christ —one who is man but not God, one who died but who did not rise in triumph, one who came once but who will not come again, one who spoke in love but who will not speak out in judgment. Do not give me a Christ whittled down to man's measure. Do not throw me a truncated Jesus. I want the Christ of the Gospels—the One who is both man and God, who died but who also rose again in triumph, who came once but who is also coming again, who is love but who is also filled with wrath against sin. In short, I want the true Jesus, preached by John and by all who are faithful in their teaching of God's Word.

Do we preach such a Christ? Are we known for such testimony? God grant that it might be said of us after we have gone and men reflect on our testimony: "He did no miracle, but all that he said about Christ was true."

John spoke of Christ. What he spoke concerning Christ was true. But then, let us also notice, all that he spoke concerning Christ was true. It was not merely that some of his words concerning Christ were true and that some were not. All that he spoke concerning Christ was true. Shall we strive to do less? Shall we be satisfied with facts plus error?

"No," you say. "Let us have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

All right! But how shall we avoid error? There is only one way: by a diligent study of God's Word and a faithful adherence to it. We must not trust our own understanding. Our reasonings must be judged by this book. There is much of human opinion in Christianity in our century. God grant that such a trend might be changed, and that we might be in the vanguard of those who change it. Shall we have a slogan? Then let it be this—"Christ, the true Christ, and only Christ." And may he do the great work of drawing men and women to faith.

Results of Sound Preaching

In conclusion, let me also point out that on the occasion of Christ's ministry beyond Jordan this is precisely what happened. It was a time of blessing because (1) it was in a quiet place, (2) there was a large congregation, and (3) the work of the present was being built upon a strong testimony. But what precisely happened? Three things!

First, we are told that many came to Jesus. He was not in a popular place. In fact, he was in an out-of-the-way place. But there was that in him and his message that drew people. The drawing power of the Lord is not lessened. Many may also come to him today.

Second, those who came began to consider him and weigh the issues. They may not have done it before. Perhaps they resisted it, because it is often hard work and because the conclusions, at least where one's opinion of oneself is concerned, are uncomfortable. But here, standing right where John had stood and thinking of his words, these people considered Christ and reached sound conclusions. John was a prophet; all men admitted that. John had pointed to Christ as the Savior and Messiah; that was common knowledge. Christ had fulfilled all John's predictions; that they also admitted. "Well, then," they concluded, "Jesus must be the Christ, and we must follow him." I wish that you might reason so soundly today. This is a matter of great importance. I dare say that if one hour ago you had received word that you were dying of cancer, your mind would be entirely taken up with that thought so that you would hardly give attention to anything else. But that would be a matter of the body only, while what I am talking about is a far more important matter of the soul. Eternity is at stake. Your destiny hangs upon your commitment to Jesus. Will you not at least think about it? Will you not at least ask yourself whether these things are so?

And do not stop there. For in the third place we notice that, not only did many come to Jesus and not only did they consider him, but many also believed on him. It was good to have come. It was better yet to have considered John's testimony. But neither of these was enough, for the object of the coming and of the testimony was that they might believe on Jesus, accept him as the Son of God and as the Lamb of God and then commit themselves to him on that basis. Should we not have similar results today? Should not some believe? Indeed, should it not be many?

The last verse of our text says "in that place." "In that place," we are told, "many believed in Jesus." And where was that? Obviously, where they were and without delay! Well, then, do not say, "That was an impressive discussion I just read. I must think about it." Believe on him now. Do not say, "I must pray about this." God is not calling upon you to pray. If you are not yet a Christian, he is calling upon you to believe on Jesus.

Spurgeon once wrote on this last word of the text: "The devil wants you to wait, for he knows that he can then come and steal away the good seed of the kingdom; but if the Lord should give you the grace to decide for Him at once, if you were to believe on Jesus now, what joy there would be among the angels, and the spirit of just men made perfect! They would 'ring the bells of heaven,' and rejoice over lost ones found. What peace there would be in your own heart; and what thankfulness and delight there would be among the people of God when they heard of it."

Chapter 133.
Those Who Loved Him

John 11:1-2

The final argument against God by sinful men is that God has not done enough to convince them of the truth of his revelation. God has done much, but it is not enough. He has acted, but not sufficiently. In Christ's day the argument went, "If you are the Christ, prove it. Do a miracle great enough to convince us that you are who you claim to be." The facts on the subject are that man has sufficient evidence and, if he does not believe, it is because he will not believe, not because the evidence is lacking. In spite of this, however, we now come to the most impressive miracle in the Gospel—the resurrection of Lazarus from the dead. How are we to take it? Is this a miracle given by Jesus as one last attempt to convince his enemies that he is indeed God? If so, it was unsuccessful, for the narrative ends with an even greater determination by Christ's enemies to have him killed. Or was it performed largely out of a compassion for Christ's friends? On the surface this seems most acceptable; but if this is the case, why did Jesus delay his return to Bethany for two days, as the record indicates (v. 6)?

As we plunge into the story we find that the real motive was that "God's glory" might be revealed and that "God's Son may be glorified through it" (v. 4), in other words, precisely the motive that John gives elsewhere for the other miracles. In this case the miracle is given to reveal Christ as "the resurrection and the life." It is only incidental to this that some believe and that other hearts are hardened.

A Turning Point

Of the three friends Martha is the last one mentioned. But we begin with her; for in many senses she was the most prominent person, and the effect of the miracle on her was most pronounced. In fact, the resurrection of her brother Lazarus seems to have been a turning point in her life.

Fortunately, we know more about Martha than what is told in John 11. The information is contained in the story of a visit by Jesus to Mary and Martha's home, told in Luke 10:38-42. Jesus had gone to Bethany and was invited to the house of Martha, Mary, and Lazarus for dinner. Lazarus is not mentioned in this story, but we are told that Mary sat at Jesus' feet to learn from him while Martha was encumbered by much serving. Finally Martha began to scold. She came to where Jesus and Mary were sitting and said, "Lord, don't you care that my sister has left me to do the work by myself? Tell her to help me!"

Jesus answered, "Martha, Martha, you are worried about many things, but only one thing is needed. Mary has chosen what is better, and it will not be taken away from her." It is not the fact that she was serving that was the problem but that she was all worked up about it and was being unkind to others as a result. Here was one guest, the Lord Jesus Christ, but Martha was so worked up about his visit that she wanted Mary to leave him alone in the living room until the chores were done.

With this story in mind we now turn to another story, the story mentioned by John in the opening verses of chapter 11 but actually told by him in chapter 12. It is also told by Matthew in chapter 26, and by Mark in chapter 14. Once again the setting is Bethany, the town of Martha and Mary, but the home is not Martha's home. It is the home of Simon, identified as "the leper" by Mark, a man who had undoubtedly been healed by Jesus. Again the occasion is a dinner party. The verses in John begin: "Six days before the Passover, Jesus arrived in Bethany, where Lazarus lived, whom Jesus had raised from the dead. Here a dinner was given in Jesus' honor. Martha served" (John 12:1-2).

Notice two things. First of all, it was a large party. On this occasion Jesus was present with his disciples—that alone makes thirteen—and in addition to these there were Simon, Mary, Lazarus, and Martha. That is, there were seventeen, sixteen if Martha is not counted. Second, notice that once again Martha is serving but that on this occasion she does not appear in the least to be troubled but rather seems to be serving with a light spirit. On the former occasion she had one guest and was troubled. Here she has sixteen guests and is not troubled. What made the difference? Obviously only the resurrection of her brother, which comes between the two suppers, in which she learned to get her mind off herself and onto the Lord.

We are not left merely to surmise this, for there is a clue to this interpretation in the earlier story. It is the use of the pronouns "my" and "me" in her complaint to Jesus. In all they are used three times. Martha said, "Lord, don't you care that my sister has left me to do the work by myself? Tell her to help me!" Martha did not have her mind on Jesus at this point or even on the welfare of Mary. She had her mind on herself; and because she had her mind on herself, she felt unappreciated, neglected, and abused. Later, when she had gotten her mind off herself and onto the Lord, she lost those feelings and did what she did buoyantly.

Shall we apply that to ourselves? It is easy to do it, particularly if we are ones who (like Martha) have a gift for serving. There is nothing wrong with serving. That much is clear. So the question is not, should I or should I not serve? It is rather, whom am I serving? and how? Are you serving yourself? Are you trying to build up a reputation for yourself? Or are you serving the Lord Jesus Christ? Is your mind on him? I can assure you that if you are bothered about many things (as Martha was bothered) or if you feel neglected, your mind is on yourself, and you need to meet afresh the One who imparts new life and who causes us to forget ourselves. If you are truly serving him, you will count such service a pleasure; and if others are not helping—well, that is all right, because you are not serving either them or yourself primarily, you are serving Christ.

A Silent Witness

This brings us to the second of these three friends—Lazarus, the man whom Christ raised from the dead. I wonder if you have noticed from your own reading of these stories that never once is it recorded, either in John or in the other Gospels, that Lazarus says anything. We see Martha talking. Mary talks. But Lazarus says nothing; he is perfectly silent. Yet, when we come to the end of the story of the supper at Simon's house, recorded in John 12, we find that Lazarus had become a great and effective witness to Jesus. For "the chief priests made plans to kill Lazarus as well, for on account of him many of the Jews were going over to Jesus and putting their faith in him" (vv. 10-11).

How did Lazarus become such a great witness if, in fact, he said nothing? It is evident that he became a witness in the first instance by the very fact that Jesus had raised him from the dead. Everyone knew that Lazarus had died. In Christ's time funerals were public affairs and were well attended. We read several times of the crowd that had joined Martha and Mary in mourning for Lazarus and that accompanied Mary when she left the house to go to Jesus. Now Lazarus was alive, and anyone who wished could see him. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, came to Bethany and left marveling.

Moreover, Lazarus was a witness to Christ in that he was with Christ and was identified with Christ. In the story of the dinner given in the house of Simon, we are told that Lazarus "was one of them that sat at the table with him." In other words, where he was as well as what had happened to him was a testimony, for by his presence at the table he indicated that his life was identified with the One who had accomplished his resurrection.

This, too, is easy to apply. Neither you nor I have been raised from a physical death by Jesus. But if we understand the miracles in this Gospel—which we should by now—we can understand the raising of Lazarus as an illustration of a spiritual resurrection, none the less real, in which we have all participated if we are Christians. The Bible teaches that before believing in Christ men and women are spiritually dead—"dead in transgressions and sins," as Paul indicates in his letter to the Ephesians (Eph. 2:1)—but that after believing in Christ they are made alive. If you are a Christian, you have been made alive spiritually; that is, Jesus has performed a resurrection within you. Do you give evidence of it? Do you identify yourself openly with the One who performed it, as Lazarus did?

I believe that every Christian should be able to give a verbal witness to what Jesus has done and that we should do it often. But I also recognize that not everyone gives a witness by words easily. You may be one of these. If so, God is not calling you to be a Luther, a Whitefield or a Wesley. You do not have to speak well or all the time. But you should be especially careful that your life demonstrates the reality of that resurrection that Jesus has performed in you so that others might turn to him and believe in him because of what they see.

It is possible to have a great verbal witness and yet bear little fruit because the life counts for nothing. On the other hand, it is possible to say little and yet have a deep and lasting witness because the life is itself evidence of Christ's great grace and power.

Mary Poured

Finally, we come to Mary who is, in some respects, the most delightful and rewarding character of all. We are going to be seeing more of her later in our study both of this chapter and of chapter 12. Nevertheless, even at this stage it is worth noting some of the important things about her.

